At the present time the greatest interest which attaches to transits of Mercury arises from the conclusion which Leverrier has drawn from a profound comparison of transits observed before 1848 with the motion of Mercury as determined from the theory of gravitation. This comparison indicates, according to Leverrier, that the perihelion of Mercury moves more rapidly by forty seconds a century than it ought to from the gravitation of all the known planets of the system. He accounted for this motion by supposing a group of small planets between Mercury and the sun, and the question whether such planets exist, therefore, becomes important.

Apparent support to Leverrier's theory is given by the fact that various observers have within the past century recorded the passage over the disk of the sun of dark bodies which had the appearance of planets, and which went over too rapidly or disappeared too suddenly to be spots. But when we examine these observations, we find that they are not entitled to the slightest confidence. There is a large class of recorded astronomical phenomena which are seen only by unskillful observers, with imperfect instruments, or under unfavorable circumstances. The fact that they are not seen by practiced observers with good instruments is sufficient proof that there is something wrong about them. Now, the observations of intra-Mercurial planets belong to this class. Wolf has collected nineteen observations of unusual appearances on the sun, extending from 1761 to 1865, but, with two or three exceptions, the observers are almost unknown as astronomers. In at least one of these cases the observer did not profess to have seen anything like a planet, but only a cloud-like appearance. On the other hand, for fifty years past the sun has been constantly and assiduously observed by such men as Schwabe, Carrington, Secchi, and Spoerer, none of whom have ever recorded anything of the sort. That planets in such numbers should pass over the solar disk, and be seen by amateur observers, and yet escape all these skilled astronomers, is beyond all moral probability.

In estimating this probability we must remember that a real planet appearing on the sun would be far more likely to be recognized by a practiced than by an unpracticed observer, much as a new species of plant or animal is more likely to be recognized by a naturalist than by one who is not such. One not accustomed to the close study of the solar spots might have some difficulty in distinguishing an unusually round spot from a planet. He is also liable to be deceived in various ways. For instance, the sun, by his apparent diurnal motion, presents different parts of the edge of his disk to the horizon in the course of a day; he seems, in fact, in the northern hemisphere to turn round in the same direction with the hands of a watch. Hence, if a spot is seen near the edge of his disk it will seem to be in motion, though really at rest. On the other hand, should an experienced observer see a planet projected on the sun's face, he could hardly fail to recognize it in a moment; and should any possible doubt exist, it would be removed by a very brief scrutiny.

The strongest argument against these appearances being planets is, that the transit of a planet in such a position could not be a rare phenomenon, but would necessarily repeat itself at certain intervals, depending on its distance from the sun and the inclination of its orbit. For instance, supposing an inclination of 10°, which is greater than that of any of the principal planets, and a distance from the sun one-half that of Mercury, the planet would pass over the face of the sun, on the average, about once a year, and its successive transits would occur either very near the same day of the year, or on a certain day of the opposite season. The supposed transits to which we have referred occur at all seasons, and if we suppose them real, we must suppose, as a logical consequence, that the transits of these several planets are repeated many times a year, and yet constantly elude the scrutiny of all good observers, though occasionally seen by unskilled ones. This is a sufficient reductio ad absurdum of the theory of their reality.

It is very certain, then, that if the motion of the perihelion of Mercury is due to a group of planets, they are each so small as to be invisible in transits across the sun. They must also be so small as to be invisible during total eclipses of the sun, because they have always failed to show themselves then. But to produce the observed effect on Mercury, their total mass must be three or four times that of Mercury. Being so small individually, and so large in the aggregate, their number must be counted by thousands; and if seen at all, they will be seen only as a cloud-like mass. Now, in the zodiacal light we have such a mass, and the question arises whether the matter which reflects this light can be that which affects the motions of Mercury. Although the affirmative of this question involves nothing intrinsically improbable, it cannot be accepted without further investigation. The delicate point involved is, that unless we suppose the hypothetical group of planetoids to move nearly in the plane of the orbit of Mercury, they must change the node of that planet as well as its perihelion. Now, the observations discussed by Leverrier do not show any motion of the node above that due to the action of the known planets. We thus reach the enforced conclusion that if the motion of the perihelion is due to the cause assigned by Leverrier, the planetoids which cause it must, in the mean, move in nearly the same plane with Mercury. But it has not yet been shown that the axis of the zodiacal light deviates from the ecliptic by so great an angle as the orbit of Mercury, namely 7°. A great deal of research—more, in fact, than is likely to be applied to the subject during the present generation—will be required before the question can be settled.

3. THE PLANET VENUS.

The planet Venus moves around the sun about half-way between the orbits of Mercury and the earth, its mean distance from the sun being 67 millions of miles. Its orbit is more nearly circular than that of any of the other principal planets. It is very nearly the size of the earth, its diameter being little, if any, more than four per cent less than that of our globe. Next to the sun and moon, it is the most brilliant object in the heavens, sometimes casting a very distinct shadow. It never recedes more than about 45° from the sun, and is, therefore, seen by night only in the western sky in the evening, or the eastern sky in the morning, according as it is east or west of the sun. There is, therefore, seldom any difficulty in recognizing it. When at its greatest brilliancy, it can be clearly seen by the naked eye in the daytime, provided that one knows exactly where to look for it. It was known to the ancients by the names of Hesperus and Phosphorus, or the evening and the morning star, the former name being given when the planet, being east of the sun, was seen in the evening after sunset, and the latter when, being to the west of the sun, it was seen in the east before sunrise. It is said that before the birth of exact astronomy Hesperus and Phosphorus were supposed to be two different bodies, and that it was not until their motions were studied, and the one was seen to emerge from the sun's rays soon after the other was lost in them, that their identity was established.

Voltaire in Exile.

HIS LIFE AND WORK IN FRANCE AND IN FOREIGN LANDS.

BY M. GASTINEAU.

(Translated for THE TRUTH SEEKER.)

I.—CONTINUED.

It is impossible for two poets to remain long together without speaking of their works and confiding their labors to each other. Voltaire read to Rousseau his "Ode to Julia." Hardly had he listened to the first strophe, ere Jean Baptiste chose to become indignant with the "impious ideas" scattered in the piece, and threatened to leave the carriage in order to hear no more.

Voltaire derided the bigoted sentiments of which Rousseau made such a show before him, and exclaimed:

"Let us go to the play—but I regret that the author of the Moisade did not inform the public that he had turned bigot."

It seems that during an interlude of the comedy, Rousseau read to Voltaire his "Ode to Posterity," yet unpublished, and consulted him concerning its value.

"Do you know, my master," ironically replied Voltaire, when he had ended, "that I do not believe that ode will ever reach its destination?"

Rousseau said not a word, and remained under the blow of that cutting epigram. He was wounded at the very core. The two poets parted in anger—sworn enemies. Genus irritabile vatum!

In the voluminous correspondence of Voltaire are found letters from Belgium dated in 1722, 1734, 1737, 1739, 1740, 1741, 1742, and 1744.

The correspondence of Voltaire (Edit. Beuchot) mentions only one letter addressed to Thierot, and dated September 11, 1722, in which he says to his friend that he will be again in Paris from Brussels within fifteen days, and that he will go to see Sully to have "the rascal snapped."

The rascal in question was the French officer, Beauregard.

Voltaire remained two weeks in Brussels, where, he writes, he was every day en fête, of which they did him the honors in an exquisite manner. After this he visited several cities of Belgium with Madame de Rupelmonde. In Holland he met some publishers, and busied himself with the publication of the first cantos of his Henriade. He had been unable to find a publisher in France.

In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, Holland was one of the principal retreats of Freethought. There it is that Locke and Shaftesbury, victims of the Jacobites and of the Catholic government of James II., came. Shaftesbury died there. It was at Amsterdam that Basnage, Bayle, Leclerc, l'Abbé Prevost, Rousseau, and many others, also sought a refuge. From the printing-presses of that free city of the United Provinces issued pamphlets, papers, and philosophical works, which afterwards spread over all Europe, making the Revolution in minds before its translation into facts.

His voyage d'agrément in company with his amiable marchioness being terminated, Voltaire turned toward Paris. He threw himself with feverish ardor into the noble studies, not without shooting his epigrams right and left and paying his court to the beautiful Duchesse de Villars, whom he still very much admired.

The duchess was quite willing to discourse of tender things with the poet, but, like a great coquette, she held his passion at a distance in the Platonic spheres.

Voltaire, who had defined love as "the stuff of nature embroidered by the imagination," was on that chapter a little of the school of the Regence, more sensual than sentimental, if we except, however, his relations with Madame du Châtelet. From the too ethereal heights of the Duchesse de Villars he descended into Cythera with a very poor and very charming young girl, Mademoiselle Suzanne Livry. It was a veritable romance of youth. Suzanne became for him a new Pimpette. She wished to consecrate herself to the theatre. Voltaire told her that comedy was synonymous with love and passion, and asked her if she had loved. Upon her answering in the negative, the poet taught her the play and comedy of love.

Some months elapsed. Suzanne took a part in the comedy of Voltaire. Then she committed several infidelities against the author, and left with a company of comedians for London. But the enterprise failed. Suzanne fell into poverty—and into the arms of the rich and original Marquess of Gouvernet, who met her in an obscure London tavern and wedded her. Voltaire has made that incident the subject of his Ecossaise.

Near the end of his life Voltaire had the whim of going to visit, in her hotel at Paris, the Marchioness of Gouvernet. But she did not receive him. He was stopped at the door by a large and solemn lackey. Voltaire sent her the charming and satirical poem of the Vous and the Tu, contrasting the measured coldness of the marchioness with the abandon and carelessness of the ex-comédienne of the ruby lips ever rich with kisses:

"Ah, Phyllis! where is now the time
When in a cab we rode about;
No footmen, no adornments thine,
Beyond thine own, all charms without;
With a bad supper, blithe and free,
Which thou for me ambrosian made;
Thou gavest thyself all to me,
A happy dupe, ah, fickle maid!
With all my life enwrapped in thee?
. . . . . .
"For treasures all, as well as rank,
The Fates alone thou hadst to thank,
For beauty common to thy age,
A tender heart, not very sage,
A marble breast and beauteous eyes.
With all these charms, a precious prize;
Alas! who roguish would not be?
Thou wert—ah, graceful, wicked nymph!
Yet (may Cupid forgive it me,)
I loved thee but the more, thou imp."

For her only answer, the marchioness sent the poet's portrait painted in his youth.

"Oh, my friends!" exclaimed Voltaire, reporting his visit; "I have just passed from one shore of the Cocytus to the other."

Voltaire's relations with Adrienne Lecouvereur lasted a little longer than the ones he had carried on with the fickle Suzanne Livry. It was in the presence of that famous comedian, at her house or in her box at the opera, that he had an altercation with a pretentious sot called the chevalier de Rohan-Chabot. Having acted impertinently toward the poet, he was nailed to the wall by one of those cutting replies which were habitual with Voltaire.

"Who might be that young man who speaks in such a high key?" the chevalier is reported to have asked.

"He is," replied Voltaire, "a man who is establishing his name while you are finishing yours."

Two days after, Voltaire, dining with the Duke of Sully, was called outside, drawn into an ambush, and bastinadoed by the lackeys of the Chevalier de Rohan, who was present at the execution of his orders, and ended by saying to his rabble:

"It is enough!"

Voltaire, mad with rage, vainly demanded reparation for that shameful outrage from the miserable knight, from God and devil. "Justice has been done!" was the reply everywhere.

Knowing that Voltaire was practicing fencing and wished to force him to accept a duel, the Chevalier de Rohan induced the minister to have his mortal enemy shut up in the Bastille. That second incarceration lasted a year. Voltaire came out of prison in August, 1726, to be embarked at Calais, by order of the lieutenant of police, and to sail for England.

It was during that year, 1726, that he is supposed to have renounced the name of Arouet and to have taken, from some estate, the one he has rendered illustrious.

The Radical Pulpit.

If you Take Away my Religion, What will you Give me in its Stead?—Concluded.

DELIVERED BEFORE THE NEWARK LIBERAL LEAGUE, JUNE 2, 1878, BY H. B. MARTIN, M.D.

Another rather queer fact in connection with this snake delusion is the assumption of the snake being endowed with the capacity of speech. How is it that the descendants of this snake did not retain the power of speech among their family? Or why did not God impute its dumbness to its curse? If this snake was, as is claimed, able to speak with such fluency and convincing power, would it not appear far more of a judgment or curse to show it as deprived of that capacity than by claiming it to be doomed to subsist by eating dust? It seems to me that the whole thing is a piece of folly too ridiculous to be cherished for a moment by any rational being.

To take away one's religion, then, consists in spoiling this splendid snake story; for this lies at the bottom and is the foundation on which the whole superstructure of religion rests. If we destroy this foundation the whole fabric must fall.

I have shown that in the representation given of this cursing business, the serpent, the woman, and the man had each a curse applied to their particular case, and that the curse for the serpent could not, under any condition, possibly have been applied to the man or the woman; neither could the curse of the woman have been possibly applied to the man, and vice versa. Therefore, the woman has never been, and is not now, under any penalty of death for the transgression, but is, so far as that is concerned, just the same as when created, and it follows, of course, that she never has been, nor is she now, in need of any change, except from the thralldom of the rule of man.

I have also shown, by some twenty different Christian historians and writers on the Bible, whose authority cannot be impeached, that, in all probability, it was all taken from paganism, and had been altered from time to time, until no person living could tell, at the present time, what parts of it were truly authentic, and which false.

To take away one's religion, then, is to relieve his mind from all these uncertainties and delusions; from the lessons of deceit and lying which I have shown to exist in both the Old and New Testaments, and to be free from priestcraft and delusion.

And now, what has Liberalism to offer in its place? We are, therefore, led to inquire, What is Liberalism? In answer to this question, I reply, Liberalism is Christianity with its objectionable features cast aside. All that is true and good in the Christian system Liberalism would retain. All the correct teachings of the Bible—which, however, do not depend upon that or any other book; which were known and practiced before the Bible existed; which are the offspring of neither Christianity nor any other system of religion—Liberalism encourages and endeavors to strengthen. As for the errors of the Christian system, we are content to cast them aside and accept the truths of which these errors are a denial. We would not substitute one superstition for another. If we have been fortunate enough to escape from one disease, we do not ask the physician to give us another in its place. We want health in the place of disease, truth in the place of error. For the Bible as a standard of truth we offer the enlightened reason of man. Although not infallible, it is the highest and best standard man possesses—one to which all Bibles have to be subjected before we can judge of their value or decide on their claims. Liberalism aims at intellectual and moral culture, which involves a knowledge of ourselves and our relations, and a disposition to live pure and noble lives. For knowledge we depend, not upon an objective revelation, but upon observation, reason, and reflection, which preceded and will outlast the authority of all books. The untrammeled exercise of reason and a fearless expression of our candid opinions on all subjects we regard as a duty, as well as a right. Beliefs, since they do not depend upon volitions, are with us neither moral nor immoral; for good men may have erroneous, bad men often have correct, beliefs; but in so far as beliefs influence conduct and modify character, we regard right beliefs as important.

Morality is by Liberalism considered as the science of human relations, having for its foundation the broadest utility. The distinction between right and wrong mankind has learned by experience. That which is for the benefit of mankind is right.

By Liberalism doubt is not regarded as a crime, or with disfavor, but rather as the beginning of wisdom, the forerunner of investigation and advancement. Faith, with Liberalism, is confidence in the truth and right, founded upon evidence only. It has faith in the universal operations of nature, in the alternations of day and night, in seedtime and harvest; this because such trust is warranted by experience. In like manner, new authority is to be respected, as not the mere utterance or view of some one to us unknown, but the testimony of investigators, discoverers, etc. Thus, Lyell is an authority in geology, Gray in botany, and Youmans in chemistry—men whose years of study of those sciences entitle their statements to consideration and confidence.

In regard to the atonement, we hold that no man should suffer for the crimes of another, as Jesus is represented as suffering for the sin of man. While the world is advanced by sacrifice and suffering, and individuals by self-denial and sacrifices, this is quite different from imputed guilt and substitutionary righteousness. Liberalism does not recognize the justice of a being suffering for the sins of humanity. Yet we may all be benefited by his suffering, when he has sacrificed his life for a noble principle. Jesus we regard as a brother and benefactor, like Voltaire or Theodore Parker. Liberalism does not regard the atonement as Christian theologians teach it. They make it a doctrine of barbarism—construct a scapegoat for a sinner; like a bankrupt scheme to rid humanity of paying its honest debts. The theologians urge taking hold of this bankrupt scheme, and thus increase moral turpitude by teaching that, whatever his life, the sinner may be converted at his last moment, as the thief on the cross; or, in the words of the hymn, "While the lamp holds out to burn, the vilest sinner may return." We would not delay so late right doing; this life is worthy all our efforts and enthusiasm. Every one exerts an influence as lasting as the race. We are what ages of ancestral experience have made us. The future will depend largely upon us. We cannot live isolated lives. Philosophically considered, the ultimate cause of all phenomena we regard as inscrutable. Why a stone will fall to the earth, why oxygen and hydrogen united will produce water, we do not know. If we say God, the word is like the letter x in an interminate algebraic problem. We decline to bestow upon the absolute human qualities. To qualify is to limit. The unconditioned alone is the absolute. We recognize inscrutable power, but not a personal, anthropomorphic God, located somewhere in space, seated on his throne, and surrounded by ministering angels. The theologian's ideas of God confound each other; they assign to him attributes which cannot be those of the infinite. Man puts God in his own image; the best man, whose conception is less faulty, makes the best God. The pagans paint their gods black, their devils white. Christians do precisely the reverse—make their God white. Men change their conception of the personality of God until they describe him as the supreme intelligence. Reason is an element of intelligence, yet God cannot reason, for thereby is implied reaching a conclusion; but the infinite knew already. In like manner, God cannot have imagination, hope, benevolence, for these all belong to the finite.

For the creation we substitute evolution; and for miracles, natural laws. We see no supernatural intervention now; no evidences of any in the past. We do not believe in total depravity; but we hold to the scientific fact that we are born with good and bad tendencies. As the race of man advances, the bad tendencies transmitted from the past grow weaker, and the good tendencies increase in strength and power. We do not believe that man has fallen from a high estate—is the degenerate son of an illustrious ancestry; on the contrary, we believe that man has risen and is rising from a lower to a higher condition. For worship of an unseen being Liberalism would substitute efforts to make ourselves and race truer, nobler, and better. We need all our efforts. For prayer we substitute self-reliance and confidence in the uniformity of nature's operations. The churches we would have converted into temples of science and learning. For theology—"the art of learning," as Lord Brougham says, "what nobody knows anything about"—we would substitute anthropology—the science of man. The clergy we would have become teachers of knowledge, not the representatives of an incomprehensible faith. Instead of laying stress on preparing to die, we say, Learn to live. The best possible preparation for death is a faithful performance of the duties of life. For the foolish notion of a hell we would substitute a knowledge of the penalties of nature, which punishes in exact proportion to the enormity of the offense, and without the circumlocution of a court trial.

Liberalism does not believe in baptism as a rite, but holds to bathing as a practice. We have no faith in the spiritual efficacy of water, but, hydropathically considered, we acknowledge its excellence. For the fables of the Bible we give the wondrous works of science. We would read the Bible as we would read any other history, and, judging it by the common laws of historical criticism, accept the natural and reasonable, and reject the miraculous and irrational. We do not profess to love God, for we can know nothing of him scientifically or rationally; but we love our families and friends, and our race. Instead of holding up to men a local heaven, we teach that we should strive to make the world a heaven. We have all that we can attend to here—"one world at a time." If we do our duty here, we will not have much time to dream about a heaven beyond the stars.

Now, my friends, I have set before you both sides of the question honestly, and as clearly as the time would allow; and my doctrine is this: "Free thought will give us truth; free labor will give us wealth. What we need is intelligence, liberty, love, and justice. And I cannot think of any place that would be so happy as this, if we all felt this way. Think of a little family, a happy republic, of free men, free women, and sweet, free children. What a republic! Think of it. And think of growing old together, and liking each other better all the time, and getting old; and, when old age comes, and you start down into the valley of the shadow, to hear, perhaps, the prattle of the grandchildren, while the birds of joy and love sing once more in the leafless branches of the tree of age. I can think of no better, no grander way to leave this world than accompanied by those that you have loved and those that love you. I know not what discoveries, what inventions, what thoughts may leap from the brain of the world. I know not what garlands of glory may be woven by the years to come. I cannot dream of the victories to be won upon the fields of thought; but I do know that, coming from the infinite sea of the future, there will never touch this 'bank and shoal of time' a richer gift, a rarer blessing, than liberty for man, woman, and child."

THE amount consumed by different countries of some one or other of certain industrial products has occasionally been regarded as an indication of the degree of civilization to which the various nationalities have attained. If the quantity of paper used be taken as determining the advancement of a people, citizens of this country stand high indeed. From the catalogue of the German Paper Exhibition, which opened recently in Berlin, it appears that for each of the 39,000,000 inhabitants of the United States there are 30.8 pounds required annually; for each of the 43,000,000 of Germany, 13.2 pounds; for each of the 33,000,000 of England, 11 pounds; for each of the 37,000,000 of France, 7.92; for each of the 36,000,000 of Austria-Hungary, 5.5 pounds; for each of the 78,000,000 of Russia, 1.98 pounds; for each of the 28,000,000 of Italy, 3.08 pounds; for each of the 6,000,000 of Scandinavia, 1.1 pounds; for each of the 5,500,000 of Belgium, 11.22 pounds, and for each of the 2,500,000 of Switzerland, 13.86 pounds. Other statistics set forth that 600,000,000 people employ Chinese paper, 366,000,000 European paper, and 130,000,000 Arabian paper. Leaves, bark, and wood are still written upon by 24,000,000 of the human family, and 280,000,000 do not write upon anything. In this paper exhibition at Berlin, as well as in other similar industrial collections in Germany, the useful is kept strictly in view in preference to the merely ornamental.

BY W. S. BELL.

The last remedy that the Sick Woman of the West has taken is known as the "Comstock business." It consists in duplicity and fraud under an unconstitutional law. The frauds entice innocent persons to violate the law, and then secure their disgrace and punishment, and by the same methods fill their own pockets.

The recent outrage of incarcerating E. H. Heywood under a sentence of two years' hard labor and a fine of one hundred dollars is so grossly unjust that increased discussion of the rights of free speech and free press must react powerfully against Comstockism and the Young Men's Jesuit Association.

Freethought is certainly positive in its aim and effort to establish the authority of reason. Mankind have for ages blindly trusted to faith—faith in the old, old stories, faith in myths, mysteries, miracles, and ghosts—but now they are beginning to see the necessity of trusting to common sense, experience, and evidence. It is obvious to all that the only way by which man may escape from his errors and ignorance is by proving them by the tests of experience, observation, and verification.

The modern phase of Freethought is equally positive in its efforts to secure for mankind the largest degree of civil, religious, and personal liberty. Does the Freethinker ask anything for himself that he will not grant to others? No. Do Christians claim for themselves rights which they will not grant to others? Certainly they do.

1. They deny freedom of speech.
2. They deny freedom of the press.
3. They deny the equal political rights of citizens.

That is, this is a Christian government, and should be governed by Christian laws. They deny equal political rights in their enactment of Sunday laws, in taxing all citizens for sectarian schools, in taxing all for Church property, in imposing fast days and thanksgiving days, in employing chaplains in Congressional houses.

With the history of man's subjection before his mind, it seems almost incredible that any one could say of the Liberal cause that it is only destructive, and not constructive. The past looms up before us with mountainous evils which man has suffered from bad governments and bad religions. He has been kept in bondage to kings and priests; his mind has been fettered in narrow creeds; his spirit has been hardened into heartless sectarianism, and he has been persecuted and tortured in a thousand different ways whenever he has tried to escape from his thralldom. Is it merely negative, let me ask, to help the downtrodden to get upon his feet? Is it only negative to inspire him with the nobler impulses of manhood? Is the love of truth negative? Is the spirit of equality, fraternity, and liberty negative? Is the suppression of war, the elevation of woman, and of the working classes, and the general diffusion of knowledge, negative? Is it nothing to break the chains of the captive, to open the eyes of the blind, to give health to the sick and knowledge to the ignorant? If these things are all negations, we would like to see something positive, something constructive.

A church edifice built of brick and mortar is a positive institution; so also is a graveyard. Both are sepulchers—the one of the body and the other of the mind.

But then there is no pleasure or comfort in the Infidel's hope, while "our religion gives us comfort." It is strange but true that Christians have a precious hope, namely, that God will send one to heaven and ten to hell, all for his own glory. If the Christian was deprived of his church, he would have no joy, for he would have no pulpit in which to preach the doctrine of damnation for the people's comfort.

"What will you give us in place of the Bible?" We do not wish to take away the Bible, but only ask you to read it as you read other books, retaining all that is good, casting aside the false and worthless.

"What will you give us in place of Christian morality?" There are no two kinds of morality; there is but one morality, and that is natural and rational morality. Christianity is exclusive; nature is inclusive. Natural or rational morality has no place for the sentiment of fear of an angry God. It is too just to admit of an atonement which punishes the innocent and permits the guilty to escape. It has no room for death-bed repentances to wipe out a life of crime. It cherishes no spirit of brotherly love—that is, where one bigot loves, or pretends to love, another; but it fosters the sentiment of universal brotherhood. In the development of natural morality there is no patent on truth, such as the creeds seem to have upon it. Every creed shouts, "See me! I am the truth and the way; come and go with me and you will be saved; but if you go with those other pretended Christians you are as good as damned already."

Is Preventing Conception a Crime?

Our religious teachers, our law-makers, and, I suppose, the majority of the people, consider it a crime to prevent conception. Hence the Government hires Anthony Comstock to prevent people from preventing conception.

Now, I suppose it should be admitted as a general principle that no crime can be committed without some person (or at least some animal) being injured. If, therefore, preventing conception is a crime, we have a right to inquire who is injured by it. Is it the woman? If so, she injures herself. I believe it is not within the scope of the law to prevent people from injuring themselves. Mrs. Comstock may be injuring herself in a great many different ways. She may wear tight shoes or corsets; she may paint; she may use tea, or even tobacco, to excess; or she may sleep in a badly ventilated room. Anthony may also injure himself in as many ways as his wife. He may drink too much bad whiskey; he may indulge in sexual excesses; he may masturbate; or he may even drown himself if he pleases. There is no law to prevent either him or his wife from injuring themselves in any of the above ways; and should Anthony drown himself, the people of this country (excepting a few religious fanatics) would not even shed a tear over his grave, much less hire a man at a large salary to prevent him from doing it. Why, then, should we be so careful of the health of those women who are so foolish as to injure themselves by taking means to prevent conception? Is this not a free country? Is it any of Anthony Comstock's business what means any woman (his own wife excepted) takes to regulate the size of her family? Has a woman not a perfect right to decide between the two evils—more children than she can support or preventing of conception—which of them she thinks the lesser? Would it not be well for this country if thousands of women (Anthony's mother among the rest) had decided in favor of a smaller family? It is estimated that there are about two millions of people in these United States crying for bread—two millions of people destitute of means and without a thing to do! Is it a crime to prevent the increase of such people? If Anthony were so situated, would he be mean enough to multiply his misery? Perhaps he would; he is mean enough for anything. But the thought of such a thing must cause any right-thinking man or woman to pause.

But it is held by some that it is a crime to prevent conception because it deprives what might be a human being of an existence, and this, I believe, is the strongest argument. But if it is a crime to prevent conception in this sense, then it is as much a crime to prevent it in one way as in another; and this would make celibacy the greatest of crimes, as it is the most certain means known of preventing conception. Jesus Christ is supposed to have lived a sinless life: but if this doctrine is true, he was one of the greatest of sinners, as he is believed to have lived a life of celibacy. The Roman Catholic priests are also, all of them, guilty of this crime; and Anthony should have them all lodged in jails immediately. Had these priests done their duty like men, how many thousand conceptions would have taken place in consequence! How many human beings would have been blessed (?) with life that have not! Thousands of immortal souls have been lost to heaven in consequence of their dereliction of duty; and millions have escaped hell in the same manner. How these poor souls that never had an existence are to be pitied! It is enough to make a crocodile (or even Anthony Comstock) shed tears. Life is such a blessing that any one who never had it is to be pitied so much! People in hell, even, are to be envied in comparison with those poor wretches who never had an existence. It is to be hoped that Anthony is doing all he can for these unfortunate creatures. How fortunate it was for Origen, the distinguished Father and orator of the Church, that Anthony did not live in his days! He took very decided and certain means to prevent conception. Had Anthony's father taken such means in time, this country would not be cursed with the meanest specimen of humanity that ever disgraced its history; and I would suggest that the Government shall be petitioned to take most effective measures to prevent the propagation of any more such miserable stock.

The Watkins Arrests.

The following unfriendly remarks are from the Seymour Weekly Times, and we are sorry to say that for untruthfulness and unfriendliness of spirit we have not seen anything from our enemies that surpasses them:

LET THIS THING STOP.

We are astounded to learn that D. M. Bennett, W. S. Bell, and Josephine S. Tilton were engaged in vending the interdicted pamphlet of E. H. Heywood at the Watkins Convention. The book is of no earthly use to humanity. There is no great harm in it, as we have said before, but there is no good in it—nothing useful—nothing practically beneficial. It is badly put together. The sentences are not clear, but obscure and complex, and the mind is constantly on the rack to find the meaning, unless in places where all decency of expression is abandoned. The book is one that you couldn't read aloud to ladies and children, and we want all such books piled up and burnt in a fire. It is as vulgar and beastly as the Holy Bible, and the man whose depraved taste can enjoy it ought to join the nearest Bible class. Of course, all the above-named parties were arrested, as they knew they would be, and, no doubt, wanted to be. And then the cry is raised for a "defense fund!" It is known that Freethinkers, the independent men who will violate no law themselves, but who sympathize with the oppressed, will shell out their money to defend sickly sentimentalists and monomaniacs from pure goodness. But it may as well be understood at once that the genuine, manly, open-hearted, honest Freethinkers of the country are not to be inveigled into a defense of indecent, immoral, and low down vulgar publications. Our business is to make men and women truer, purer, and happier. We are willing that any prurient idiot may print his thoughts if he can express them in decent language. If he can't, the jail is the best place for him. And conceding that the right to publish must remain inviolate, we don't yet concede the necessity of Rationalists, as a class, jumping in to defend publications that, besides being indecent, are of no earthly use to anybody. There certainly can't be so much profit in the Heywood pamphlet as to make that the object of sale. The book cannot promote the Liberal cause. It cannot benefit humanity. It points out some abuses in the social system, and hints at cures that are a million times worse than the diseases. A true Materialist will set his head like flint against all so-called reforms that strike at the integrity of the family circle. The promotion of good; the promotion of peace and harmony, and love and happiness, and not of strife and discord, and violence, is the mission of the humane and rational philanthropist and philosopher. We cannot afford to champion any publication of doubtful morality and of no obvious utility to our race. This willful violation of law, though the law is conceded to be faulty, and though it has been construed by saintly bigots to include publications that lack "reverence" for their gods and ghosts, and saints and virgins, can have no motive but that of money-making out of the sympathies of the Freethinking, oppression-hating people throughout the land. This begging smacks too much of the everlasting church begging that has disgusted a world. We have small sympathy for the willful violator of law, unless the violation be for the destruction of some bloody monster who has himself violated law, and can avoid its penalty—such a criminal as Anthony Comstock, for instance.

We are sorry that Dr. Monroe should have deemed it necessary to spit out so much bile blended with untruthfulness as is here evinced. We have regarded him as a fair man and a good Liberal, but strong evidence is here presented that we ought to revise our opinion.

Bro. Bell has, on page 603, answered the unfriendly editor so thoroughly that it is unnecessary that we should say much, but we trust a few paragraphs will not be amiss.

With the doctor's avowed purpose to "make men and women truer, purer, and happier," he has been untrue enough to misrepresent E. H. Heywood, his mental caliber, his pamphlet, ourselves, and our motives. He certainly has a singular way of making the world truer. We know Mr. Heywood well, and regard him as a man of ability, culture, earnestness, and honesty. He is a graduate of Brown University, which stands prominent among the educational institutions of New England. He certainly is no idiot nor fool, and even if he was, it would not be right to send him to prison for it. We have scarcely read "Cupid's Yokes," but we know it contains Mr. Heywood's convictions upon the evils that unfortunately exist largely in all parts of our land, and upon the vital question of sexual relations. He has pointed out the wrongs and suggested the remedies. His remedies may be unsound or ill-advised, but he certainly had the right to make suggestions, and it is one of the greatest outrages of modern times that he is now suffering imprisonment at hard labor for giving his honest views. We learn that nearly twenty thousand copies of the book have been sold, and no case where a person has been injured by it has been reported. The Doctor himself says there is no great harm in it; then, in the name of common sense, why make such a fuss about it?

The enormity of selling those pamphlets at Watkins may be thus truthfully stated: We took a stock of our publications there to sell. We had a rough table constructed on which to exhibit them. Several others had books and papers there to sell or to give away—among them J. P. Mendum, J. M. Peebles, G. B. Stebbins, Elder Evans, the Index Association, G. L. Henderson, and Josephine S. Tilton. We were early on the ground, and had our books out first. After the arrival of Mr. Mendum and Miss Tilton an additional table was prepared for them, and placed contiguous to ours. Miss Tilton went there with some eight or ten of her brother-in-law, E. H. Heywood's publications, and an assortment of photographs, which she offered for sale for the benefit of Mr. Heywood's wife and children, who, we are sorry to say, are in a state of need of the comforts of life. In the name of reason and Liberalism, was there anything unlawful or culpable in that? Certainly not. The young lady is to be commended for the effort she made instead of being condemned and misrepresented.

Perhaps, had Dr. Monroe been there, he would not have had the gallantry, when the lady was absent at dinner, to have sold a pamphlet or a photograph for her if the same were asked for; but not so with Mr. Bell and ourselves. We did, in a few instances, make sales for her, but made not a cent of profit. Possibly we sold a copy or copies of "Cupid's Yokes," for they were on her table; but we broke no law in doing so. There is no law forbidding the sale of "Cupid's Yokes." Any person in the land, from the highest to the lowest, has a perfect right to sell them. They are not obscene; and any person who says they are utters a falsehood. Thousands of sensible people who have read the book stand ready to testify that it is not obscene.

When, by the bigotry and intolerance of the Church, Heywood was arrested, convicted, and sentenced to prison for circulating that pamphlet, it was one of the most aggravated outrages ever perpetrated against an American citizen, and the bigotry, enmity, and anger shown by Judge Clark, who presided at the trial, was a disgrace to the courts of our country. But Dr. Monroe approves of it, and thinks the prison is the proper place for Heywood. The arrest of Mr. Bell, Mr. Mosher, Miss Tilton, and ourselves for selling that pamphlet was a most petty, mean, contemptible Christian act, but Dr. Monroe seems to approve of it, and to blame us.

We hope he will not be seriously disturbed by the appeal of the Defense Committee. We think we can say that it is not desired that he should contribute one cent. It is not desired that any should contribute who do not feel that the fight is not a personal one, but an attack by the forces of bigotry and intolerance, on the one hand, against the rights of American citizens on the other. The donations of such as feel able and willing to help defend the principles of right and justice thus attacked will be gratefully acknowledged. The doctor's flings about the "cry raised for a defense fund" are unkind and uncalled for.

His charges or insinuations that we "expected to be arrested," or "wanted to be," are untruthful and unjust. Not one of the four had the least expectation of being arrested, or the least desire to be. There is certainly nothing enviable in being arrested for selling obscene publications and having the charge telegraphed and published all over the land. It is certainly not anything that we wished. When the officer told us that he had a warrant for our arrest it was an entire surprise and we could not imagine what it was for, and concluded it was possibly for selling without a license, as many corporations in the county have ordinances forbidding selling without a license. Despite Dr. Monroe's opinion we had not, we repeat, the slightest expectation or wish to be arrested on a charge of obscenity. If he covets it we will willingly transfer the whole thing to his shoulders. It was not agreeable to be detained at Watkins four and a half days after our friends had left, awaiting the action of Judge Hurd and the Grand Jury. It was not pleasant to have to give bail. It is not pleasant to be compelled to leave our business and dance attendance to a Schuyler County court in December, with the chance of going to prison as Heywood did. The Doctor may safely revise his opinion as to our expectation or desire of arrest. He can speak for himself but not for us. Our desire is to be allowed to quietly pursue our business of publishing radical and scientific books, pamphlets and papers and to furnish them to the Liberals of America at such a slight advance above cost as will enable us to live and successfully prosecute the business. If the doctor imagines us a monomaniac or a sickly sentamentalist or thinks we wish to deal in obscenity or to obtain money from the Liberals of the country in a dishonorable or unfair manner, we think he is mistaken. When we can no longer pursue an honorable, moral, and strictly legitimate business we hope to cease to live.

It looks as though the doctor is attempting the respectable, cultured dodge, and he is about the last man that would be expected to become ultra respectable. His paper has not enjoyed the reputation of being extremely polished or fastidious. There are many persons who, after reading his paper, would not hesitate to regard it as of "doubtful morality" and of little obvious utility to the race and would even think that "the jail is the best place for him," and that his papers should be "piled up and burnt in the fire." If he condemns Mr. Heywood's writings to this fate he must not complain if others condemn his to the same. There are men of ability who would equally condemn both to be punished by the utmost severity of the law. There are doubtless quite as many people who would condemn his sheet and pronounce it indecent and immoral as would condemn Heywood's pamphlet. It hardly becomes a man as radical and denunciatory as the editor of the Seymour Times professes to be, to so sweepingly condemn the utterances of others to the flames and their persons to prison. There are certainly good grounds for thinking that, notwithstanding his professed Liberalism, he still cherishes the spirit of bigotry and intolerance near his heart.

If Dr. J. R. Monroe is allowed freedom in speaking out his heresy it is extremely unfair and illogical in him to try to prevent E. H. Heywood from exercising the same liberty, calling him a prurient idiot, a willful violator of the law, etc., and asserting that the prison is the best place for him.

The Index, despite of its high-toned culture and ultra respectability, talks far more sensibly of the Watkins arrests than does the Times. It speaks as follows: "The arrest of several persons at Watkins for retailing Mr. Heywood's pamphlet is a repetition of the wrong committed in his imprisonment. Poor in substance and style as the pamphlet is, it cannot be suppressed without violating freedom of discussion; and no greater folly could be committed than that of giving factitious importance to a work of this character by attempting to suppress it. Nothing remains but to insist that thought and discussion shall be free, and to vindicate the general rights trampled upon in the persons of these arrested parties." If the Seymour Times can manage to relieve The Index of the charge of the morals of the Liberals of America and become the organ for reproving those who show the least disposition to lean towards broadness of thought and to hold up the banner of cultured respectability, many will rejoice perhaps in the new censor-general.

In this connection it may be well to allude to the action of Judge Clifford, of the U. S. Court who sentenced Mr. Heywood. The Boston papers inform us that he has been reading Heywood's pamphlet and studying up the law under which the sentence was passed. He condemns the law as being loose and inexplicit, not even defining what the crime of obscenity is, for which fine and imprisonment are imposed; he thinks the men who passed such a law are unfit for legislators. He has received new light upon the subject and has so come to regard "Cupid's Yokes" as not obscene that he has signed a petition to the President asking for the pardon of Mr. Heywood. Dr. J. R. Monroe had better attend to Judge Clifford and read him a lecture for his tendency to immorality. If the doctor is to fill the position of inspector of morals he must not be remiss in his duty.

Judge Clifford.

The Boston papers bring us the information that Judge Clifford, of the United States Supreme Court in that city—the judge who sentenced Ezra H. Heywood to two years' imprisonment at hard labor for sending a copy of "Cupid's Yokes" through the mail—has recently been looking further into the matter, and has considerably modified his opinions concerning the law upon the subject, as well as upon the nature of the work upon which Mr. Heywood was convicted, and this to the extent that he has signed a petition to the President asking for Mr. Heywood's pardon.

This is a virtual confession on the part of the Judge that the conviction and sentence of Heywood were all wrong; that he was not guilty of publishing and circulating obscene matter; and that "Cupid's Yokes" is not now regarded as obscene.

How unfortunate it is for Mr. Heywood that this fact could not have been learned by Judge Clifford, and the still more bigoted and unfair Judge Clarke, before he was sentenced! How cruel that a well-meaning, amiable man should be deprived of his liberty, torn from his wife and little children, and doomed to a prison with felons because of the bigotry and tyranny of two judges, whose salaries are paid by the people's money, for committing no crime at all! Is this what is called "Free America"?

This was one of the pet jobs of that favorite of the Young Men's Christian Association, and Agent and Secretary for the Society for the Suppression of Vice. He it was, backed by the Christian institutions, who got the odious laws passed, both by Congress and our State Legislature, by which it was possible to persecute, prosecute, and imprison such men as Heywood, and the same officious agent was trying to carry out the instructions of Mr. Colgate, the President of the Society for the Suppression of Vice, to suppress and stamp out the publications of Freelovers and Freethinkers. According to the tactics of these saintly tyrants, the opinions and convictions of no man ought to be respected unless he belongs to the orthodox church, or at least acknowledges the rightful supremacy of that holy (?) religion.

By private means we learn that Judge Clifford, in a note to a friend of ours, acknowledged that he now not only regarded Mr. Heywood's pamphlet as not obscene, but considered that the law under which it was judged a felony to send it through the mail, to wit: the Comstock Postal Law, was very imperfect and inexplicit, inasmuch as it does not define what the crime of obscenity is, but leaves it to biased and bigoted judges and juries to decide. He intimated, too, that legislators who could frame laws no better than that were unfit for the business, and had better return home until they could learn better.

How grossly wrong it is to the people of this land that their servants, the law-makers, should enact such needless and defective laws whose nearly only use has been to annoy, oppress, and ruin worthy and well-disposed people, and that judges, paid munificently from the public funds, should lend their influence, and even employ their power, to thrust hapless and guiltless persons into an ignominious prison! Can this, in truth, be called "the land of the free and the home of the brave"? Are loyal, upright American citizens thus to be continued to be sent to prison as degraded felons for simply exercising the rights which the Constitution confers upon them? Is this the state of things which our revolutionary fathers fought for, bled for, and many of whom laid down their lives for, and which the survivors so earnestly and honestly established as the charter of our country? No! no! this was not the work of our venerated fathers who gave their blood and their lives for the boon of American liberty, but it is the machinations of recreant sons who have, by vile means, obtained power, and by undue influence conferred by sectarianism, bigotry, and intolerance, and who have sought to construct an engine by which the Church can oppress and imprison every body who has the independence to raise his voice in opposition to the tyranny set up by the same culpable Church rule.

More prominent than all others in bringing about this miserable state of things, and one who has done more to crush the spirit and essence of American liberty than any other man in the country, is Anthony Comstock, the approved agent of "the Society for the Suppression of Vice," who has resorted to all sorts of hypocritical and despicable means to entice, entrap, and seduce his unwary victims to the commission of what his laws construe to be a crime, and then to exercise his malice and hate to disgrace them and their families, to despoil them of their hard-earned property, and then to throw them into prison for years, and all this in the name of morality and religion. Was ever a greater outrage committed in this land? Has the country produced a worse character? And yet there are men in this country, claiming to be Liberals and to be in favor of liberty, who defend this churchly rule, and seem to think those are immoral and indecent who have the independence to rebel against such tyranny, but they are unworthy the name of Liberals. They are in the wrong place, and should at once seek to make a change of base.

The attention of Judge Hurd and his near friend, the Rev. Mr. Waldo, is called to the change in the opinion of Judge Clifford, who is vastly their superior. A little time and investigation has served to open his eyes upon this important subject of human rights and American liberty, and he has had the honesty to admit that he has changed his mind. If they are not too much governed by the spirit of bigotry to change from a wrong position, it is to be hoped they will live long enough and become intelligent enough to call things by their right names; to not call a pamphlet obscene which has not an obscene word in it; to not work to disgrace and dishonor persons who never did a thing to injure them, nor to throw into prison those who have no wish to commit a wrong or unjust act towards any person living. It is earnestly hoped that they will pattern after the good example of Judge Clifford and learn to become reasonable and just men.

Unjust Interference.

As Josephine S. Tilton was quietly pursuing her business in this city, selling her brother-in-law's pamphlets, trying honestly to make a living for herself, and, if possible, for her sister's little children, she rather unexpectedly met with a no less personage than the Agent of the Society for the Suppression of Vice, and one of the potent lawgivers of the country, Anthony Comstock. He peered at her stock of pamphlets and asked her if she was selling "Cupid's Yokes." She replied that she had none with her. He told her that she must not attempt to sell any of "Cupid's Yokes," for if she did he would certainly arrest her. She did not tell him whether she would sell or not.

Here is a specimen of the liberty that the citizens of America are enjoying to-day, under the Christian rule which dominates the country. This walking consolidation of impurity, who but a little while ago took five other men with him—a part of them members of his delectable society—and visited a house of prostitution on Greene street, where, by persuasion and the offer of money, he induced three frail, unfortunate girls, who make their bread by the prostitution of their bodies, to divest themselves of all their clothing and exhibit themselves in a state of complete nudity before those six sensual men, Anthony at the head. After they had feasted their eyes to the full, he roughly arrested them and ordered them to march off to the station house, without hardly giving them time to put on their dresses again. This is the man who, by the influence of the Young Men's Christian Association, caused a most miserable set of unconstitutional laws to be entered upon the statute books of both the state and the nation, under which laws for five years he has been laying traps to decoy unsuspecting persons into the commission of such offenses as under his laws he pleases to denominate crimes, when he brings his laws upon them, and, if possible, throws them into prison and fines them as heavily as may be—a part of which fines goes into his own pocket. This is the beautiful specimen of a Christian which some of our pious friends are in the habit of regarding as almost a saint, who ordered our little friend Miss Tilton, under threat of arrest and imprisonment, to not dare to sell a copy of "Cupid's Yokes."

What right has this man to order any American what they shall sell or what they shall not sell? By what process has he become clothed with absolute power to say to this person, "do this," and to that person, "do that"? Is it the ultimate of American liberty that Anthony Comstock is not only the law-maker of the country, but the dictator to persons vastly better than himself, what they may venture to do and what they may not? Has it become the duty of even the humblest individual in this wide land to cringe before this despot and take his word as law? He would be equally as much opposed to the sale of the works of Paine, Voltaire, Volney, D'Holbach, Taylor, and others, dared he to do so. He has, on different occasions, forbid persons of our acquaintance to sell Paine's works and Ingersoll's lectures under threat of imprisonment if they disregarded his orders.

He has succeeded in thrusting Ezra H. Heywood into prison for sending a single copy of "Cupid's Yokes" through the mails, and he has issued his ukase that no person shall sell the pamphlet which he has condemned. He said to Josephine that no person should be allowed to sell it. But we profess to be a free American. We have done far more to build up this Government than has Anthony Comstock. We have paid thousands of dollars as revenue into the treasury of the United States, while we do not believe he has ever paid fifty. We have been a contributor to the Government, while he has been a leech. Shall he be our law-giver? Shall he be our ruler and dictator? Not very much. He says we shall not sell "Cupid's Yokes" because he has condemned it to be obscene. We say it is not obscene. We declare that we have a perfect right to sell it, as has every person in the country. We shall continue to maintain the right to sell it to whomsoever we please, and we never expect to be under the necessity of asking Anthony Comstock what we may do and what we may not. We shall be the judge of our own conduct, and shall endeavor to do as much good to our fellow-beings as possible and as little harm. But if we thought we had wronged other people as much as we know this Christian agent has done, and if we believed there is a just God somewhere above the clouds who will ultimately bring us to justice and make us atone by suffering and penance for the great injury we had done our fellow-beings, we would expect eternity would not be long enough to have meted out to us all the punishment that would be justly due us. As bad as our Christian friends believe us to be, we would to-day a thousand times rather stand in our own shoes and answer for all the wrongs we have done than to take upon us the load of guilt and wrong that rests upon the head of Anthony Comstock. The greatest sinner that lives is he who destroys the peace and happiness of his fellow-beings. We know of no one who has done more of this kind of business than the agent of the Society for the Suppression of Vice, of which society Samuel Colgate is president.

Josephine will, of course, act as she sees fit as regards selling "Cupid's Yokes," but, as for ourselves, we insist that we have a perfect right to sell it, and shall continue to do so. If we go to prison for it, we shall proclaim to the world that we are stricken down for exercising the rights of an American citizen.

A Comstock Victim.

We have received the following note from E. C. Abbey, M. D.:

BUFFALO, Sept. 10, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: The United States District Court convened here to-day, and a nolle prosequi was entered in my case. I was convicted by an ignorant jury, my body produced in court to receive sentence, and after two and a half years' litigation resulting as above.

Very truly yours, E. C. ABBEY, M. D.

The wrongs that have been done this gentlemen are great. He is an educated graduate of one of our medical colleges, and was a successful practitioner for more than a sixth of a century. Some three or four years ago he wrote and published a valuable medical and physiological work in which he ably treated the diseases and derangements of the sexual system. When ready to publish, he placed the manuscript in the hands of the United States District Attorney, who pronounced it legal and not in conflict with the law. After its publication he submitted it to the best legal talent, who pronounced it all right from a legal point of view, and one whose circulation would be calculated to do a great amount of good. He had not the least desire to issue an immoral book, and took every precaution to go safely in the matter.

But Anthony Comstock placed his eyes upon it, and he decided at once that as the work treated of sexual physiology, it must not be allowed to go through the mail. Decoy letters were employed, a copy of the work, in response to one of Anthony's orders, was deposited in the mail, and Dr. Abbey was soon under arrest. When the day of trial came, an ignorant jury, who thought that any work which represented the pelvic regions of male or female must necessarily be obscene, and to be discharged late on Saturday evening, found the doctor guilty; but some kind of "stay of proceedings" was obtained, and the case was not settled till as above stated, when the doctor was honorably discharged; but the defense of the case and the loss that has accrued have cost him many thousands of dollars, and the rights of a worthy citizen have been greatly outraged.

It is fearful to contemplate the personal injury which Comstock has been able to inflict upon his victims; but because he operates in the name of religion, and is backed by the Christian Church, he seems to be allowed to do about as he pleases, and to oppress and ruin any one whom he decides to attack. He has effected deep and lasting injury upon hundreds of people who, in point of real morality and excellence of character, are far above himself, besides driving a score or more of people absolutely out of the world.

It seems to be his delight to work for orthodoxy, whether in theology or medicine. He works nearly as eagerly for one as the other. If a medical gentleman publishes a work which is calculated to impart physiological knowledge to the people, he feels impelled to prevent it by arresting the author or dealer. This he has done in numerous cases. In fact, he has declared that no work on physiology shall pass through the mails. But it is possibly still an open question whether Anthony Comstock owns this country and the people in it, or whether they still have a few rights which they possess independent of his dictum and will.

W. S. Bell.

This brother is ready and willing to commence the fall and winter campaign in the cause of unpopular truth and human progress. It is to be hoped that our Liberal friends, especially in the Western States, who may realize the importance of having good courses of radical lectures delivered before their societies during the ensuing fall and winter, will confer with Bro. Bell upon the subject, that he may be able to fix upon the route and arrange the places he will visit during his tour. With the exception of the time necessary to attend his trial at Watkins in December, he feels willing to devote his time and ability in showing to his fellow-beings what he honestly conceives to be the better way—better than believing in mythological fables three thousand years old, and bowing in blind subservience to the rule of priestcraft which has so long darkened and debased the mind of man. We ask our friends to keep Bro. Bell well occupied. His address is New Bedford, Mass.

Declaration of Rights.

A CASE FOR THE COURTS.

To the Editor of The Transcript: Quoting from my remarks in Faneuil Hall, as reported in full in the Globe of yesterday, you kindly commend my motives, but condemn my logic. Bad logic is dangerous. It brings men to beggary and nations to the dust. Yours seems to assume that courts never make mistakes, and, therefore, the Comstock law is constitutional and "Cupid's Yokes" an obscene book. Let that be true, and what follows? By chapter 165, section 15, of the General Statutes, the possession of an obscene book is an offense, punishable by imprisonment and fine. I possess "Cupid's Yokes," and mean to do so, whatever the courts have decided or other people think. If the District Attorney of Middlesex, knowing all these facts, does not prosecute me as soon as possible, he will violate his oath of office. Will you show your readers where the flaw is in this logic and oblige,

Medford, Mass., Aug. 3, 1878. ELIZUR WRIGHT.

We, the undersigned, free and independent citizens of the United States, recognize the above words of the Hon. Elizur Wright as the utterance of a brave, honest, and independent American. They were published more than a month ago, and he still has his liberty. It is to be inferred that the District Attorney of Middlesex does not regard "Cupid's Yokes" as an obscene book; otherwise he is derelict in the performance of his duty. We wish also to place our names on record that we do not regard "Cupid's Yokes" as an obscene publication. Many of us have read it, have it in our possession, and propose to so retain it so long as we choose. While we do not indorse every sentence in it, and think some portions of it are in bad taste, we regard it as the expression of an honest, earnest man, who had a legal and undoubted right to so express himself, and that every American possesses the right to read it, to own it, to buy and to sell it, to exhibit it, and to send it from point to point by any public mode of conveyance.

We furthermore recognize the attempt on the part of any one to deprive us of the right to own, buy, sell, or transport this or other similar books, including works on medicine, hygiene, physiology, sociology, social ethics, relations of the sexes, etc., as subversive of the very highest principles of American liberty; and while we are opposed to obscene and vile literature, that really is so, we hereby pledge ourselves to forever uphold freedom of thought, freedom of speech, freedom of the press, and freedom of the mails. These are the fundamental principles of American liberty, the birthright of every American citizen, and we never wish to see them infringed or subverted. To maintain and perpetuate these rights "we pledge our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor."

Trial Subscribers.

We wish to again call the attention of our readers and of everybody else to the very liberal offers we are now making to trial subscribers. We will send THE TRUTH SEEKER three months, or from this date till the 1st of January, 1879, with a copy of Hurst's Pocket American Pronouncing Dictionary, containing over thirty thousand words, for the small sum of sixty cents. The Dictionary is worth the money, and so THE TRUTH SEEKER will be free. We wish ten thousand trial subscribers upon this basis. We hope every friend of the paper will feel interest enough in the cause to help produce this result.

Between our printers and ourselves an error occurred in our statement as to the number of words. A larger number was inadvertantly stated than exists in the language. Thirty thousand is as many as are contained in Webster's $1.50 Dictionary, and with two hundred illustrations, makes a valuable pocket companion.

Those who prefer a copy of that great work, Thomas Pain's "Age of Reason," can be accommodated. THE TRUTH SEEKER to the end of the year and the new Pocket Dictionary, or a copy of Paine's "Age of Reason" for 60 cents. Now let the ten thousand names be forthcoming. We are ready for them.

WE are progressing satisfactorily with the Proceedings and Speeches of the Watkins Convention. It is going to make a fine and valuable volume. The orders that come in are duly entered, and we hope still more will come in. Every Liberal and Spiritualist should have a copy.

LADIES' long boots with a series of horizontal straps from the instep upwards are called "Jacob's Ladders."

INTOLERANCE AMONG CHRISTIANS.

ZION HILL, N. J.. Sept. 16, 1878.

MR. EDITUR: The first thing I want to tel you iz that thoze kopys ov "Kupid's Yokes" I sent for kum safe to hand, and we hav had a grate time in reeding it. I kood not se much in it, good or bad; at eny rate, not bad enuf to send a man to prizen for riting or selling. I am satisfide that thare iz a grate deel ov retchednes in the world groing out ov unhappy marrijes, and the wurst kind ov hel I hav yet met with haz arizen from a man and woman being forst to liv together hoo perfektly abhord each other. I have none them to kwarrel and fite til evrything lookt fairly blu around them and evrybody's life neer them waz made retched. That being the kase, it wood seem that almost eny sugjestion that kan be made, looking to an improovment in this state of things, iz in order; and if a man makes sum rekomendashuns that wife and I don't beleev in, it don't follo that the man aut to be sent to prizen like a felon for it. Wife sez it served him rite, and she hopes to heer that yu hav gon to prizen to. She thinks thoze Watkins Kristyans no what tha ar about, and while tha pretend it iz "Kupid's Yokes" tha ar after, it iz Freethinkers tha wish to katch, espeshally that wiked old fello, Bennett, hoo aut to be strung up to the first sour-apple-tre that iz met with. She insists that eny wun hoo trys to brake down the only good relijun the wurld haz got, and trys to set up a rule ov reezon in its plase, aut to be driven out ov the world without serymony or dela. If such men ar alowd to go on tauking up thare heresy and unbeleef, in a short time thare wil be no tru fathe in the wurld, and the blessed blud ov Jesus wil hav lost all effekt in saving the soles ov men. She sez the Presbyterian preecher, Mr. Waldo, and Juj Hurd ar rite in persekuting yu the wa tha do, and she hopes tha wil send yu to prizen whether yu sold "Kupid's Yokes" or not.

Wife iz a little intemperate in her remarks, and I tel her she haz zeel without nolej; that wunse it mite hav dun very wel to hang and burn and behed peepel for opinyun's sake and for not aknolejing the truth ov the gospel ov Jezus; but that it waz geting to far along in the aj ov the wurld for such kind ov biznes to be popular eny longer. I even took the opurtunity to sa to her that to much ov that kind ov amuzement waz karrid on a fu hundred yeerz ago for the kredit ov the Kristyan relijun. I konfest to her that it waz the most damajing blot upon the fare fase ov our blessed fathe that it had ben the direkt kauz ov sending hundreds ov thouzands and milyuns ov peepel to kruel and untimely deths, just bekauz tha kood not beleev az sumbody wanted them to. I aknolejd to her that, with all my fathe in and admirashun for the kauz ov Kriste, I kood not beleev that murdering, killing, and imprizning peepel for opinyun's sake waz rite. She anserd by kalling me haf wa an Infidel, and sed that by the time I had red the old TRUTH SEEKER a fu more munths I wood be kleen gon over the dam. I told her to rale awa, and that I hoped I had grase enuf to stand all she waz abel to sa. So wife and I go on time after time. She iz vary zelus in defending her relijun, and she hopes yu wil be sent to prizen. I try to defend reezon and kommon sense, and insist that yu hav dun nothing to be sent to prizen for. Suzan alwaze takes up on my side, and agenst her muther, when she iz prezent, and she even goze further than I do. The wa she denounses the bigots at Watkins wood do yu good kood yu heer her. She sez if tha do send yu to prizen for that littel affare that she wil hav her name taken off the church roll-book, and she wil sware that she never waz a Kristyan.

Lawyer Greenfeeld haz kalled on me twise within the past week. I se he iz vary much interested in yure arrest and the kondukt, espeshally, ov Juj Hurd. He reeds yure paper vary karefully, and he sed to me to-da that if it iz tru that Juj Hurd had used hiz pozishun to koerse the Grand Jury kontrary to thare own konvikshuns, and had allowed klergymen to go also before them to ade him in indusing them to akseed to hiz wishes, that he entirely overstepped the bounds ov propriety and had laid himself open to impeechment, and that if sum prominent sitizen wood move properly that he be impeeched, thare wood be no trubbul in akkomplishing it. He sed, moreover, that the inditement agenst yu, in vu ov the Juj's remarkabul kondukt, iz not wurth a sent, and that it kannot stand for a moment after it iz lookt into by enny abel mind. It iz interesting to heer him denounse the wrong kondukt ov that Skyler kounty juj, and he sez that such a korse iz kalkulated to bring more disgrase upon the kourts ov the kuntry and upon the kauze ov justise than ennything he haz hurd ov for a long time. He thinks, to, that if that juj imagins that he iz by that line ov kondukt going to promote the kauze ov sektarianizm, to which he seems to be so much attacht, he never made a grater mistake in hiz life. The result must be to bring odium not only upon the meens employd to akkomplish hiz wish, but also upon the bigoted influense that he seemd so willing to serve. He sez if he waz in praktis he wood like no eezier a task than to defeet that juj and his efforts.

Kaptin Smith tawked much in the same wa when he kalled heer last nite. He has got so now he kums over to se us evry Sundy nite, and az he kums before Suzan's bo, Sam, kums, it sutes very wel, for Suzan thinks a grate deel ov the Kaptin, and likes to heer him tawk. He waz partikularly seveer last nite on that preecher Waldo, hoo seemd so offishus in the hole proseedings, first in kauzing yure arrest, and in the next plase in sekuring yure inditment, and sees in it the same intolerant, persekuting spirit which aktuated the Christian church for 15 hundred yeers, which has draged milyuns ov unfortunate beings to prizen, konfined them in noisome and dizmal dunjens, subjekted them to torture on the rak, the wheel, the pullys, and hundreds ov other invenshuns ov kruelty which the ingenuity ov man haz ben taxt to devize and konstrukt; which haz made them to pas munths and yeers in the deepest mizery and pane; which haz draged milyuns to the stake, thare to be roasted in hot fires and slow fires, while thare life past out ov them in the most intense suffring and agony, and all at the instanse and kommand ov such men az Waldo, hoo hav pretended to be karrying out the wil ov the meek and lowly wun hoo, when upon erth, sed he had not whare to la hiz hed. Theze persekuting Kristyans hav ben the terror ov the wurld, and hav kauzd more unhappiness than all other ajensies and kurses that hav inflikted mankind. He regards that man Waldo az a fare reprezentative ov thoze murderus retches that hav hung, beheded, and burnt thare unfortunate fello beings for wel on to 2 thouzand yeers. He sez Waldo wood hav made a first-klas Torquemada, Philip the Sekond, Duke of Alva, John Kalvin, or Kotton Mather, and if he kood only hav had such bakkers and rulers az Juj Hurd haz shone himself so willing to bekum, he wood hav ben in hiz glory, and wood hav made hiz unfortunate bruthers and sisters in humanity grone in sorro and terror. It iz such men az he that hav kast the utmost odium upon the name ov Kristyanity and made it a byword among men and a stench in the nostrils ov just and good soles. If Waldo had the power which hiz bigotry kovets, the Kaptin feels shure that the stake, the beheding-blok, and the varius torturing invenshuns wood stil be in use even in our own kuntry, and, in all probability, yu and yure 3 fello-sufferers wood not hav got off with yure lives at Watkins, for the vary spirit which mooved him to kauz yure arrest for the trivial matter ov selling a kopy ov "Kupid's Yokes" wood, had he the power ekwal to his wil, not hav allowed yu to eskape. The intense hatred he feels towards Infidels and Freethinkers wood spur him on to take yure lives az freely az the same bigoted theolojikal kreed kauzed thouzands ov the tyrants and murderers hoo preseded him to akt in a similar manner.

The Kaptin sez he sees it klearly that the konflikt must kum between the forses ov errer and the powers of truth—theology and superstishun on the wun side and siense and truth on the uther. Tha ar in dedly antagonism, and the strife kannot be ended until wun or the uther proves the viktor. To hiz mind thare kannot be eny dout az to which will proov triumfant at last. It is rekorded in the book ov fate that the week and the false must go to the wall, while the strong and the tru must be the konkeror, never again to be subdued nor superseded. He sez this Watkins petty attempt to hold up the falling temple ov superstition will proov a kompleet faleure. Messrs. Waldo, Hurd & Ko. will be az unable to keep bak the lite ov siense and truth az tha wood be to keep our glorius old sun from rising in the morning. The peeple are kalling for the lite ov truth, which iz dawning upon the world, and all the preests hoo are making thare living in the form ov good salarys for keeping up the old fraud, and all the pandering and trukling jujes hoo ar willing to sell thare honor and independense to pleeze the preestly klass kannot keep the sun ov truth and nolej from shedding its lite over the erth.

The Kaptin went on in this wa for a long time, and with very much ov emfasis. I kannot remember all he sed, and I kood not repeet it if I wood. I am almost afrade that yu and yure reeders wil think I am loozing my fathe in the blessed Kristyan relijun by what I hav alreddy reported to yu ov the wurds ov others. But I beg yu to bare in mind that I am only telling you what others sa, and not what I think myself. It iz but justise to yu, az wel az to Mr. Greenfeeld and to Kaptin Smith, that I shood report them akurately. I hold myself fare and kandid enuf to do that, whether it agrees with my vuze or not. I wish it distinktly understood that my fathe in the blud ov the Lam ov Zion stil remanes stedfast, tho I must admit that when I heer Kaptin Smith poring out hiz ideas and konvikshuns, tha sound pritty reezonabul, and I kannot find good arguments to rebut them.

I waz glad when the Kaptin waz going on at such a rate that my wife waz not in the room; for if she had ben, I no the devil wood hav ben to pa in about 3 minits; but I ges if she had ben thare he wood hav ben a littel kareful ov her feelings, for I hav notised on 2 or 3 okkashuns that he waz sort ov kaushus in hiz remarks when she waz prezent, and he told me az much wunse when we ware by ourselvs. But he kannot tawk to plane or to strong to sute Suzan. She drinks in all he sez, and I kan se by her kountenanse and manners that it finds a responsiv eko in her mind.

I se, Mr. Editur, that yu ar offering yure paper 3 munths and a kopy ov Webster's Poket Dikshunary with 50,000 wurds all for 60 sents. I dont se how yu kan afford to do that, for that iz less than the prise ov the Dikshunary itself. I wil send for 6 kopys ov yure paper on thoze terms. Inklozed find postal order for $3.60, for which send THE TRUTH SEEKER from the prezent time til January 1879 to this offis to the six names I giv yu belo, and a kopy ov the Dikshunary also to eech wun. I think I wil send yu an order for six more next week. I want them to hav the Dikshunary and to reed my letters, hoping the same ma do them grate good, and I shal pra from da to da that yure blak Infidelity ma not do them eny harm. I stil hope yu ma yet in time be brot to the lite ov truth az it iz in Jezus.

Kaptin Smith and Suzan both want to be kindly remembered to yu. I askt wife if she wood not send yu her luv, and yu aut to hav seen her spit fire and fome at the mouth. Sed she: "I wood az soon send my luv to the Devil." That, yu se, iz the difference in fokes and the way we hav ov looking at things. Perhaps it iz a good thing that evrybody duz not take a noshun to the same person.

I beg yu at all events to reseev my kind regards.

Yures in Kriste, JOEL SKIDMORE.

Religion not History.—Concluded.

BY F. W. NEWMAN,

Emeritus Professor, of University College, London.

English Dissenters, who are not compromised with those loud swelling words of vanity, argue truly and forcibly that Jesus said nothing about the apostles transmitting this power to successors; nor did he couple it with laying on of hands. In Matthew he bestows it uniquely on Simon Peter for a personal and untransferable merit and without any laying on of hands; in John he bestows it on the eleven with the symbol of breathing upon them. All true, yet impotent truth. The floodgate of folly and of inexhaustible credulity was opened, when an essentially divine power was supposed to be entrusted to a man, and the book recording it was accepted as sacred and infallible. If Peter might possess this power, why might not Sylvester? why might not Hildebrand? "It is but the first step that costs," for it breaks down wholesome and needful incredulity. Peter in the gospels is certainly rash and weak, and not over brave. Indeed, to escape suspicion of being a disciple of Jesus he utters curses as well as oaths. Many a self-complacent bishop might think himself no worse than Peter, and as fit to hold the keys; and the multitude trained not to trust or use their common sense against the sacred book, accepted the pretensions of the bishop. So soon as a book is made sacred, all that is weakest and worst in it becomes most prominent and influential, and overwhelms all that is best in it. So it is that although personal religion, personal conviction, direct intercourse of the soul with God, universal illumination by the Holy Spirit, without any sharp distinction of laity and clergy, of teachers and taught, pervade the whole New Testament, yet corporate religion and sacerdotal mediation has overlain the original doctrine.

Nevertheless, we have not yet probed the wound to the bottom. No passages of exceptional error could have exerted so deadly efficacy, had not a far worse primitive weakness pervaded Christian teaching—a weakness prominent emphatically in the discourses attributed to Jesus—the mistaking credulity for faith. (Paul, no doubt, partook of this widely prevalent error. James is wiser, and does not overvalue faith in Jesus. Religion with him is mercy and purity; faith is belief in God.) This was poison in the blood. Just caution of belief, necessary inquiry, are treated scornfully, rudely, evasively; prompt and easy belief is highly praised. There is no need here to go through details. Whoever will turn the pages of the books may see it. Moreover, in the discourses given to Jesus are embalmed all the meaner and formal doctrines concerning prayer, fasting, alms, vigils, demons, exorcism, mendicancy, religious feetwashing; besides the harsh metaphors about eating his body and drinking his blood. These counterfeits of religion are exploded by manly thought and by modern science; but the books which inculcate them are the strength of sacerdotalism, especially when credulity has been successfully glorified into a saving virtue. Pauline Christians escape from the malign influence of the gospels, largely by making Paul's doctrine override that of Jesus, which is treated as fit for those only who are not yet emancipated from the elementary teaching in which the child is put on a par with the slave. (Gal. iv.) To return to the keys: It so happens here that from Matthew himself we seem to lean the origin of this gross, hideous, and baneful superstition, in another passage. I allude to Matthew xviii, 15–18, which is closely akin to a precept in Paul, 1 Cor. vi, 1–7. As Paul disapproved of his Corinthian converts going to law, one against another, before a pagan tribunal, so did Jesus deprecate the carrying out of doors to ordinary tribunals any quarrels between his disciples. Their duty was to attempt arbitration, and if that did not succeed, then to lay the case before the congregation —as a sort of large jury, an Athenian Ecclesia. Disciples were bound to accept the decision of the congregation, under the penalty of no longer being acknowledged as a disciple; and the verdict of the congregation in the matter would be ratified in heaven. Here there is no thought of forgiving or retaining sin; it is a simple question of jurisdiction in an external quarrel. There is nothing to give a germ of sacerdotal power or spiritual superiority of man over man. But the metaphorical diction of verse 18, "Verily, I say to you, whatever ye shall bind on earth shall be bound in heaven," etc., when once separated from its context, admitted of a most lamentable perversion. The word "ye" may have been supposed to belong to the apostles specially, and the binding and loosing to mean forgiving or retaining sin. Into this sense it is interpreted in the fourth gospel; while in the other passage of Matthew the metaphor is retained (Mat. xvi, 16–19), but ye is changed into thou; the gift is limited to Peter, is coupled with the keys of the kingdom of heaven, and is made a reward for confessing Jesus to be the Christ.

I do not profess, even so, to think it certain that Matthew xviii, 15–18, really came from Jesus himself. It seems more likely to have risen out of the circumstances of the Jerusalem Christians after the death of Jesus, when their numbers began to multiply, and their assembly, synagogue, or church had attained coherence. But certainty on such matters does not seem to me attainable. Simply I observe, we have many warnings that words are put into the mouth of Jesus which he never uttered. The command to all disciples "to take up their cross" (Mat. x, 38, xvi, 34, Mark x, 34, Luke xiv, 27) would have been unintelligible, and cannot have been used, in the lifetime of Jesus. The emphatic declaration against breaking the least commandment of the law and teaching men to break it (Mat. v, 19) has every appearance of being leveled against Paul and his converts and to have proceeded from his Judaizing opponents. But this leads on to the remark that the prohibition to dispense with any tittle of the law was strong on the side of formal religion, evidently including the Jewish sabbath. It is a common error to speak of Jesus as overriding the law of the sabbath; but in fact he is made to appeal to the conduct of David and to that of the Pharisees themselves, in proof that their scruples were extreme. The Jesus of the three gospels does not go on to the Pauline idea of uniting Jews and Gentiles on equality in his church, much less of abolishing the Mosaic law; and if the book of Acts is at all true, the apostles never learned from Jesus that the Gentiles were to come into the church at all. Yet if he had ever plainly told them, the hypothesis that they could not understand him is ridiculous. We have no trustworthy information that Jesus ever imagined a historical Christian Church beyond Judea. It is an undeniable fact that he has left us in great uncertainty as to his true words. Can he possibly have charged his apostles to "teach all nations to observe all things whatsoever he had commanded to them" (Mat. xxviii, 28), and have been ignorant that oral tradition is a very treacherous guardian of sacred precepts? A mere Jewish peasant may have been ignorant of a matter so very notorious; a prophet duly equipped from heaven to superintend the conversion of the world could not. If Paul was a true apostle, how comes it that he made no attempt to learn and teach the precepts delivered by Jesus to the twelve and to the multitudes? If Jesus had foreseen the earnestness with which pious disciples would long to know the words of life and truth dropped from his sacred lips, he must have taken steps for an immediate fixing of them, in writings accredited by himself as genuine, and not leave us to reason and guess and jangle on so vital a matter—if vital he accounted it. If he had foreseen the violent and cruel quarrels which were to arise among well-intentioned men, his professed disciples, from the diversity of representation in different books and from doubt what to believe, it would have been a doubly iniquitous neglect not to save his innocent votaries from such disastrous strife. Parchment, wood, brass, and stone should at once have recorded his authentic, authoritative doctrines, clearly setting dispute at rest concerning all that his disciples ought to believe, if he intended or expected his words to be a new sacred code to all future time.

But when he has himself held his words so cheap as to take no pains whatever that, authentic and genuine, they shall reach me or other men in distant age and region, he has done all he could to acquit us of any duty to care about them. Surely no man ought to be called less of a Christian than Paul was, merely because he concerns himself as little about them as Paul did, and finds an ideal Jesus to be far better than a half-and-half historical picture daubed with manifold blots. To the discourses attributed to Jesus we may apply two tests furnished in these very discourses:

"Out of the treasure of the heart a good man brings forth good things and an evil man evil things. By thy words thou shalt be justified, and by thy words thou shalt be condemned."

"He that speaketh from himself seeketh his own glory;" which involves the converse: He who seeks to glorify himself by his teaching speaks from himself and not from God.

Religion ought to be the uniter of mankind, enfolding all into the embrace of one God and Father of all; but it is now the deadly divider. New wars of the Cross and Crescent lie before us in the future, unless Christendom renounce polytheism and ambitious assumption. Never will this come about until the churches learn to trust in the Spirit of God, and in the light which shines from good and wise men in many nations, brighter and brighter as time goes on, and not in deceitful scraps miscalled history, and other books transmitted as sacred.

Seymour Weekly Times.

AN OPEN LETTER TO DR. MONROE.

DEAR SIR: I was pained to read in the Seymour Weekly Times, of Sept. 7, an article from your pen denouncing D. M. Bennett, W. S. Bell, and Josephine S. Tilton for "vending the interdicted pamphlet of E. H. Heywood at the Watkins Convention." I regret it personally that anything should occur to remove the good feeling and general sentiments of esteem which I have entertained for you; but I deplore it more because of the occasion it may give our Christian antagonists to say, "See how these Liberals fight." But as you have deliberately slandered me, as well as Mr. Bennett and Miss Tilton, I deem it incumbent upon me, as a duty to myself, and as a duty demanded by the best interests of truth, to vindicate myself before the Liberal public.

I have read your article two or three times, and it has been a matter of surprise, in the first place, that a man of your good sense could so far forget that good sense as to send out a malignant and pointless denunciation against two men and a lady whom you do not know, and about a transaction the circumstances of which you show yourself absolutely ignorant, and about a pamphlet of which you have not much more information. In fact, your article plainly shows that you did not know what you were talking about.

Speaking of the tabooed pamphlet, you say in one paragraph, "There is no great harm in it;" but in the next you say, "The book is one that could not be read aloud to ladies and children." Then you mean to say there is much harm in it? Would you read works of anatomy aloud to ladies and children? "There is no great harm in it." Why, then, do you not defend our right to sell it? "There is no great harm in it;" and yet the next moment you almost gasp for breath as you declare, "It points out some abuses in the social system, and hints at cures that are a million times worse than the disease."

Now, my dear doctor, if "there is no great harm in it," why do you say so many untruthful and malignant things about us for selling it? You surely did not think, when you penned those few lines pregnant with falsehood and scurrility, how utterly distasteful they were to become to the Liberal public, or you would have stayed your pen. In no other paper, religious or Liberal, has any writer, claiming responsibility, vilified us as you have done. You had not the shadow of an excuse for making the following false assertion: "Of course, the above-named parties were arrested, as they knew they would be, and, no doubt, wanted to be." Such recklessness of statement in regard to the parties you write about proves you to be an irresponsible person. I pronounce your statement, so far as I am concerned, an unmitigated falsehood. I did not know, neither did I want to be arrested. I did not even know that the pamphlet was to be on sale at the Convenion. I was not interested in any way in the sale of the book. It happened that the table for the sale of Bennett's, Mendum's, and Miss Tilton's books were arranged conveniently in a row at one side of the public stand. I was engaged in helping Mr. Bennett sell his books; and one day (Friday) at noon, when Miss Tilton was about to leave her table to go to dinner, she solicited me to have the oversight of her books while she was gone.

I did so freely, not apprehending the least trouble therefrom. As was quite natural I sold one or two copies while she was away, putting the money in a small box on the table. This was the head and front of my offending. I never dreamed of an arrest, and I am quite sure the others were as greatly surprised with our arrest as I was. And yet, without a knowledge of the facts of the case, you propose, sitting in your seven by nine sanctum, to fulminate a hoosier bull against us by misrepresentation and slander. You are not satisfied by asserting what you did not know, but you must insist upon slandering us by asserting that we "wanted to be" arrested. This will hardly be credited by the thousands of Liberals who were there and knew the circumstances of the case. But you are not satisfied with your effort in calling upon your imagination for the facts in the case but you must needs have recourse to the same source for the motives which prompted us in this matter. Our motives were, a "willful violation of law," which, "can have no motive but that of money making." It is an easy thing according to your notions as a hoosier knight of the quill for "sentimentalists and monomaniacs" to make the good sensible Liberals "shell out their money," where there is no cause at stake.

It is something they are not accustomed to do; but they are willing when human rights are jeopardized to come forward and do duty like men. And you will find before a great while that there is a cause in this matter of our arrest which thousands of Liberals have already espoused.

It is unaccountable that you should undertake to denounce, most unjustly, men and measures of whom and which you are profoundly ignorant.

You should certainly have possessed the facts relating to the sale of "Cupid's Yokes" at Watkins; you should have known the motives of those arrested, and it would have assisted you mightily in the way of reaching safe conclusions if you had been there and learned the opinions of more than three thousand Liberals, many of whom have been longer in the ranks of Freethought than yourself, and who cheerfully and enthusiastically voted that our arrest was "without any just or reasonable cause." And still further, you betray the glaring fact that you do not comprehend the situation, the real issue. The issue between Liberalism and priestcraft to-day has been precipitated upon us by the Heywood pamphlet.

You say, "There is no great harm in it." Why, then, have we not a right to sell it? Even from your own grounds you must concede our rights in the matter.

But we are not taking issue with modern Jesuitism upon the merits or demerits of the pamphlet; but we claim, upon the grounds of our constitutional right, the right to sell this book. If we are defeated at this point, the next step will be to defraud us of our right to sell Infidel and Atheistical books. The pamphlet is not to our liking. We do not defend it, but, taking it as it is, we maintain that it does not come within the statutory limitations of obscene literature, and that our arrests "were prompted, as we are informed and believe, by over-zealous theological partisans, simply as a mode of harassment and persecution," and therefore, in duty to ourselves and to the cause of free speech and a free press, we feel obliged to offer our defense.

Had not your liver troubled you in this piece of quill business you would doubtless have comprehended the issue; but as it happened, some red rag of imagination aroused your ire.

"There is not much harm in it," yet because it does not suit you it is "vulgar and beastly." How would this kind of a rule work in the case of the Seymour Weakly Times and the religious people of Indiana? There are thousands of good religious people in Indiana who, if they should read one copy of your paper, could stand by and see you roasted as Calvin roasted Servetus. Thousands would desire to see it done. Why is it that it is not accomplished? Simply because you are protected in your right to run a free press by the laws of the country. But why should you be protected and Mr. Heywood outraged and robbed of his constitutional rights?

Now, sir, when you allude to Ezra H. Heywood as a "prurient idiot," you simply give another advertisement of your lack of knowledge respecting him, and the overflowing of your bile. And when to this needless insult you say the "jail is the best place for him," you offer an affront to the more than ten thousand signers of the Heywood petition that will afford you "works meet for repentance."

"Our business is to make men and women truer, purer, and happier." What a strange way you have of attempting to accomplish the end! Surely, falsehood and slander are not the best or most direct methods of accomplishing this desirable object.

If you are opposed to Comstockism, why do you defend his aiders and abettors, and condemn us who are trying to bring him to justice? Why do you allude to us as "sickly sentimentalists and monomaniacs," and to E. H. Heywood as a "prurient idiot," if you are the real friend you profess to be of Freethought and Freethinkers?

"The promotion of good," you say, "the promotion of peace and harmony and love and happiness, and not of strife and discord and violence, is the mission of the humane and rational philanthropist and philosopher." Good preaching, but mighty poor practice. W. S. BELL.

PRIDE is a virtue (let not the moralist be scandalized)—pride is also a vice. Pride, like ambition, is sometimes virtuous and sometimes vicious, according to the character in which it is found, and the object to which it is directed.—Lord Greville.

NEVER will I seek or receive private, individual salvation; never will I enter into final peace alone; but forever and ever, and everywhere, I will live and strive for the universal redemption of every creature throughout all the worlds.—Buddhist Liturgy.

O RICH and various man! thou palace of sight and sound, carrying in thy senses the morning and the night, in thy brain the geometry of the city of God, in thy heart the power of love and the realms of right and wrong! Who shall set a limit to the influence of a human being?—Emerson.

FLUENCY and feeling do not always go together. On the contrary, some men are most sparing of speech when their feelings are most deeply engaged. I have been told that there is awful silence in the ranks before the first gun is fired, and little talking heard during the dreadful progress of the battle. When a ship is laboring for her life, and every moment may decide her fate, there is no talking.—Guthrie.

Letters from Friends.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Sept. 13, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Last night I wrote you a postal card saying that our TRUTH SEEKER for Sept. 7th had not reached me; but this morning it was in our post-office box along with the number for the present week. I presume it was at the office all the time.

I am very much rejoiced at the broad stand you have taken concerning the persecuted pamphlet entitled "Cupid's Yokes." The old proverb that "Whom the gods seek to destroy they first make mad" is evidently about to be proved as true once more. Old theology is showing that it is doomed by its present aggressive attitude toward heterodox opinions. The champions of modern christianity (I use a small letter to begin that word with intentionally) must be "mad" indeed to bring forward so radically obnoxious a book as "Cupid's Yokes" into such notoriety as they are now doing by their persistent persecutions. Comstock is in reality the best friend that Freethought has to-day, for only through his insane attacks upon Liberalists could you and many others have been brought into so openly defending Mr. Heywood's right, and consequently the right of every man, to express to the world his convictions upon any subject freely and with absolute impunity.

I admire your stand exceedingly, and rejoice that the issue is such as it is, for you have in this matter taken a stand which I do not remember of any other reformer's ever having taken. Numberless men and women have braved the indignation and wrath of their kind to promulgate the truths they themselves perceived, but I do not recollect of any one else who has dared the hatred of his fellow-men to vindicate the right of another to express ideas they themselves do not indorse. It is the most glorious issue you could possibly find; and although I do not wish you to be imprisoned for that or any other cause, yet should you be, I, for one, should look upon you as the most glorious martyr of the present day. Mr. Heywood truly says that it is "tragic and comical;" but it would be still more so were you to share his fate. We should then witness the strange spectacle of numberless libertines walking the streets of our cities, carrying misery and degradation into many homes by their unprincipled wiles, yet pursuing their way entirely unmolested by the law, while one jail held within its walls, as a criminal, one man whose life had never been stained with sexual misdeeds, but who dared maintain his right and the right of others to judge for themselves what constitutes sexual morality, and another jail would confine a man for maintaining the right of the aforesaid criminal (?) to advocate these views. Truly this would be a most sarcastic comment upon our present civilization.

I would like to have my name signed to the pledge contained in the last number of your paper, as one who will maintain her right to sell, loan, keep, etc., the proscribed book. I have already sold some fifty copies of "Cupid's Yokes" since Mr. H.'s incarceration, and intend to sell more. There is one thing in that statement, however, which I feel called upon to criticise. It is very common for even the most radical among us to say, as you do in this, that there are some things not in good taste contained in "Cupid's Yokes." This may or may not be so; but whether it is or not, it seems to me entirely unnecessary to state our opinion on that point, when the sole question is as to its obscenity. I doubt whether any of us do not sometimes err in regard to matters of taste in writing, as well as other things. The writings of no Liberalists are in "good taste" to any of the orthodox school. We would expect our "cultured" Massachusetts editor to find fault with the "taste" of Mr. Heywood's work, but our "uncultured" TRUTH SEEKER editor should, I think, drop all that and stand boldly, without even that sign of cringing, on the man's right to publish his thoughts and circulate them freely.

Yours for the truth, ELLEN M. BOLLES.

P. S.—For your companions in affliction, and especially for Miss Tilton, whom I personally know, I have the utmost sympathy and appreciation. She is indeed a brave woman, and deserves the gratitude of her sex for her steadfast bravery. She is helping the cause of woman more than can now be estimated. E. M. B.

ROCK RAPIDS, IOWA, Aug. 8, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Am pleased with the "Champions of the Church," with you also for noticing my poor verses, and wish I could be at Watkins, but I shall hear of it in the uncultured TRUTH SEEKER.

Yours ever, C. W. HALL.

LAMVILLE, IOWA, Aug., 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Your paper has been an eye-opener to me; it has lifted me up out of the miry clay and set my feet upon the solid ground of knowledge, and an immense amount of superstition has been swept from my eyes. It is the only paper I have ever read that is bold and fearless in its noble standing. Neither Comstock nor Jehovah can depress it. By the bye, how is Comstock getting along. I hope to live to see the time come when his end will be, for he is a disgrace to our land. If ever he comes to arrest you again, I would almost say, put a bullet through him and stop his infernal existence, for he is not fit to breathe the pure air of so grand a universe as this of ours. Yours in belief, Z. STOKES.

WOODLAND, WIS., Sept. 8, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I see the dogs of bitter persecution are again let loose and worthy men and women are again in the clutches of the immaculate Church, all for the glory of God, Tony, Y. M. C. A., & Co.

How long are such acts to be tolerated in this land that claims to be a free and independent nation?

I have just been reading in your noble and fearless paper (the T. S.) the account of your arrest and indictment for exercising the free right of every American citizen, and it makes me fighting mad that such an outrage should be perpetrated and by those that claim to be shining lights in this world.

Talk about such men as the instigators of the outrageous act as having souls. Bosh! Their souls are so small that they could be blown through the quill of a humming-bird, into the eye of a musquito and never make him wink. I for one am willing to grant to others the same privilege I claim for myself, viz., free thought, free speech, and a free press, but when it comes to casting respectable, honest, and true men and women into prison for exercising that right it is going a little to far, and should be resisted with all the force available.

Therefore, say I, if it must be war, then war it is, and war to the knife if necessary. It would not be the first time that the Christian Church has been the cause of turmoil and bloodshed, and gloried in it, but their power is fast waning away, and this is but the dying struggles of the hydra-headed monster, and justice and humanity will yet reign triumphant upon this glorious earth, with reason, science, and common sense for its shield upon which shall be inscribed in bright letters the names of D. M. Bennett, W. S. Bell, Josephine Tilton, E. H. Heywood, and many others equally worthy and too numerous to mention.

I will not tax your patience longer but simply say that I want a copy of "Cupid's Yokes" forwarded to me by mail, and show your enemy a bold front, for your friends are legion. Yours fraternally, S. CARVER.

CRETE, NEB., Sept. 6, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT: I am going to try how many trial subscribers I can send you from this place and county. So the present installment of four is but the beginning of what I hope may reach at least four times four, and if it does not reach more than double that, I shall be disappointed.

There is quite a Liberal sentiment hereabouts in the agregate. But, as in other places, we have conservative Liberals as well as orthodox conservatives.

A year ago (when I sent you last remittance) I determined not to take THE TRUTH SEEKER longer than the first of this year, and so stated in my last letter. But I am now glad you overlooked my order to that effect and continued to send it; for, since Moses Hull "set type" in your office, and especially since the demise of The Crucible, I being the judge, THE TRUTH SEEKER has improved wonderfully, and now that we have no Crucible within which to look for the pure, seven times refined metal, your paper has become a furnace capable of raising its contents to almost a white heat regardless of whose eyes its scintillations may bedim. In fact, at the present time, it is the only Liberal paper I know of that dares to print the private sentiments of its editors and managers, and the public sentiments of all the rest of the world.

For the truth, no matter where to be found, nor of what it consists. I am ever Yours most fraternally,

LEWIS MORRIS.

ALTON, IND., Sept. 8, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed please find $1.00, for which please send me three copies of "Cupid's Yokes" and the balance in "The Truth Seeker Pamphlets," such as you see proper. My object in sending for the "Cupid's Yokes" is to see what it is that is demoralizing the Christians so much that they have to call on the strong arm of the law to protect them in their Christian bigotry, which is no new thing for them to do. But I think the spirit of freedom has suffered too long to down at their bidding. Although they are calling on the law-makers and venders to help them, it won't down. You know, friend Bennett, that in every age nearly all the great advancements in the bettering the condition of the human race, have been started by the oppression of an over-zealous, bigoted class of people, and now to-day they are paving the way for one of the greatest revolutions toward progression that has ever been; but it seems hard that some of our noblest spirits should be dogged, persecuted, and imprisoned to satisfy their hellish enmity toward freedom.

But that is what we need to arouse the liberty-loving people of these United States. Marion, during his struggles for liberty while the Britons were hanging the Tories, said, "Hang away; it is the best thing you can do for us." So I say to-day; go it bigots, whip a few more women at the stake by a big buck-nigger, and imprison a few more women who are trying to make an honest living by selling a little pamphlet, and it will arouse that slumbering spirit of freedom and call it into action. "Whom the gods would destroy they first make mad."

There are some of us here that sympathize with you, friend Bennett, and all such noble spirits who are battling for truth and the rights of man, and we hope to see the day when bigotry and superstition will cease to rule. Among their late victims I see Josephine S. Tilton was marched off to prison (wonder why they didn't have the fife and drum to revive their drooping spirits) to await her trial and perhaps conviction. My very soul reaches out in unison with the noble self-sacrificing stand she took in suffering herself to be imprisoned. O for shame! for shame! may the gods of liberty perch over and cheer up her dauntless spirit.

Yours for the right, H. B. MEYLIN.

P. S.—Money is coming down to hard pan and hard to get, but we will do what we can to help you through.

99½ GIFFORD ST., SYRACUSE, N. Y., Sept. 7, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT: Since my return from Watkins, and subsequent knowledge of the indictments found against yourself, Mr. Bell, and Miss Tilton, I find myself continually asking, What is my duty in regard to this, to me, flagrant outrage upon freedom of thought and utterance of the same? If I were rich I could give money to support the familes of persons imprisoned for conscience' sake, for our Government takes no note of the wants of children whose parents are taken from them by the strong arm of the law. I might add to the list of paying subscriptions for papers that dare to denounce injustice, even though it be in the name of the law; but alas! I long ago forgot to act upon the injunction often given to children, "Let your victuals stop your mouth," and so have no money; what then? I can say, and do at every opportunity, "These men and women are fighting the battles of liberty, and when the names of Comstock & Co. shall be forgotten, Heywood, Tilton, and others who shall be deemed worthy to suffer imprisonment for truth's sake, shall be canonized in the Church of the Humanityites and a halo which shall refresh the eye and cheer the heart of all who look upon it, because it shall be the halo of the love of truth, shall surround their names forever.

We have been reading in our home the past summer a great deal of political economy, English professors, professors of the colleges in our own country, Amherst, Yale, Williams, etc., etc. Now, what I wish to bring to the notice of your readers is this fact; these writers dare to talk of "over-population," the English more particularly, and they even touch the sacred word marriage.

I wish you could find room for some extracts in your paper. What is Mr. Heywood's offense? He gave his opinion, they give theirs; you may not accept either. If some of the people who are so careful to say what is proper for others to read could only be persuaded to read something themselves, they would save their blushes for their own ignorance, and might become in time competent to sit in judgment upon the opinions of others on subjects which to-day are exercising the brains and touching the hearts of the wisest and the best of both sexes in the whole civilized world. "What shall we do to be saved? Let him who thinks he knows speak his convictions without fear." Said a person on the boat to me after leaving Watkins, "be careful how you disturb the best that the ages have given us." The ages have been quite lavish in their gifts; witness kings, emperors, slaves, and beggars, primogeniture, religions that make woman subservient to man, laws that ignore conscience, make holy certain days, etc., etc. I would say, "Leaving the things that are behind, let us press forward," "prove all things, hold fast that which is good," and that alone, never forgetting that we are accountable to the present and future, rather than the past. Faithfully,

LUCY N. COLEMAN.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN., Sept. 10, 1878.

BROTHER BENNETT: I take THE TRUTH SEEKER. I like the bold and manly stand its noble editor takes as he battles with that portion of the human family that would have us think that they have been appointed by God to do a jobbing business for him in the human soul line. If God is not capable of doing his business without hiring such execrable brokers as we see every day, he is a very poor God. Inclosed please find fifteen cents, for which you will please send me one of the "Yokes" that these brokers got on you, Heywood, Bell, and Miss Tilton. D. H. HARRINGTON.

A LETTER TO JOSEPHINE S. TILTON.

VINELAND, N. J., Sept. 11, 1878.

MISS JOSEPHINE S. TILTON, Noble Sister: I take the freedom to thus address you, for, to my free soul, the grandeur of your brave womanhood inspires me to send to you, a true sister, love, and cheer, I may say sympathy, but not pity, for souls like yours need no pity. Rather is yours an enviable position, because you are highly privileged as a chosen one to bear persecution for truth's sake. 'Tis glorious to know that brave women can work by the side of brave men for the onward march of Freethought. This is the age of woman's ascension. Fine and noble womanhood must help a lofty manhood to redeem humanity by freely discussing the very subject treated of in "Cupid's Yokes" with pure motives and high resolves for a truer and better condition of human life. Methinks I behold you in your prison home looking as cheerful as did Wm. Lloyd Garrison when he wrote on the walls of his cell,

> When peace within the bosom reigns,
> And conscience gives the approving voice,
> Though bound the human form in chains,
> Yet can the soul aloud rejoice.

To thy faithful co-laborer, the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, we would say, be assured thy influence and thy truth seeking will increase. Angels guide our way.

Your sister in the cause of truth, SADA BAILEY.

OGDEN, UTAH, Sept. 1, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Inclosed please find P. O. order for eight dollars, for which please send copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER to Mr. L. Hefler, also one copy of "The Champions of the Church," "The Unknown God," by J. M. Stillman, one-half dozen of "National Greenback Labor Songster," and "John's Way." Please give me credit for the eight dollars, and send the above-mentioned books and papers. I shall send for more books when I get ready.

"The Champions of the Church" I have read much of, and think it one of the best publications out for the overthrow of the monster in the path of progress. In my early life I read "Fox's Martyrs," and much concerning the persecution of Protestants by Catholics, but, being a strict Episcopalian, I never saw the other side of the question. At the present season I am not in trim for writing, but must say I admire the editor and highly enjoy THE TRUTH SEEKER for its freedom of expression and the liberty given to all to advance their opinions therein, thereby allowing every reader to be his own judge of the matter, instead of the general practice of prejudgment by editors. I am much amused with the various ideas and opinions, as well as the desires, wishes, and suggestions expressed by the writers on the subjects at issue, and concerning matter which ought or ought not to have place in the paper. And I feel pleased to enjoy an acquaintance with and support the paper whose editor, while he gives freedom and liberty to all, forgets not to maintain the like to himself, who is swayed neither by the one party nor the other, but dares stand up to defend himself in the right and the true in the full and free exercise of his own manhood. Wishing you continued success, I am respectfully yours, JOHN A. YOST.

JOPLIN, MO., Sept. 8, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: As a Freethinker (for years my wife and myself were members of the Presbyterian churches of various places in New York and Michigan) I desire to send you greeting from the Liberal club of Joplin, Mo. We number several hundred, and we wish you to go on in your glorious work of mental and physical emancipation. Don't let your spirit be worried when the time comes that that filthy stoolpigeon Comstock commences his attack on you. Joplin will do her share towards a defense fund. We have just sent over $400 to the yellow-fever sufferers in the South, the main part of it being raised under the auspices of the Germania Club, a society of Germans of our city who have a hall on the main street, and every Sunday evening they, with their families, meet and have dancing, theatrical plays, beer, wine, and food; and although the church people of our city tried hard to stop them, they failed. The Church doesn't have the ring in the nose of us Western folks as it does in the East. One Rev., at a meeting of citizens where it was proposed for the church people to join in with the Germania Club, as they had a hall and other things free, and more could be raised that way and sent at once, and the churches could hold their doings a few nights later, made this remark: "I belong to a church [Cambellites] that doesn't believe in such things [i. e., Germania doings], and I would see a thousand people die before I would give fifty cents or have any of my people give it." He is the same one who, when Jamieson and Cunningham had a series of debates here, got up at the finish and, although he was one of the moderators, and had agreed that no demonstration was to be made, but each one should form a verdict for himself or herself, in the name of the ladies of his congregation, gave Rev. Cunningham a bouquet. Did Cunningham give a part of his bouquet to Jamieson, as Jamieson did at Springfield to him? Not a bit of it.

Germania's festival was crowded by our best citizens—Infidels, church people, and all—and $300 was cleared; the sum of $400 was made in all; and this week, with what the churches and citizens will do, we hope to send, in all, nearly a thousand dollars; and we have no interests in the South except that of humanity and a common country.

Wm. C. received a huge bundle of Truth Seeker Tracts, and we are busy in placing them where they will do the most good; also the pamphlet in regard to the repeal of Comstockism. I shall send for a lot of "Cupid's Yokes" in a few days. You are doing more to sell the tracts and all other works that are being tabooed than you can even imagine. Curse the fool, has he no sense? I think you will hurt our cause when you succeed in getting Comstock out of the path, for, as a botch and mismanager, he has no equal. How many thousand years will it take mankind to find out that to persecute is to propagate?

It is good for his hide that he lives where he does. We have a peculiar way out here of making such tools as he is uncomfortable. He would first get a notification to get out of the way. Second, a gentle stretching over a limb. Third, he would be found some bright morning standing on nothing, and a placard would warn all such what to expect. It is the best way to treat such skunks. Well, if you need money, we will do our share to help you. We have now seventeen Freethinker clubs in Missouri and Kansas, which are getting ready for combined action at present.

Respectfully, M. D.

PITTSBURGH, PA., Sept. 9, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I have just concluded reading your indictment for selling "Cupid's Yokes," and consider it a great outrage. I read the book, and do not think it obscene or indecent. It is nothing more than a dissertation on marriage, and the author has a perfect right to his views, as I have to mine. If this is a free country, I would like to know what freedom is. Is it freedom of speech, freedom of the press, of expression? or is it the contrary? No judge or jury having brains or common sense can convict you, and therefore you have nothing to fear.

Personally I have much to say to you, but will defer it to some other time. I believe the greatest foe to the progress of truth is not error, but indifference to truth. Inclosed find three dollars for another year's subscription, and believe me Your friend as ever, W. H. W.

OREGON, WIS., Sept. 10, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Please send me "Cupid's Yokes," also "National Greenback Songster." The balance of the dollar that I send you, credit me on the paper.

I have a petition for Heywood with eighty names, but will not send it in until I get a hundred. I have hard work to obtain names, but I keep on trying, and succeed by perseverance. I am glad you have taken the stand you have, to "fight it out on that line." The farmers here are hard up for money. It takes two dollars' worth of produce to get one of money. I want several of your publications, such as the "Champions of the Church," "The Ethics of Spiritualism," and several other books, but have no money at present to buy them. I hope I shall be able to send to you for books before your trial comes off, and think I shall.

SOUTH EXETER, ME., Sept. 15, 1878.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: As independent citizens of the world, we request that our names be enrolled as those who believe in a "Declaration of Rights" as above priestly dictations or man-made law. It seems to us that it is time for all brave men and women to come to the front, and let cowards step to the rear. It is no time to falter when the brave standard-bearers are being struck down by cowards and traitors. The time has already come, but not as surely as it soon will, when it will be known who love truth and dare openly to proclaim it, and also declare that they will not be ruled by tyrannical usurpers whose only authority is in an ignorant and bigoted hatred toward those who differ from priestly authority. Let every independent man and woman boldly declare that their rights they will have—"peaceably if they can, forcibly if they must."

SEWARD MITCHELL.
JOSEPHINE CHASE.
SUSAN L. CLARK.

RIEGELSVILLE, PA., Sept. 13, 1878.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I learn through your valuable paper of your arrest by some superstitious people at Watkins Glen meeting; but what can be expected from a community of people where they are all led by the nose like asses? Ignorance must be pandered to and flattered, else the Church will lose its hold on silly women and ignorant and thoughtless men. A large portion of the community sympathize with you, and trust you will come out of your troubles unscathed. Reason is slowly dawning on the people in some localities, but here I am surrounded by superstitious people who pray for rain, and hope, in their imprisoned intellect, to change the laws of nature for their especial benefit.

The potato-bug still holds his own here in spite of prayers and incantations. Think you Moses knew of this fellow among his collection of lice, frogs, bugs, etc., which he kept ready to let loose on the poor ignorant and deluded of his time? How convenient Samson had the foxes, and how docile and pleasant they must have been to do his bidding, with their tails on fire—a very convenient fire-bug for modern times! but the breed has run out. St. Anthony would be a splendid orthodox fox if he had fire applied to him, but it seems he has fire in the head—the wrong place. I trust this illegal arrest will be the means of adding to the subscribers of your paper. You will hear from me periodically, and I will try to add subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and, if I can, will send a few lines of interest to your columns. How little people study nature, and how few of them ever reason or meditate on their surroundings! I am a disciple of D'Holbach, and love nature, and try to make the present happy, and all around me. I do not grope in the dark and clutch at phantoms which are not.

S. B. REDMOND.

MILAN, O., Sept. 8, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT: After looking over the report and verdict of the Grand Jurors in the cases of yourself and others, and also the charge of Judge Hurd to the jurors, I think there is one point that should be used against them if possible. The judge says, "I have read the book, and, in my opinion, it is an obscene work." Also, "You are to indict any one consenting to the sale of this book, or who has given away or lent them to any person within your jurisdiction." Now the facts are, if the judge has read the book, he obtained it from some source. Did he buy it? Was it given to him? or did he borrow it? Under either of the three propositions, the parties from whom it was obtained are just as guilty of circulating indecent, profane, and obscene books as D. M. Bennett or W. S. Bell, and I see no reason why Judge Hurd should not be brought before some judge, and, when duly sworn, state from and by whom he obtained that work, and that those parties be indicted and appear before the December term of Court to answer to the charge of circulating obscene works. And furthermore, I would, if possible, have the judge indicted, for I think there is no doubt but that the work which he read has been read by others, and, perhaps, the self same copy which was laid before the Grand Jurors; if not, some one else is also guilty of circulating obscenity.

If Judge Hurd has the right to decide that "Cupid's Yokes" is an obscene work, why, and by what authority, in the name of heaven (if I may use the expression), did he dresume to dare to furnish or allow a copy to be given to those good jurors in direct contradiction to law and his previous charge? Does Judge Hurd think that because he is county judge he has rights to receive, read, and distribute "Cupid's Yokes," and that any other American citizen has not? Friend Bennett, this may be a case hard to reach, but, in my opinion, Judge Hurd is just as amenable to law as W. S. Bell or D. M. Bennett, and when he is as guilty as they, he should be punished the same. More anon.

R. N. WILLCOX.

LOGANSPORT, IND., Sept. 14, 1878.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Having received one copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER for the 7th inst., for which we were over-anxious on account of your coming arrest, which we could see was inevitable among "God's people," or those who expect to make for themselves bright crowns in "the sweet by-and-by" by persecuting their fellow-man or following the example of those who claimed to be the vicegerents of the Almighty and claimed delegated power and privilege to try, condemn, and persecute for all misdemeanors which, in their ignorance and cupidity, were able to find in most any creature they had a mind to try, no difference if their "great Creator" did make that creature and his disposition to sin. Now we, in our limited means, are always willing to help those who are trying to help themselves, and thus advance the cause of liberty and right. We pledge ourselves to give $5.00, if necessary, to assist the persecuted company who were arraigned for selling "Cupid's Yokes," and are anxious, as you will find out thousands of others will be, to find out the nature of the pamphlet. Inclosed, find fifteen cents' worth of postage stamps, for which please send me a copy of that terrible pamphlet. Yours fraternally, JOS. CORNELL.

JEFFERSON, WIS., Sept 8, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Inclosed please find post-office order for the sum of five dollars to redeem my promise given last winter. You can do with it what you think proper. I only wish to get one of each of those pamphlets which caused the arrest of yourself, Mrs. Besant, Mrs. Chase, and Mr. Heywood.

Your course in the matter of the so-called Comstock Laws I approve, but deplore the misunderstanding between the leaders of the Liberal movement, which will be likely to retard the organization of Liberal associations.

I find great pleasure in reading the contents of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and enjoy a good laugh over some of the communications. THE TRUTH SEEKER is certainly a paper which gives information on a good many subjects. Your theory that money shall have no intrinsic value, that it shall only represent value, and that paper may do the same service as metal, and even better, I deem correct. If your projected financial sytem will have the effect to abolish speculative competition, in trade, gambling, and usury; if it will guarantee labor to every individual and insure a just compensation for labor; if it will prevent the accumulation of great wealth in the hands of a few, we need have no fear that the country will be inflated; then we may do all our business with only a small amount of value represented (greenback money). But I have my doubts if ever this system may be found available and sure, as the very people who are the most to be benefited by it are so indifferent on this question, and, indeed, prefer to be humbugged by their old, time-honored institutions. There is so very little education among the great laboring masses; even our enlightened Liberals seem to think that man lives only for the purpose of making and hoarding money to lay out at interest and to use for speculation. We must wait for Socialism to come around and help stir up the people from their lethargy. Socialism! the only system which will insure justice and happiness to every individual.

We are on the best road now, since the spirit of invention has prepared the way, and it will not be long before all the people, and even the money-lenders, will see that our present system of production and business will hold out no longer. Is the apple ripe?—it will fall from the tree.

Your article, "Matter, Motion, Life, and Mind," and other articles about Spiritualism, made me ask myself, What is Spiritualism? I thought a great deal about it, but do not know now what to take it for. I don't believe in spiritual manifestations, except what can be produced through and by the brain in a healthy body. Is the body dead? then the spirit is extinct; therefore no hereafter for any individual beyond his descendants. Human beings are like plants, which grow old and die, draw their subsistence from the earth and solar rays, whither to be dissolved to give subsistence to human beings coming after us. I suppose you don't call electricity, magnetism, and sleight of hand spiritual manifestations. Yours truly, GEO. KISPERT.

BELLEVUE, IOWA, Sept. 11, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Inclosed please find 30 cents, for which send me two copies of "Cupid's Yokes." Also don't forget to publish every article that comes in your way that you think will enlighten your readers in the science of money. Money is a creation of law and a national prerogative; its use is a measure of values. A nation should never buy nor borrow that which it can create, unless the object be to enslave the producers of the necessaries of life for the service of the non-producers—that class the least worthy of legislative favor. You will perceive that I am in favor of the Greenback Labor party's success.

Yours, JOHN STUART.

BOISE CITY, IDAHO, August 10, 1878.

HIGHLY ESTEEMED BROTHER BENNETT: Inclosed find $1.30, as my tab tells me I am slightly indebted to you for your heroic efforts to spread Liberal ideas. For the extra money send me the photos of those two renowned champions of humanity, D. M. Bennett and R. G. Ingersoll.

THE TRUTH SEEKER grows better every issue. I am scattering my copy, after carefully reading it, among my neighbors, and sending it among my distant friends, who perhaps never heard of such a paper, and soon I hope to send you some subscribers. I am more than pleased to see Infidelity spreading so rapidly; may it soon have the controling voice in our land. Since I have left the Church, and have spoken boldly against Christianity, some of the neighbors seem to treat me coldly, and are teaching their children, who would otherwise be my friends, to shun me, but this I expected. I am twenty years old, and have scarcely been inside a school-room for five years; but I intend, as I get further advanced in years and learning, to extract what bigotry I can from people, and show to those around me that Infidels and even Atheists—as the existence of God is becoming a moonshine matter with me—are not cut-throats, neither require the fear of hell to make them do right. I am sorry an unpleasantness exists between yourself and Mr. Abbot, as I should like to see all the Liberal champions work together, but then you are on the right side, as you always are. Abbot, on the contrary, is taking a roundabout course, and will soon sink himself and his o'er cultured, unco guid sheet into oblivion. When they pitched into you a few months ago about Spiritualism, you extricated yourself so nicely as to show yourself equal to any emergency. I became sick nigh unto death on that subject several years ago, when E. V. Wilson was lecturing in our parts in Iowa and talking about spirits weighing two hundred pounds. Still, I intend to investigate the subject when I get a chance.

I was somewhat surprised to hear of some one dissatisfied with Mrs. Slenker's story, "The Darwins," as I thoroughly admire both the story and its author; and I respectfully ask our objecting friend if Mrs. Slenker does not possess the knack of making "Infiddles" out of young folks, will he or she please inform me who does?

As for Anthony Comstock,

"May gravels round his blather wrench,
And gouts torment him inch by inch."

He is, to my notion, one of the most infamous men that ever walked the earth, worse than a hostile Bannock; and I care not how soon he leaves our beautiful world—the sooner the better to suit most of us. Send him out here, and we will put him in the hottest of some battle with the hostiles. In favor of truth and right, I remain

Your earnest co-laborer, EVERARD E. MARTIN.

ALTON, ILL., Sept. 10, 1878.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Inclosed find $1.00, for which please send me two copies of "Cupid's Yokes" and two of Paine's "Age of Reason." I find this latter a most valuable little missionary. Paine's earnest, honest manner and his plain, stubborn facts, it seems to me, make this little work the most damaging of all the books against Christianity. No wonder the ministerial cloth has assailed and abused his noble name, for he has given their pet theories a blow from which they are now staggering, and from which they are destined to fall.

But I did not start out to write a eulogy of this noble patriot hero, but to order the two "Cupid's Yokes." I want to see and let others see for what a man may be imprisoned in this "land of the free." But, my dear brother, are you not taking a great risk? If a judge and jury could be found who would imprison poor Heywood, how much more would they glory to see you in the meshes of the law! But I must leave you to judge. Here is $5.00 to assist you in your noble fight against a gang of inquisitors not surpassed by anything since the Spanish Inquisition. If the suit is pressed and becomes expensive, you can count me for at least $10.00 more. If you hesitate to send the pamphlet by mail, you can send by express, the expressage to be paid here. But unless the old tyrant Comstock has full access to the mails to open and hunt, he would not get this.

Yours truly, D. R. SPARKS.

CENTERVILLE, IOWA, Sept. 10, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Inclosed please find post-office order for $2.00, for which send me one copy each of "Cupid's Yokes" and the "Holy Bible Abridged" (cloth), and pass the balance to my credit.

If there is any justice in confining in prison a man or woman, as a "person of wicked and depraved mind and disposition," because they see fit to sell a pamphlet on the all-important subject of marriage and its relations, then I am of the opinion that the God whom the very moral men—who are foremost in causing such arrests—worship should be confined in Deacon Skidmore's "hel" for a term of years, for writing certain indecencies.

I like your paper very much, and sympathize with you in your trials. I have not seen fit to circulate the petition; the people here are all too pious.

Yours respectfully, FOSTER G. HUDDLESTON.

BURNSIDE, PA., Sept. 18, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT: I am one of your subscribers (although at present delinquent, I will reduce my arrearages in a few days). Without THE TRUTH SEEKER a great want would be felt in my household. Next to food and clothing we esteem it a necessary of life. And in recommending it to my friends I represent it as the best paper published on this planet. To me it is. Such height, and length, and depth, and breadth of investigation in every department of science, literature, art, and everything that pertains to the promotion of the welfare and happiness of the human family! Brother Bennett, go on while life lasts. Educate the people. Eradicate error, and lay for the coming generation a foundation of genuine truth upon which to rear their political, moral, and religious superstructure, to the end that they may be enabled to enjoy life freely and fully, without fear of hell, devils, hobgoblins, priests, etc. The object of this letter is to secure a copy of "Cupid's Yokes." Inclosed is fifteen cents which is the price advertised. Yours truly,

JOHN H. REED.

ILLIOPOLIS, ILL., Sept. 6, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I like THE TRUTH SEEKER because it tolerates all opinions and gives all sides of every question a fair hearing, and especially for its fearless opposition to the tyrants who are seeking to stamp out every opinion they deem heterodox. I have read with pleasure and profit THE TRUTH SEEKER for the last eight months, and now inclose three dollars for one year's subscription, and two dollars to the Defense Fund. I own the farm on which I live, and think I ought to give my influence to uphold the liberty our Constitution was designed to guarantee. Many more of my class would do the same if they were out of the shade of superstition and bigotry in which they were born and nurtured. Wishing you a safe deliverance from the power of the tyrants, and many years of useful labor, I remain yours for free thought and free speech,

LEMUEL H. IDE.

A LETTER TO MARY A. PETERSON.

NORTH VASSALBORO, MAINE, Sept. 10, 1878.

MARY A. PETERSON: I see in THE TRUTH SEEKER that you wear the reform dress. For your encouragement I will say I have worn no other dress for almost twenty-two years. I am glad that the battle between Comstockism and Liberalism waxes warmer and warmer, that Bennett dares to circulate "Cupid's Yokes." This will bring to a head the horrid rotten sore. It is not hard to guess on which side victory will turn. We must have backbone enough to support and circulate THE TRUTH SEEKER and stand by each other until freedom is gained. We have had a taste of liberty, we cannot be satisfied until we have a good meal. As I have neither talent nor money to invest in this holy warfare, the least I can do is to let the friends know they have my sincere sympathy for the advancement of true righteousness on the earth. I wish that all ladies who have adopted the reform dress, or any reform, would let it be known through THE TRUTH SEEKER that we may know our numbers and strength. Yours truly, EMELINE A. PRESCOTT.

Sorrow.

BY E. F. BRUNDAGE.

Oh! is there a spot where sorrow is not?
Where virtue and peace love to dwell?
Where the birds gaily sing in perpetual spring?
Oh! where is that spot—who can tell?
Oh! tell me, I pray, for I am weary to-day,
And worn with the cares of this life;
Let me dwell in that spot where sorrow is not,
Far removed from this terrible strife.
Long years I endured what ne'er can be cured;
In sorrow my lot has been cast;
Let me now find repose in my life's early close.
For my sun now declines in the west.
Then a voice from above, in accents of love,
Came whispering over the hills,
There is not a spot where sorrow is not,
Where thou canst escape this life's ills.
Yet there still is a spot where sorrow is not.
Where pleasure nor pain never dwells;
Where the birds never sing—there's no summer nor spring,
And silence supremely prevails.
And there, in that spot, all that's mortal shall rot,
While forgetfulness reigns o'er the past:
No future is there, nor troubles, nor care,
'Tis the fate of poor mortals at last.
Oh! there let me go, and escape from my woe!
In oblivion's embrace let me lie;
There is nought in this life but sorrow and strife;
Let me die! Let me die! Let me die!

"A Week with the Ghosts" Again.

THE DRAGON'S TEETH SOWN AND THE CROP OF FALSEHOODS THAT SPRANG UP.—IMPORTANT TRUTHS REQUIRING UNIMPORTANT LIES TO SUSTAIN THEM. — TRUTH SEEKER SLANDERS ITS SUPPORTERS. — WHAT ANALINE LOGIC PROVES. — D. JENKINS A CANDIDATE FOR THE PENITENTIARY AS A PENALTY FOR TELLING THE TRUTH.

MR. EDITOR: My right arm being disabled by an accident so as only to write in much pain, and at intervals, has compelled me to delay writing. On page 490, Aug. 3, T. S., some anonymous individual seeks to dishonor me and others with a notice which he calls "That Advertisement." The first paragraph read, as follows: "I notice in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 20 a beautiful advertisement for the benefit of the fraud Mott, under the title of 'A Week with the Ghosts,' by D. Jenkins of Hannibal, Mo., whose attempt to disguise the fact that he is working for and is a tool of Mott is simply amusing. He is evidently acting at the direct instigation of a certain party at Memphis, Mo., whose name I now withhold. There is evidently a well-concerted plan on the part of Mott & Co. to raise a new interest in Mott and bring back the travel to that town. Of course many are interested who are not Spiritualists. They are trying to obliterate the efforts of the thorough exposure and the general distrust produced thereby."

REPLY.—First. I wrote no "advertisement," and published none, which makes falsehood No. 1. He next proclaims Mott a fraud without a scintilla of proof, evidence, or even argument to sustain it; which I pronounce falsehood No. 2. That I published my article for the benefit of the fraud Mott, which is falsehood No. 3. That I am working for and am a tool of Mott; falsehood No. 4. That I attempted to "disguise the fact," which is falsehood No. 5. That I am "acting at the direct instigation of a certain unnamed party at Memphis, Mo.," which is falsehood No. 6. That Mott has been "thoroughly exposed," which is falsehood No. 7. That there is a "well-concerted plan by Mott & Co. to bring back the travel to that town," when the travel has never left it, which is falsehood No. 8.

I might add two or three more, but here are in the first paragraph more than half as many falsehoods as lines, convincing to most readers that the author is an adept in the art of concocting lies.

His second paragraph asserts that Col. Mackay of Leavenworth, Kan., procured passes for the Motts to Colorado, with the agreement that Mott should stop off on his return and give test-seances for which the Colonel had provided, but Mott "slipped back" (does it mean slid, rolled, or traveled?) to his home without stopping.

REPLY.—Mott never received any passes from Col. Mackay, and was under, and never had been under any pecuniary obligations to the wealthy and generous Colonel; had not agreed to give any test-seances there, and when the weather was too hot to sit in a cabinet, and his wife persuaded him not to stop on his return, he wrote to his friends there notifying them of the fact, as I am credibly informed, and I am sorry if my gifted friend, the Colonel, has become mentally so debilitated as to need that notorious liar and being of doubtful or uncertain gender to make his complaints for him. The passes to Colorado were the gift of a generous friend, E. D. Halstead of Chicago, Ill.

Thus statement after statement proves false; all by those who are fraudulently endeavoring to prove Mott a fraud. The shearers are coming home shorn, and those who have been digging a pit for others are finding it caving in upon themselves. So far we discover nearly a dozen falsehoods.

The great truth which it is supposed such articles are intended to teach is that Mott is a fraud; and they are fraudulently endeavoring to convince others of this ponderous "truth," so weighty that it requires a dozen lies to prop it up.

Now, to this individual called "Anti-Fraud," which should have been "Anti-Truth," I have nothing to say. Do not even know whether the writer be a man or a woman; certainly such conduct is neither manly nor womanly, unless we spell it manlie or womanlie. There are those whom to notice is to honor, and there is now one who has earned my scorn and coutempt, and as I always pay my debts, principal and interest, he, she, or it shall have full dues.

"Every move they [the Motts] make indicates rascality," says his accuser, and almost every assertion his enemy makes indicates falsehood. Poor Mott! should he move to eat, drink, or sleep, it would indicate "rascality," and if he refrained, the evidence would be still stronger. The two most important moves of the past season were during the heated term, to Colorado and back; the first evincing rascality in running away after the "exposure," vulgarly so called, and the return, after holding several seances at Denver with good results, because they would not permit his stay.

Is not reason wasted in replying to nonsense such as that? So reasons "Anti-Fraud," but such keen observers and astute logicians, who, if they studied their own characters and conduct better and Mott's less would have less to find fault with abroad and learn to tell the truth at home.

The facts in relation to my article, "A Week with the Ghosts," are as follows:

After my first visit to Mott's, several Liberal friends in Hannibal requested a meeting, desiring to hear my report. They called it, and I reported, with which they were well pleased.

After my second visit, a written request was presented to me signed by Hon. C. Miner and some ten or fifteen others, requesting me to prepare a written account of my visit for publication in one of our city papers. I replied in writing, consenting to do so, and did write it, but owing to a misunderstanding between Judge Miner and the publisher, and the Judge's absence, its publication was delayed; when you, Mr. Editor, sent me word that you would publish it. I forwarded a copy to you, omitting the correspondence, and it was not published.

After a long time, I wrote you about it, and you acknowledged that I had been "badly treated," that the manuscript was misplaced, and if you could find it, it should be at once inserted in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I then re-sent it, adding only the paragraph regarding the "exposure" which was reported to have been made, and that is the whole story. It was published, but you omitted the responsible names to the certificate included, which rendered that almost useless, being without known authority, and wrongfully omitted as I thought.

Not one of the persons who had signed the request, so far as I can recollect, and at whose "instigation" I acted, had ever seen Mott or ever been in Memphis.

No person in Memphis knew that I intended writing, and when finished, neither Mott nor any person in Memphis knew it existed, or ever saw it, so far as I know, until it appeared in the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

So much for its being an "advertisement," of my being a "tool of Mott's," of "acting at the instigation of a party in Memphis," etc.

Now, Mr. Bennett, after humbly apologizing to our readers for the attention which I have been compelled to give to this irresponsible correspondent of uncertain gender, the remainder of his (?) article, false and foolish, is not worthy of notice, for there are things so low as not to deserve even the stab of a steel pen.

Now, Mr. B. some one has concocted the lies that I was in the service of, acting with, and aiding and abetting swindlers in imposing upon the public and obtaining money under false pretenses. You have published such charges to the world. I demand the proofs.

If guilty, my proper place, and that of others, is the penitentiary. You have assumed the grave responsibility of publishing such charges against me, concealing the name of the author, thereby making yourself responsible for them. I demand that you retract or prove them.

I have faithfully aided in carrying THE TRUTH SEEKER on my shoulders since its first issue (for without paying subscribers it and you could have done but little), and is it only to find myself libeled and charged with high crimes and misdemeanors, without a single cause to produce or a particle of evidence to sustain them? Can I afford to help to pay a slanderer in libeling myself?

You have screened, furnished a covert for, and aided a calumniator in shooting his poisoned arrows from that hiding-place to injure one of your truest and best friends; what course, think you, should that friend pursue?

You have repeatedly published J. H. Mott as a "fraud." I demand your proof of this.

You have also repeatedly published Mott as an "exposed fraud." I demand that you tell us what has been exposed, and produce the first particle of proof of that exposure, if such it is.

The most that was proved by that boasted "exposure," which has been proclaimed over the land with such a flourish of trumpets, the exposure where nothing was exposed excepting that analine could be squirted upon Mott in his cabinet, a fact which no man in his sober senses had ever thought of denying.

Let us inquire: Men assert that they have there recognized their lost wives, children, and other loved ones "gone before;" conversed for fifteen minutes at a time with dear friends from beyond the blue Atlantic who once lived near them in their island home; others from France and Germany in their own languages, and that they could not be mistaken. I have there been informed of different facts from various localities; conversed, as it seemed to me, with a sister long dead, and names were given me of schoolmates and companions from beyond the Alleghany mountains in the East, and others conversed, as they believed, with those who had departed from beyond the Rocky Mountains in the West, and facts have been made known and circumstances narrated which upon inquiry have since proved to be true—but all false, forsooth, because analine could be squirted upon the medium. If Mott knows all things in all neighborhoods and countries, and all their private affairs, he possesses greater omniscience and omnipresence than any personal God possesses, and greater power than any but a thorough believer in the "thorough exposure" by analine could possibly give him credit for; and those who concede to him this extraordinary knowledge, which he is not arrogant enough to claim for himself, are the extremely credulous. Perhaps Mott is a fraud; but never dare to proclaim it until you have ample evidence to sustain the charge. I conversed with what appeared to me to be a spirit from Quincy, Ill., who informed me that he had shot a man, and was sorry for it; and some time after, during a visit to Quincy, I first ascertained that to be a fact, which would have been strange had not the whole thing been "thoroughly exposed" by analine.

The names of parties have been given never known in Memphis, or within a thousand miles of that piece, and events detailed, their deaths, their diseases, and the circumstances which took place afterwards, unraveling mysteries which had puzzled the living for many years; names freely given without leading questions of the far away, and the long ago; at least it was so supposed until a shrewd detective succeeded in throwing analine upon Mr. Mott. All might have been true and people might have trusted to their own senses were it not for analine.

A "thorough exposure," Mr. B., should of course explain the fraud, inform us fully how all these things were done, and how they could be performed by others; the analine colored "exposers" of fraud, however, do not attempt to explain one of them. Yet you have the impudence to proclaim it to the world as a "thorough exposure."

Hundreds are willing to swear that they have conversed with those long dead; some died before Mott was born, faces were recognized and names given, and they were not and supposed they could not have been mistaken were it not for analine.

Would it not now be advisable to publish a new book for the benefit of our brother skeptics to be entitled "Analine Logic?"

A man enters Mr. Mott's house as a friend, and inquirer; requires test conditions, which are generously granted; and when granted refused; being offered the privilege of sitting in the cabinet with Mr. Mott during the whole performance, as I have been informed, seeks an opportunity when Mott is unarmed, in the dark, and defenseless, in his own house, to pour upon him a poisonous liquid, while in the very act it is supposed, of doing him the greatest favor by furnishing him evidence of immortality; and after this mean and cowardly act wholly unprovoked, goes out imagining himself a gentleman, without we think either gentility or manliness, and an anti-Mott party arises who glory in their shame and whose emblem is or should be "A Syringe. The Great Squirt Party!"

And now, Mr. Editor, I subscribe myself yours for honesty against dishonesty; truth against falsehood; courage and manliness against skulking and sneaking cowardice; facts against lies; and truthfulness against slander and calumny. D. JENKINS.

Hannibal, Mo.

Another Note From Anti-Fraud.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. Young, apologist and defender of Mott the exposed fraud, wants to discuss with me through the papers the question of his fraudulency. I respectfully decline. Having no doubt whatever as to the fact that Mott is a trickster, I am not disposed to help advertise him by a discussion as to his claims. The greater the fraud the more he is to gain by such a discussion. There are persons credulous enough to believe in Mott since exposed, as they believe still in Bliss, Huntoon, Pickering, et id omne genus. This cannot be helped by newspaper discussion, in which almost any claim in favor of a medium can be bolstered up by the testimony of ignorant, credulous people, or persons interested in the medium's business.

In regard to my name I am neither afraid nor ashamed to give it, and will do so whenever I think there is a necessity for my doing so.

My Young denies my statements, but in a very guarded manner. Altho' Col. Mackay did not personally get the passes for Mott to go to Colorado, is it denied that it was his influence that obtained them? Did not Mott agree to stop off and give seances? and was not the cabinet made and parties invited to attend? Did not Mackay, learning Mott was at home again giving seances, telegraph him asking if he was coming to L., and did not Mott reply, "No?" "The Colonel is expected here again," says Mr. Young! A person in a position to know, writes me, "If Mackay goes to Motts' again I think it will not be in the way Young states it." The same gentleman writes, "One thing is certain, Mott & Co. do not propose to give test seances, and they regard every man an enemy who proposes it."

DEAR SIR: I have been requested by —— to state to you the substance of a conversation held with Hon. H. D. Mackay of Leavenworth, Kansas, with reference to Mr. Mott of Memphis, Mo. It was this: After the Pattee exposure, Mott withdrew for a time from holding seances, and desired to take a trip to Colorado to recruit his powers. He applied to Mr. Mackay for R. R. passes, pledging himself on his return to stop at Leavenworth and give to Mr. Mackey and his friends a series of test seances, but failed to stop according to his contract, as I have since learned on other authority,

Yours truly, ——.

Enough and more than enough in reply to claims of honesty for a man like Mott. Mr. Pattee's communication in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Aug. 31 leaves nothing to be said. Yours truly, ANTI-FRAUD.

E. B. FOOTE, of 120 LEXINGTON AVE., NEW YORK, to whom all letters from the sick should be addressed. In its issue for January 19, 1878, Mr. Bennett's TRUTH SEEKER thus speaks of DR. FOOTE and his medical publications: "We know him (Dr. Foote) personally and intimately, and we say, with all the assurance that knowledge imparts, that he is a man of the highest incentives and motives, whose life has been spent in instructing and improving his fellow-beings by giving such information as is well calculated to enable them to be more healthy, more happy, and to be better and more useful men and women. His medical works possess the highest value, and have been introduced and thoroughly read in hundreds of thousands of families, who, to-day, stand ready to bear willing testimony to the great benefit they have derived from the physiological, hygienic, and moral lessons which he has so ably imparted."

"Some twelve years ago, in a London drawing-room, one of our most eminent men of science said: 'Why do not the bishops answer Mr. Greg's Creed of Christendom? They are bound to answer it—if they can.' In the lifetime of the present generation the earliest work at all similar was that of Mr. Charles Hennell, which, in various respects, had great merit; but Mr. Greg, coming later, had the advantage of access to many able German researches, and his work continues the most complete on all sides; to it one may most confidently appeal when assailed by eager Christians with the current commonplaces of their warfare. Since bishops, deans, learned canons, and academic divines do not reply formally to so thorough, clear, and learned a treatise, which has been so long before the public, we have the best of proof attainable that this historical argument—occupying precisely the ground which English academicians have chosen as their own—is unanswerable" (F. W. Newman, on "The New Christology," in Fortnightly Review).

Sepher Toldoth Jeschu;

THE BOOK OF THE GENERATION OF JESUS.

WITH PREFACE AND NOTES BY SCHOLASTICUS.

First English Translation

Of the ancient Jewish story of Jesus, who was born at Bethlehem about 106 B. C., being the son of a betrothed maiden named Miriam (Mary) by Joseph Pandera. By the power of a charm stolen from the Holy of Holies he cured lepers, raised the dead, and wrought other miracles. Wherefore he was arrested by the elders of Jerusalem, scourged, crowned with thorns, and by order of the Sanhedrin stoned to death and hanged on the day before the Passover and the Sabbath, in the reign of Queen Alexandra, about the year 75 B. C.

Death of Simon Kepha on a tower in the city of the Nazarines about 39 B. C. How and why the Romans changed "Kepha" to "Petros."

Startling evidence that Paul flourished before the middle of the first century B. C., contemporary with the aforesaid Kepha.

Price 10 cents. Address D. M. BENNETT,

Burns' Phonic Shorthand

FOR

Schools, Business Writing, and Reporting; arranged on the basis of Isaac Pitman's Phonography.

BY ELIZA BOARDMAN BURNS,

Teacher of Phonography and Phonetics at Cooper Union and N. Y. School of Phonography.

To facilitate the general introduction of Phonography into all businesses and professions, the author has, after twenty-five years' experience in teaching all the various "systems" in vogue, arranged a text-book which, though full and complete, is concise, free from superfluous verbiage, and of moderate size. The simplicity of arrangement in this work enables the student to pursue the study of Phonography with much more ease and certainty than any other text-book; while the writing which results from its use is as rapid as any, and far more legible than that derived from the instructions given in other phonographic works. Price, $1.00. Sold at this office.

KIDDER'S

SECRETS OF BEE KEEPING.

This book should be in the hands of every bee-keeper in our land, whether he has one swarm of bees or a hundred.

It is a guide to the bee-master, in every branch of the business.

No more losing bees in winter; nor in their flight to the forests in swarming time; nor in their being destroyed by moth millers, or by being robbed by other bees. No more stinging by bees when we go to the hive for honey or for any other purpose.

In fact the book shows how all losses and trouble with our bees can be successfully overcome and remedied.

And on the other hand it will instruct any one how they can keep bees with great profit, and with but a small investment.

This book contains more matter than any other book that sells for one dollar and fifty cents.

But in order to have a rapid sale and place the book within the reach of all, the publisher proposes to sell the book at the very low price of 75 cents bound, paper covers 50 cents.

Sold at THE TRUTH SEEKER Office, 141 Eighth street, New York.

NOTICE.—I have hitherto published some of Col. R. G. Ingersoll's lectures in cheap form, believing that by so doing I was aiding in the diffusion of valuable Liberal reading matter and doing a favor to the general public. At the request, however, of Col. Ingersoll, I shall publish no more of them, but will keep for sale all his lectures so far as published under his own auspices. D. M. BENNETT.

Abstract of the

OF

JEAN MESLIER,

A Roman Catholic priest, who, after a pastoral service of thirty years at Etrepigny and But, in Champagne, France, wholly abjured the Christian dogmas.

EDITED BY VOLTAIRE.

This little work contains very sound reasoning. Its utterances are among the most powerful and convincing. The clergyman gives most excellent reasons why the old dogmas of superstition and error should be discarded.

DR. LYON'S Hygeian Home is at Springfield, Mo. See adv. in May Nos. TRUTH SEEKER. 18t25 Resp'y, J. S. LYON.

The distinguished physician for all PRIVATE CHRONIC and SEXUAL DISEASES, is without any exception the greatest living practitioner of the age. The thousands of cures he is performing annually substantiate this fact. He has patients in every State of the Union and in the British Provinces. Every reader of this who has any affection of the Head, Throat, Lungs, Heart, Stomach, Liver, Kidneys, Bladder Bowels, Womb, Genital Organs, Rheumatic or Neuralgic Difficulties, or Eruptions of the Skin, Blood Impurities, Tumors, Cancers, or any Nervous Affections or Diseases of the Eye or Ear, are invited to write to Dr. Fellows, whose charges are extremely low, so that those in most humble circumstances in life can avail themselves of his valuable services. The Doctor's crowning medical achievement has been in the discovery of an EXTERNAL or OUTSIDE APPLICATION for the permanent cure of SPERMATORRHŒA and IMPOTENCY, as the result of self-abuse in youth and sexual excesses in mature years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Powers, etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy. Dr. Fellows has prescribed his EXTERNAL REMEDY for 1,100 cases without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition: had been in the Insane Asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others on the verge of Consumption, while others again had become Foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

Address, with stamp, Vineland, New Jersey, where Dr. R. P. Fellows is permanently located, and obtain his PRIVATE and other CIRCULARS, with cures SWORN TO, which is irrefutable testimony to the Doctor's unprecedented success in treating all the diseases here named. TERMS EXTREMELY LOW IN ALL CASES. WRITE YOUR ADDRESS PLAINLY.

(From the Rock Mountain Herald.)

"Dr. Fellows is a successful specialist for all the diseases which he claims to cure, such as chronic and sexual complaints. His wonderful skill and success are bringing him hundreds of cases weekly, by letter and otherwise, from all over the United States."

Gems of Thought.

FREETHOUGHT is needed for the search of truth.—Anon.

THE world to-day has outgrown its yesterday's thoughts.—Anon.

ERROR of opinion may be safely tolerated where reason is left free to combat it.—Thomas Jefferson.

EACH year adds growth to the moral and intellectual world, as the circling sun adds a new layer to the trees.—Hudson Tuttle.

JUSTICE is the cement of mankind. A nation or empire which neglects to be internally just, falls asunder by discord or decay.—Anon.

PHILOSOPHY, wisdom, and liberty support each other. He who will not reason is a bigot, he who cannot is a fool, and he who dares not is a slave.—Sir Wm. Drummond.

LOVE unfolds our higher nature, enriches our life, and leads us up toward all that is divine; hate teaches us the usefulness of many experiences in so far as they bring us into a full and complete understanding of that portion of our nature which needs most of all to be unfolded through education.—Lessie N. Goodell.

DUTY sometimes points us in one direction, inclination in another: if we follow the path of duty we shall have nothing to regret; but if we stray from it into the broad road of inclination, disappointment, dissatisfaction, and regret are sure to become the companions that will haunt our way.—Lessie N. Goodell.

GROWN towards manhood, and the infant garments cannot be strained on. Creeds and dogmas are such garments to the spirit. When the expanding mind is forced to take up its abode in the habiliments of the past, its best motives are crushed, its feelings are stifled, its holiest emotions dried up, and it becomes barren as the desert sands of Sahara, cold and frigid as the icebergs around the frozen poles.—Hudson Tuttle.

THERE is an instinctive and moral nature which is as truly a part of our being as is our reason, which teaches what reason could never teach, the supreme and transcendent excellence of moral good, which, rising dissatisfied above this world of sense, proves itself by the very intensity of its aspiration to be adapted for another sphere, and which constitutes at once the divine element within us, the augury of the future that is before us.—Buchanan.

WHAT, then, is the lesson of history? It is a voice sounding forever across the centuries the laws of right and wrong. Opinions alter, manners change, creeds rise and fall, but the moral law is written on the tablets of eternity. For every false word or unrighteous deed, for cruelty and oppression, for lust or vanity, the price has to be paid at last; not always by the chief offender, but by some one. Justice and truth alone endure and live. Injustice and falsehood may be long-lived, but dooms-day comes at last to them, in French Revolutions and other terrible ways.—Froude.

THE use of the words God, religion, heaven, and hell is strongly objectionable in all who really disbelieve in these things as distinctive identities. The terms have no meaning for any one who belongs to the Liberal school of thought. They are the exclusive property of the old mythologies; and there let them stay. It is all right to use them figuratively, just as we do the words fairylike, ghostlike, heavenly, depths of hell, etc. But to speak of nature or her active forces as God, or of science and philosophy as religion, is all nonsense, and the sooner we give up the words to their legitimate use, and create new ones adapted to the new condition of things, the better it will be for the progress and advancement of the true and the real.—Mrs. E. D. Slenker.

HEY who menace man's freedom of thought and speech are tampering with something more powerful than gunpowder. They who suppress by force even an erroneous book honestly meant for human welfare are justifying all the crimes ever committed against human intelligence; they are laying the trains that have always ended in revolution; and, right as it is to suppress books notoriously meant for corruption, and punish the vile who, through them, seek selfish ends at the cost of the public good, even that is a task requiring the utmost care and wisdom. Better that many base men and many bad books escape, than that one honest woman be robbed of her child by violence calling itself law, or one honest man suffer the felon's chain from the very hand provided for protection of honesty.—M. D. Conway.

GREAT is the consciousness of right. Sweet is the answer of a good conscience. He who pays his whole-hearted homage to truth and duty—who swears his lifelong fealty on their altars, and rises up a Nazareth consecrated to their holy service—is not without his solace and enjoyment, when to the eyes of others he seems the most lonely and miserable. He breathes an atmosphere which the multitude know not of; "a serene heaven which they cannot discern rests over him, glorious in its purity and stillness." Nor is he altogether without kindly human sympathies. All generous and earnest hearts which are brought in contact with his own beat evenly with it. All that is good and truthful and lovely in man, wherever and whenever it truly recognizes him, must sooner or later acknowledge his claims to love and reverence. His faith overcomes all things. The future unrolls itself before him, with its waving harvest-fields springing up from seed that he is scattering; and he looks forward to the close of life with the calm confidence of one who feels that he has not lived idle and useless, but with hopeful heart and strong arm has battled for the best.—John G. Whittier.

Odds and Ends.

WHAT SHE MEANT.—The young man was evidently honest in his intentions, but three years of constant courting had failed to overcome his excessive bashfulness. They were sitting in chairs at a respectable distance apart. Said the young man, having spent five minutes in search of a subject:

"How do you get along with your cooking?"

"Nicely," replied the young miss; "I'm improving wonderfully. I can make splendid cake now."

"Can you?" said the young man, in a pleased manner; "what kind do you like best?"

"I like one made with flour, and sugar, and citron, and raisins, and currants, and lots of those things, and beautiful frosting on top," responded the young miss.

"Why, that's a wedding cake," exclaimed the young man, nervously.

"I meant wedding," said the young miss, shyly.

They are published.

AN IRISH JOKE.—Barney O'Regan recently arrived in this country from ould Ireland, and probably Barney is as green as they make them in regard to persons and things on this side of the water.

The other day Barney was going up Broadway with me. As we reached Union Square, a sprinkling-cart came by. Nearly opposite us it commenced spurting out its dust-laying jet of water from the pipe at its rear. Barney looked at it for a second; then an expression of pity crossed his face.

"Poor man!" he said in a tone of sympathy.

"What's the matter, Barney?" asked I.

He pointed to the cart.

"Do yez see it?" he asked.

"Yes."

"Ain't it a murdhering shame?"

"What?"

"Shure, that poor man's cart is a-leaking, an' divil a person has got heart enough to tell him av it!" he answered.

THE MISER OUTWITTED.—It was observed that a certain covetous rich man never invited any one to dine with him.

"I'll lay a wager," said a wag, "I get an invitation from him."

The wager being accepted, he goes the next day to the rich man's house, about the time he was known to sit down to dinner, and tells his servant that he must then speak with his master, for that he could save him a thousand pounds.

"Sir," said the servant to his master, "here is a man in a great hurry wishing to speak with you who says he can save you a thousand pounds."

Out came the master.

"What is that you say, sir—that you can save me a thousand pounds?"

"Yes, sir, I can; but I see you are at dinner. I will go myself and dine, and call again."

"Oh, pray, sir, come in and take dinner with me,"

"Sir, I shall be troublesome."

"Not at all."

The invitation was accepted. As soon as dinner was over:

"Well, sir," said the man of the house, "now to business. Pray let me know how I am to save a thousand pounds."

"Why, sir," said the other, "I hear you have a daughter to dispose of in marriage."

"I have."

"And that you intend to portion her with ten thousand pounds."

"I do, sir."

"Why, then, sir, let me have her, and I will take her with nine thousand."

The master of the house rose in a passion, and turned him out of doors in a hurry.

A LETTER CARRIER'S LAMENT.

Through the great city, night and day,
In weather frigid, damp, or warm,
I roam in one unvaried way,
A Wandering Jew in uniform.

No passers by e'er pity find
For me, aristocrat of tramps;
And no one dreams that my poor mind
Can think of aught but postage stamps.

And yet that mind is wise and strong,
Containing information rare,
To speak of which would take too long,
And if I did, no one would care.

Now I most every day give forth
Two thousand letters, let me say,
From East to West, from South to North,
At various houses on my way.

But I am really forced to grieve;
I know not why such things should be,
For no fond note do I receive,
Nobody ever writes to me.

And oh, the sarcasm of my fate!
I, who a beauteous maiden love,
A girl whose eyes are dark and great,
A creature purer than a dove,

Receive no letter by her signed;
And yet from six A. M. till late,
I with vague yearnings undefined
Distribute mails and meekly wait.

And she has said she loved me well,
That I was her whole soul's delight,
Perhaps she don't know how to spell.
Or, much more likely, cannot write.

Alas! alas! could I obtain
One blotless line, there would be hope,
She writeth not—I wait in vain,
Perhaps she has no envelope.

So I, who think such fortune strange,
Will put Fate calmly on the shelf,
And for a most desirous change,
Will post a letter to myself.

Notes and Clippings.

MIRACLES are getting so common in France that they will soon cease to be miraculous. Ten more of them are reported from Lourdes.

IN 1794, there was to be a new church at Norridgewock, Maine, and it was "voted to buy one barrel of W. I. rum to be used at the raising."

NATHAN KANE and Lewis Tyman broke up a revival meeting in the open air near Culpepper, Va., by their quarrel over a hymn-book, which both wanted at once. The clergyman was unable to stop the fight, which ended in Kane being fatally cut with a razor.

A BOY recently asked William Lloyd Garrison for his autograph with the motto of The Liberator, "The United States is a covenant with Death and an agreement with Hell." Garrison wrote: "My country is the world; my countrymen are all mankind."

A GEORGIAN returned to his home after an absence of two weeks. His eight-year-old son loudly welcomed him. "Is everybody well, Willie?" the father asked. "The wellest kind," the boy replied. "And nothing has happened?" "Nothing at all. I've been good, Jennie's all right, and I never saw ma behave as well as she has this time."

THEY do say that an Edwards church deacon keeps a rooster that is quite gamey, and whose propensities to fight are indulged instead of restrained. Also that the said deacon invited two other deacons to dinner the other day, and that all hands afterward went out to see what the rooster could do, and that the unregenerate rooster did fasten himself in the flesh of a First Church deacon until pulled off by his owner, thereby occasioning considerable discomfort.

COL. INGERSOLL, in his new lecture on Burns, recites an original poem on the poet's birthplace, the last verse of which is as follows:

"Within this hollow hut I feel Like one who clasps a shrine,
When the glad lips at last have touched
The something deemed divine.
And here the world through all the years,
As long as day returns,
The tribute of its love and tears
Will pay to Robert Burns."

A PRESBYTERIAN clergyman in Russellville, Ark., said, in a sermon, that in a certain year the people of Missouri, by simultaneous religious services in the churches, prayed to God to deliver them from the scourge of grasshoppers, and that as soon as the prayers were commenced in the morning the grasshoppers began to leave, and by night the State was free from them. An incredulous deacon has gone to St. Louis to search files of newspapers in order to learn whether the preacher was correct.

A BUDDHIST priest near Foochow, China, burned one of his fingers off by holding it in the flame of a candle. He expects to be rewarded by eternal felicity. It is said, however, that he destroyed sensation in the finger before the burning by the use of a ligature. That pagan priest was just about as sensible as millions throughout Christendom who think they are building mansions in the New Jerusalem a little way above the clouds by performing certain acts and subscribing to certain articles of belief down here.

IN New York city there are over four hundred churches, and when a sensational preacher needs a summer in Europe, the pretty penitents, coercing their husbands, always see that the amount of money necessary is supplied. Brooklyn is called the City of Churches. Spires pierce the clouds on every block. The music of the chimes never ceases. And yet what have the churches of new York and Brooklyn done for the yellow fever victims? They should not allow the bar-rooms to surpass them in generosity.—Telegram.

OLD Satan himself is said to be the first tramp of whom we have any record. He answered the question, "Whence comest thou?" by "From going to and fro in the earth and from walking up and down in it." He seems also to have had a good many relatives who were also in the tramp business, to wit, the sons of God. Those were they who "saw the daughters of men, that they were fair; and they took them wives of all which they chose." Those are they who "came in unto the daughters of men, and they bare children unto them; the same became mighty men, which were of old men of renown." Hurrah for the tramps.

JUDGING by the following, the sun of obituary poetry appears to be rising in the West:

"DIED.—In the city prison, June 18th, of drunkenness, Alexander Kidrolivinsky, a priest.

"Open wider the golden gates
That lead to the heavenly shore;
Our pastor suffered passing through.
From the staggering load he bore.

Holy father, thou hast left us.
And thy loss we deeply feel;
But 'tis Whiskey that bereft us—
It can all our sorrows heal."

A REVEREND RASCAL.—A Western exchange contains an account of the Rev. Reuben White who has been guilty of the prevailing clerical sinfulness of getting one of his flock (Miss Bush) into an unfortunate condition, and of giving her some powerful drugs with a view of removing the little difficulty; the brother of the young woman sought the preacher out and demanded satisfaction, when the deacons of the church interfered and caused his arrest for carrying concealed weapons. The young lady died from the effects of the drugs, and the saintly preacher was arraigned before Justice Howe, charged with manslaughter in the attempt to kill the child, and which really killed mother and child both.

PHYSIOLOGICAL FACTS.

The humun lungs reverberate sometimes with great velocity
When windy individuals indulge in much verbosity.
They have to twirl the glottis sixty thousand times a minute,
And push and punch the diaphragm as though the deuce were in it.
CHORUS.—The pharynx now goes up;
The larynx, with a slam,
Ejects a note
From out the throat,
Pushed by the diaphragm.

—Harvard College Advocate.

SOME negroes of the fever-stricken Southern cities are behaving badly, it is said—refusing to help care for the sick or bury the dead unless paid exhorbitant wages. This is no doubt true, as it is equally true that other negroes in these cities behaved nobly, showing an unselfish devotion above all praise. The fact is that human nature is very much the same thing under a black skin as under a white one, and great public calamities, especially like that now wasting the Southwest, bring out the worst as well as the best that is in it. If the selfish negroes are censured, what shall we say of the rich white men of Memphis, the merchant princes, who ran away from the plague, and of whom the Avalanche reports that they have not even given any money for the relief of their poorer fellow townsmen?—Sun.

A CARD FROM THE CITY OF BROTHERLY LOVE.—The following letter is published in the Philadelphia Press, addressed to the editor: "SIR: I felt and feel a strong wish to give my mite, both of work and good will, to my suffering fellow-creatures in the fever smitten South, but the godly men of the 'Philadelphia Yellow Fever Committee' decline to 'open its doors' to the 'play people.' If these godly men will consent to receive my poor mite, I shall pass it through a chink, and as a further prevention against their being contaminated, I will agree to have the money fumigated. Though, with all respect to the 'Philadelphia Yellow Fever Committee,' I think when the 'gates of pearl' are thrown open, the actor, whose heart is ever ready and whose hand is ever outstretched to help his fellow-creatures, will have as warm a welcome and as clean a record as even the members of the 'Philadelphia Yellow Fever Committee.' In a long experience as an actress, this is the first instance that I have met with when a committee, formed to do a work of charity, turned its attention from its legitimate labor to insult an honorable profession. Permit me to call the attention of these gentlemen to the divine lesson of Paul to the Corinthians, that, 'Charity suffereth long and is kind; charity envieth not; charity vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up,' 'And now abideth faith, hope, charity; these three, but the greatest of these is charity.' Yours faithfully, ROSE EYTINGE."

RELIGIOUS physicians are getting into public notice just now in various parts of the country. Joel Mayn, a French Methodist exhorter in Wisconsin, professes the ability to cure all diseases by the simple laying on of hands. He is followed from place to place by sick persons, and marvelous stories of his powers find believers. A party of zealots in Mirable, Mo., attribute all diseases to the possession of devils; but in trying to cast the evil spirits out of John Ballinger, a typhoid fever patient, in spite of the opposition of his doctor and brother, they wrought him into such a frenzy that he died before they were through with their incantations. William Pinckney, a Charleston physician, has been arrested for making a lunatic of Estelle Swineton, aged fourteen. Pinckney usually lances his patient over the affected part, and applies a plaster of tar and soot; but in trying to cure the Swinton girl of weak-mindedness, he covered her head and body with sores, and made her a hopeless maniac. A man in Alabama advertises a salve that he says is made under divine guidance. Each box—price 25 cents—is made the subject of a separate prayer by the manufacturer that it will prove effective; and for double the regular price he will make a prayer especially suited to the case for which the salve is purchased.

THE fashionable women who are attendants of the Roman Catholic Cathedral at Three Rivers, Canada East, are very angry at Bishop Lafleche for a recent sermon in which he severely condemned the present tight-fitting gown, pronouncing it immoral and indecent and closing his diatribe by forbidding them to appear in the church in such attire. Some of the women went out while he was preaching, and most of them declare they will not enter the Cathedral again until he apologizes for the wanton insult he has offered them. They are unanimous in their opinion that it is no part of the Bishop's business to meddle with their clothes; that this belongs to the modiste, not the priest, and that they will wear what they like where they like, regardless of ecclesiastical dictation. They are plainly very wroth, and do not seem likely to be mollified until ample reparation has been offered. The prelates of the Roman Church are not in the habit of yielding to the laity in anything, and the laity are not in the habit of finding fault with the behavior of the clergy. But in this matter the women feel so deeply aggrieved, and are so particularly indignant, that we imagine that the Bishop will be obliged to recant. The Roman priest can do almost anything with the faithful, but he cannot safely undertake to regulate the garments of its feminine communicants. Nothing less than a papal bull—and scarcely that—will answer for such a purpose.

ONE of the saddest things about the yellow fever scourge in Memphis is, that just as the sickness is reaching its turning point, and the diminishing temperature begins to give notice of coming frost, many of the heroic men and women who remained in the city relieving the distress of the sick and the dying are themselves beginning to fall before the destroyer. Among them are not a few citizens who, if they had consulted their own convenience and safety, would have fled at the first outbreak of the epidemic, but chose rather to abide at the post of duty and of danger. Being acclimated, they have escaped attack until within the past week or ten days. An idea of the desolation which prevails in this afflicted city may be formed from the fact that, out of a population of sixty thousand, only about twenty-five hundred whites and six thousand blacks—less than one-sixth of the whole—remain within the city limits; and yet out of this small number of people a hundred have been dying daily, which gives the appalling death-rate of over one per cent a day of the resident population. The same death-rate applied to the million of people who inhabit Manhattan Island would produce over ten thousand deaths a day. Prayers for an early frost may well be devout in Memphis. When the pious whites and blacks get tired of praying to Jehovah and Mumbo-Jumbo, neither of whom will lift their little finger to check the yellow fever, they will have to wait for old Dame Nature to perform the cure, who, when the earth gets to the right point in its orbit, will send a frost which will kill old yellow Jack at once.

The five great main divisions of the organic history of the earth, or the palæontological history of development, we call the primordial, primary, secondary, tertiary, and quaternary epochs. Each is distinctly characterized by the predominating development of certain animal and vegetable groups in it, and we might accordingly symbolically designate the five epochs, on the one hand by the names of the groups of the vegetable kingdom, and on the other hand by those of the different classes of vertebrate animals. In this case the first, or primordial epoch, would be the era of the Tangles (Algæ) and skull-less Vertebrates; the second, or primary epoch, that of the Ferns and Fishes; the third, or secondary epoch, that of Pine Forests and Reptiles; the fourth, or tertiary epoch, that of Foliaceous Forests and of Mammals; finally, the fifth, or quaternary epoch, the era of Man and his Civilization. The divisions or periods which we distinguish in each of the five long eras are determined by the different systems of strata into which each of the five great rock-groups is divided. We shall now take a cursory glance at the series of these systems, and at the same time at the populations of the five great epochs.

The first and longest division of the organic history of the earth is formed by the primodial epoch or the era of the Tangle Forests. It comprises the immense period from the first spontaneous generation, from the origin of the first terrestrial organism, to the end of the Silurian system of deposits. During this immeasurable space of time, which in all probability was much longer than all the other four epochs taken together, the three most extensive of all the neptunic systems of strata were deposited, namely, the Laurentian, upon that the Cambrian, and upon that the Silurian system. The approximate thickness or size of these three systems together amounts to 70,000 feet. Of these about 30,000 belong to the Laurentian, 18,000 to the Cambrian, and 22,000 to the Silurian system. The average thickness of all the four other rock groups, the primary, secondary, tertiary, and quaternary, taken together, may amount at most to 60,000 feet; and from this fact alone, apart from many other reasons, it is evident that the duration of the primordial period was probably much longer than the duration of all the subsequent periods down to the present day. Many thousands of millions of years were required to deposit such masses of strata. Unfortunately, by far the largest portion of the primordial group of strata is in the metamorphic state (which we shall directly explain), and consequently the petrifactions contained in them—the most ancient and most important of all—have, to a great extent, been destroyed and become unrecognizable. Only in one portion of the Cambrian and Silurian strata have petrifactions been preserved in a recognizable condition and in large quantities. The most ancient of all distinctly preserved petrifactions has been found in the lowest Laurentian strata (in the Ottawa formation), which I shall afterwards have to speak of as the "Canadian Life's-dawn" (Eozoon canadense).

Although only by far the smaller portion of the primordial or archilithic petrifactions are preserved to us in a recognizable condition, still they possess the value of inestimable documents of the most ancient and obscure times of the organic history of the earth. What seems to be shown by them, in the first place, is that during the whole of this immense period there existed only inhabitants of the waters. As yet, at any rate, among all archilithic petrifactions, not a single one has been found which can with certainty be regarded as an organism which has lived on land. All the vegetable remains we possess of the primordial period belong to the lowest of all groups of plants, to the class of Tangles or Algæ, living in water. In the warm primeval sea, these constituted the forests of the primordial period, of the richness of which in forms and density we may form an approximate idea from their present descendants, the tangle forests of the Atlantic Sargasso sea. The colossal tangle forests of the archilithic period supplied the place of the forest vegetation of the mainland, which was then utterly wanting. All the animals, also, whose remains have been found in archilithic strata, like the plants, lived in water. Only crustacea are met with among the animals with articulated feet, as yet no spiders and no insects. Of vertebrate animals, only a very few remains of fishes are known as having been found in the most recent of all primordial strata, in the upper Silurian. But the headless vertebrate animals, which we call skull-less, or Acrania, and out of which fishes must have been developed, we suppose to have lived in great numbers during the primordial epoch. Hence we may call it after the Acrania as well as after the Tangle.

The primary epoch, or the era of Fern-Forests, the second main division of the organic history of the earth, which is also called the palæolithic or palæozoic period, lasted from the end of the Silurian formation of strata to the end of the Permian formation. This epoch was also of very long duration, and again falls into three shorter periods, during which three great systems of strata were deposited, namely, first, the Devonian system, or the old red sandstone; upon that the Carboniferous, or coal system; and upon this, the Permian system. The average thickness of these three systems taken together may amount to about 42,000 feet, from which we may infer the immense length of time requisite for their formation.

The Devonian and Permian formations are especially rich in remains of fishes, of primeval fish as well as enameled fish (Ganoids), but the bony fish (Teleostei) are absent from the strata of the primary epoch. In coal are found the most ancient remains of animals living on land, both of articulated animals (spiders and insects) as well as of vertebrate animals (amphibious animals, like newts and frogs). In the Permian system there occur, in addition to the amphibious animals, the more highly-developed reptiles, and indeed, forms nearly related to our lizards (Proterosaurus, etc.). But, nevertheless, we may call the primary epoch that of Fishes, because these few amphibious animals and reptiles are insignificant in comparison with the immense mass of palæozoic fishes. Just as Fishes predominate over the other vertebrate animals, so Ferns, or Filices, predominate among the plants of this epoch, and, in fact, real ferns and tree ferns (leafed ferns, or Phylopteridæ), as well as bamboo ferns (Calamophytæ) and scaled ferns (Lepidophytæ). These ferns, which grew on land, formed the chief part of the dense palæolithic island forests, the fossil remains of which are preserved to us in the enormously large strata of coal of the Carboniferous system, and in the smaller strata of coal of the Devonian and Permian systems. We are thus justified in calling the primary epoch either the era of Ferns or that of Fishes.

The third great division of the palæontological history of development is formed by the secondary epoch, or the era of Pine Forests, which is also called the mesolithic or mesozoic epoch. It extends from the end of the Permian system to the end of the Chalk formation, and is again divided into three great periods. The stratified systems deposited during this period are, first and lowest, the Triassic system, in the middle the Jura system, and at the top the Cretaceous system. The average thickness of these three systems taken together is much less than that of the primary group, and amounts as a whole only to about 15,000 feet. The secondary epoch can accordingly in all probability not have been half so long as the primary epoch.

Just as Fishes prevailed in the primary epoch, Reptiles predominated in the secondary epoch over all other vertebrate animals. It is true that during this period the first birds and mammals originated; at that time, also, there existed important amphibious animals, especially the gigantic Labyrinthodonts, in the sea the wonderful sea-dragons, or Halisaurii, swam about, and the first fish with bones were associated with the many primeval fishes (Sharks) and enameled fish (Ganoids) of the earlier times; but the very variously developed kinds of reptiles formed the predominating and characteristic class of vertebrate animals of the secondary epoch. Besides those reptiles which were very nearly related to the present living lizards, crocodiles, and turtles, there were, during the mesolithic period, swarms of grotesquely shaped dragons. The remarkable flying lizards or Pterosaurii, and the colossal land-dragons, or Dinosaurii, of the secondary epoch, are peculiar, as they occur neither in the preceding nor in the succeeding epochs. The secondary epoch may be called the era of Reptiles; but on the other hand, it may also be called the era of Pine Forests, or, more accurately, of the Gymnosperms, that is, the epoch of plants having naked seeds. For this group of plants, especially as represented by the two important classes—the pines, or Coniferæ, and the palm-ferns, or Cycadeæ—during the secondary epoch constituted a predominant part of the forests. But towards the end of the epoch (in the Chalk period) the plants of the pine tribe gave place to the leaf-bearing forests which then developed for the first time.

The fourth main division of the organic history of the earth, the tertiary epoch, or era of Leafed Forests, is much shorter and less peculiar than the first three epochs. This epoch, which is also called the cænolithic or cænozoic epoch, extended from the end of the cretaceous system to the end of the pliocene system. The strata deposited during it amount only to a thickness of about 3,000 feet, and consequently are much inferior to the first three great groups. The three systems also into which the tertiary period is subdivided are very difficult to distinguish from one another. The oldest of them is called eocene, or old tertiary; the newer miocene, or mid tertiary; and the last is the pliocene, or later tertiary system.

For pagan learning, the Christians generally had the strongest aversion. Among the monks, when they were under the vow of silence, it was customary with them in asking for any pagan work, to make a particular sign, which consisted in scratching the ears like a dog, to which it was thought the pagans should be compared. In this manner they expressed an itching for those dogs, Virgil, Horace, and Ovid. (See Disraeli's Cur. of Literature).

The fourth Council of Carthage forbade the reading of secular books by bishops. Jerome condemned the perusal of them except for pious purposes. The physical sciences were unqualifiedly condemned, as their cultivation was considered incompatible with the practice of religious duties. The Greek schools of medicine were closed. The Alexandrian Serapion, with its libraries and its museum, the accumulation of centuries, was destroyed under the archi-episcopate of Theophilus, A. D., 389, "and twenty years afterwards the empty shelves excited the regret and indignation of every intelligent spectator" (Art. Alexandria, Ency. Brit.). Many of the bishops in the Councils of Ephesus and Chalcedon, it is said, could not write their names. Ignorance was not considered a disqualification for ordination. No importance was attached to anything of an intellectual character except the childish and unintelligible controversies which were carried on for centuries. "These disputes," says Hallam, "diverted studious minds from profane literature and narrowed down more and more the circle of that knowledge which they were desirous to obtain" (Middle Ages, p. 453).

The monastic movement contributed to the decline of letters and decay of intellect. "I cannot conceive," says Hallam, "any state of society more adverse to the intellectual improvement of mankind, than one which admitted no middle line between dissoluteness and fanatical mortifications. . . . After the introduction of monkery with its unsocial theory of duties, the serious and reflecting part of mankind, on whom science most relies, were turned to habits which, in the most favorable view, could not quicken the intellectual energies; and it might be a difficult question whether the cultivators and admirers of useful literature were less likely to be found among the profligate citizens of Rome and their barbarous conquerers, or the melancholy recluses of the wilderness" (Middle Ages, p. 453).

We have already shown that the subversion of Rome was encouraged by the policy of the Christian Church. That the condition of affairs would have been creditable to the ecclesiastical system had Rome never been conquered by the barbarians, there is no reason to believe. Hallam thinks we may form some notion of how little probability there was of the Western Empire producing any excellent fruits, even if that revolution had never occurred, by considering what took place in Greece in the following ages, when "no original writer of any merit arose, and learning, though plunged for but a short period into mere darkness, may be said to have languished in a middle region of twilight for the greater part of a thousand years."

In the Western Empire, during a period of seven hundred years from the invasion of the barbarians, the Church exercised absolute and complete control; and then after the dissolution of the whole framework of Roman society, "she was left," as Lecky observes, "with a virgin soil to realize her ideal of human excellence."

What was the intellectual condition of those over whom she swayed her sceptre. For many centuries, we are told, a layman could rarely be found capable of signing his name; charters were subscribed with the mark of the cross; what little learning existed was confined chiefly to the clergy. A "cloud of ignorance overspread the whole face of the Church, hardly broken by a few glimmering lights, who owe almost the whole of their distinction to the surrounding darkness" (Middle Ages, p. 160).

In the sixth century the classics were scarcely read, and from the middle of this century to the eleventh, but little difference was discernible. "France reached her lowest point," says Hallam, "at the beginning of the eighth century, but England was, at that time, more respectable, and did not fall into complete degradation until the middle of the ninth. There could be nothing more deplorable than the state of Italy during the succeeding century. In almost every council the ignorance of the clergy forms a subject for reproach. It is asserted by one held in 992 that scarcely a single person was to be found, in Rome itself, who knew the first elements of letters. Not one priest of a thousand in Spain, about the age of Charlemagne, could address a common letter of salutation to one another" (Middle Ages, 460). The clergy could not translate a sentence of Latin. The homilies they preached were prepared from previous works of the same kind by some of the bishops.

It is not, as many suppose, creditable to the Church, that what little learning did exist was the boast of ecclesiastics, for Christianity made the cultivation of letters outside the Church absolutely impossible. Whoever wished to follow a life of study had to abandon secular pursuits and adopt the monastic life. "Mediæval Catholicism discouraged and suppressed in every way secular studies, while it conferred a monopoly of wealth, and honor, and power upon the distinguished theologian. Very naturally, therefore, it attracted into the path of theology the genius that would have existed without it, but would, under other circumstances, have been displayed in other forms" (Hist. Morals, vol. ii, p. 209).

In the monasteries, it is true, were kept all the libraries of Europe, but in these receptacles they conferred no blessings on mankind. Indeed a large number of the manuscripts of the classic authors that descended to us through the monasteries, were defaced, the original writing scraped off, and monkish tales and patristic fables substituted for it. "Not till the education of Europe passed from the monasteries to the universities, not till Mohammedan science and classical freethought and industrial independence broke the sceptre of the Church, did the intellectual revival of Europe begin" (Ibid, p. 206).

In view of the general and deplorable ignorance that existed, which the Church helped to produce and to perpetuate; of the general disuse of the Latin language, and of the use of the jargon which represented it, it is undeniable, I think, that there were certain circumstances in the Catholic system which contributed to prevent the extinction of learning, or the state of letters from becoming worse than it was. I do not refer to the monastic institutions as receptacles of learning. I allude to the perpetuation of Latin as a sacred language. Such was the intellectual condition of the world that the hope of literature depended very largely, almost wholly, on this language. Keeping the Scriptures and liturgy in that language after it had ceased to be spoken, insured the transmission to us of the literature of antiquity which those ecclesiastical ages were unable to appreciate, and the study of which, a little later, contributed to revive Europe from her intellectual torpor. It is not to the credit of the Catholic Church that she kept the Bible and her liturgy in a dead language. Indeed, for no other act has she been so severely condemned by the Protestant world. Yet this very policy on her part, under the circumstances, proved a blessing to mankind. "Every rational principle of religion," says Hallam, "called for such a change (translation of the Bible and liturgy), but it would have been made at the expense of posterity" (Middle Ages, p. 462).

It is common for Christian writers to speak of the service Christianity performed in preserving learning; but the fact is, that what Protestants call corruptions of the Christian system, and which they are accustomed to condemn, prevented affairs, when they had become so lamentable, from becoming more hopeless still, and rendered it possible for later ages to make use of the books which the Church had stowed away in monasteries, and which she now claims credit for not destroying, when she ought to have disseminated the knowledge they contained —in which case neither monastic institutions nor a sacred language would have been of any use. "There is certainly no adequate excuse," says Hallam, "for keeping the people in ignorance, and the gross corruptions of the Middle Ages are in a great degree assignable to this policy. But learning, and consequently religion, have eventually derived from it the utmost advantage" (Middle Ages, p. 462).

The Byzantine Empire, founded by the first Christian Emperor, existed nearly eleven centuries. Of that empire Lecky says: "The universal verdict of history is that it constitutes, with scarcely an exception, the most thoroughly base and despicable form that civilization has yet assumed. Though very cruel and very sensual, there have been times when cruelty assumed more ruthless, and sensuality more extravagant, aspects; but there has been no other enduring civilization so absolutely destitute of all the forms and elements of greatness, and none to which the epithet "mean" may be so emphatically applied. The Byzantine Empire was pre-eminently the age of treachery. Its vices were the vices of men who ceased to be brave without learning to be virtuous. Without patriotism, without the fruition or desire of liberty, after the first paroxysms of religious agitation, without genius or intellectual activity; slaves, and willing slaves, in both their actions and their thoughts, immersed in sensuality and in the most frivolous pleasures, the people only emerged from their listlessness when some theological subtlety, or some rivalry in the chariot races, stimulated them into frantic riots. . . .

"The history of the Empire is a monotonous story of the intrigues of priests, eunuchs, and women, of poisonings, of conspiracies, of uniform ingratitude, of perpetual fratricides. . . . At last the Mohammedan invasion terminated the long decreptitude of the Eastern Empire. Constantinople sank beneath the Crescent, its inhabitants wrangling about theological differences to the very moment of their fall.

"There! I've given you facts, arguments, statistics, cures, etc., and now we will leave dry details and wind up with a pretty little parable, and drop the subject, I hope forevermore, between you and me:

"'Then shall the kingdom of Satan be likened to a grain of tobacco-seed; which, though exceedingly small, being cast into the ground grew, and became a great plant, and spread its leaves rank and broad, so that huge and vile worms found a habitation thereon. And it came to pass, in the course of time, that the sons of men looked upon it, and thought it beautiful to look upon, and much to be desired to make lads look big and manly. So they put forth their hand, and did chew thereof. And some it made sick, and others to vomit most filthily. And it further came to pass that those who chewed it became weak and unmanly, and said, We are enslaved, and cannot cease from chewing it. And the mouths of all that were enslaved became foul, and they were seized with a violent spitting; and they did spit even in ladies' parlors, and in the house of the Lord of Hosts. And the saints of the Most High were greatly plagued thereby. And in the course of time it came also to pass that others snuffed it; and they were taken suddenly with fits, and they did sneeze with a great and mighty sneeze, insomuch that their eyes were filled with tears, and they did look exceedingly silly. And yet others cunningly wrought the leaves thereof into rolls, and did set fire to one end thereof, and did look very grave and calf-like; and the smoke of their torment ascendeth up forever and ever.

"'And the cultivation thereof became a great and mighty business in the earth; and the merchantmen waxed rich by the commerce thereof. And it came to pass that the saints of the Most High defiled themselves therewith; even the poor, who could not buy shoes, nor bread, nor books for their little ones, spent their money for it. And the Lord was greatly displeased therewith, and said, Wherefore this waste; and why do these little ones lack bread, and shoes, and books? Turn now your fields into corn and wheat, and put this evil thing far from you; and be separate, and defile not yourselves any more; and I will bless you, and cause my face to shine upon you.

"'But with one accord they all exclaimed, We cannot cease from chewing, snuffing, and puffing; we are slaves.'"

CHAPTER XIV.

"Dear Edith," said Sue, coming hastily, one pleasant afternoon, into the cool, vine-shaded little sitting-room of her friend; "Dear Edith, I heard that your mother had received another letter from her old friend Carrie Lena Brown, and that it contained news of my father; so I rode over with all speed to hear what it was. I know it is not good news, else my informant would have told me instead of referring me to you."

"Yes, Sue, mother did get a letter; but I would not read it if I were you. It will make you feel bad, and can do no possible good. I will tell you all you need to know, and let that suffice."

"No, Edith; I could never rest without knowing all, and therefore, if there is nothing of a private nature in the letter, I beg you will let me have it. I am prepared for the worst, as I heard he was dead. Though he was my father, yet I cannot really grieve, for now I know I shall never hear any more of his evil deeds, even if all hope of his becoming a better man is gone. I'm so glad I no longer believe in a place of torment for those unfortunately organized ones who find it so impossible to do right. Oh! how awful it would be if I thought as I once did—that all such as he would be compelled to suffer inconceivable fiery tortures during an endless eternity, with no hope of a reprieve—never, never, never!"

"Well, since you will be apt to hear, in time, at least a garbled account of your father's last days, I will get the letter of Miss Brown for you (mother always called her "Mrs.," out of courtesy for her situation, but I prefer plain fact, if it does seem a bit hard to bear; so I say "Miss;" though why men, whether they become fathers or not, always remain simple "Mr.," while once a woman becomes some man's property, whether she ever is a mother or not, she is marked by a different epithet, I can't tell, unless it is to show the balance of mankind that she is appropriated. But here I am philosophizing, while you are all anxiety. Somehow I don't like to be a peddler of ill news, even when I know it is better for you to hear it direct than as you otherwise will)."

Edith got the letter for her friend, and then considerately left her, on pretense of speaking to her mother, to read it by herself; and as she slowly and sadly unfolds the paper, we will glance over it as she reads:

"Well, my own dear Dora, I have told you all the general news, and now I will give you the last sad scene of the drama of my youthful days. It is finished, and all is over, and when I have told you the finale I hope never to be obliged to recur to it again. You may do as you think best about informing his children of what I write. You remember my telling you of the sudden departure of Deacon Conway from this place after his deception concerning those stolen sermons. Well, I sent him my letter that I told you of, the day before he left, and hoped he would once more drop out of my life, and for good and all. But two weeks ago I went to see a friend at L——, about one hundred miles east of here, and while there she and I took one of those pleasant walks in the woods I have always so enjoyed, and we came upon a small foot-path leading to a little spring. As I was dipping up some water in a leaf-cup, I was startled by hearing a groan, as of a person in distress. Peering through the bushes at my right, I saw the form of a man stretched upon the ground, and, hastening to the spot, I said, 'Can I do anything for you, sir?—you seem in distress.' At the sound of my voice he raised his face from the ground, and, looking up, disclosed the countenance of Charles Henry Conway. But oh! how changed! He seemed to have fallen away till only the dry skin was drawn over the bones, and death had stamped its seal on every feature. 'Water! water!' was all he could say. My friend hastened to bring some, and when he had with difficulty swallowed it he seemed to revive somewhat, and said, 'Oh! is it you, dear Carrie? And did God send you here to soothe my last hours? Four days have I lain here alone and dying, and oh! what horrible thoughts I have endured! And every night Satan comes to gloat over his expected prey. He taunts me, and casts up everything I have ever done, and defies me to show him one clean page on all my life-record, or one good, noble, true action. But, Carrie, you remember me when I was not all bad. You know how we used to roam those beautiful woods back of your home, hand in hand, and talk of good, true, and noble purposes. But somehow those good spells were very short, and the bad in me grew and increased daily, and after I left you, my pure guiding-star, I lost my only hold upon true goodness, and became a heartless, selfish hypocrite. Yet I believed in my religion. That was not hypocrisy. I somehow thought that by my prayers, and reading God's Word, and building up his Church, I could doubly atone, in his eyes, for all the sins I might do. But now that it is too late, I see how I have wasted my life and caused sorrow and unhappiness to all those whom I should have blessed. I've had time to think since I've lain here suffering and helpless, but what good has it done? I am doomed, doomed! I feel already the fires of hell burning and scorching my very vitals, and the red-hot prongs of the demon's fork tossing me about in that horrid, hissing, burning lake.' He fainted as he said the last words, and we brought water and once more revived him. He opened his eyes, smiled, and handed me a letter, saying, 'I have written this for you as I lay here dying. It will tell you why I am here and thus—— But look! see! There he comes—Satan himself! He holds out his hand to me and smiles triumphantly. Yes! yes! I am yours.' And with these words he extended his feeble, trembling arm, and seemed to lay his cold, clammy fingers into some imaginary palm; then, with a wild scream and a convulsive shudder, his life went out from him forever.

"Of course we had his body taken to the house, and at the inquest I briefly told the story of our finding him dying, and that he had seemed in great mental and bodily distress, but had passed away before either of us had thought to ask him why he was there or how he happened to be in such a condition. He had been heard quarreling with a tramp some days before, and it was supposed he received his death-wound afterwards from this man, who had met or lured him to this lonely spot. I said nothing of my letter, as it would do no good—only showed it to my friend, who promised never to reveal the secret. To you I will just briefly tell the substance of it, and a few facts I gathered afterwards from the brother, as the letter is burned now, and I can only speak from memory.

BINGHAMTON, N. Y., Sept. 10, 1878.

The Susquehanna and Chenango Valleys Association of Spiritualists will hold their Third Annual Meeting at Binghamton, N. Y., in Leonard's Hall and Grove, on Saturday and Sunday, Oct. 5th and 6th. For speakers, Giles B. Stebbins and Lyman C. Howe will be present, and other speakers and mediums are expected to attend. A general good time is anticipated. All Liberals are invited to participate. Board can be had for one dollar per day.

Communications.

The Bull by the Horns.

It is a trick of power, as old as tyranny itself, to charge upon its subjects the crime which it is itself plotting to commit. How often we heard of the latest and meanest Napoleon stirring up tumult among his people in order to have an excuse for forging new chains to hold them in subjection. And now here is a new imitator of the hero of the coup d'etat This whole conglomerate of Call, Card, Platform, and Editorial Fulmination is based upon an absolute phantasm and fraud. The "private letter" on which they are founded is, without doubt, a fabrication. It has been laboriously and cunningly concocted in the Candidate Editor's own office. No Liberal who knows anything of Liberal opinion or Liberal action in this city and State ever wrote such a letter, except by inspiration from the volunteer candidate himself. The editorial statement also that "from numerous independent sources during the past few months we have received information that a secret movement is on foot to surprise and capture the National Liberal League at its next annual congress for the purpose of making it reverse its record," is equally false. The Candidate-Editor has heard of no such "secret movement" from even one source, because there has been no such movement; and the Liberals of New York challenge and defy the coy and modest volunteer candidate to reveal a single one of those sources of information, to give the name of the author of the "private letter," and substantiate the charges based upon them. I think I know something of the thinkings and doings of the Liberals of New York city; and I swear—and I mean by that all that the word implies—that I never heard of any "secret plots" nor "secret movements" to "surprise and capture the congress," nor to "seize the organization of the convention," and I know there have been no such secret movements nor plots. Conversations and exchanges of opinions, informally and socially, when Liberals have met, there have undoubtedly been; and the coming congress has been looked forward to as likely to bring about a change in the Presidency and general management of the League; but no one has ever thought of attempting it by secret methods or violent proceedings, or made the faintest suggestion of securing such change in any other than through the regular constitutional way. But this revelation of the spirit and animus of the arch "despiser of coyness and false modesty" makes one thing plain. He very well apprehends the fate that awaits him, and even the most quiet and regular voting him down and out, and his platform into the waste basket, will be "seizing the organization" and "capturing the convention." That is what makes him scare so, and that is what inspires this insane and unprecedented attempt to bulldoze "by the horns" all Liberals who venture to think Mr. Abbot is not exactly the owner of the League. At Watkins we simply did firmly and regularly, but respectfully, what majorities may of right do. At Syracuse, the delegates there gathered will do the same, and the minority will either submit or resign. A candidate and would-be leader, then, who is reduced to dealing in insinuations, without giving any better basis for them than a "private letter" from a writer who is not able to accept the responsibility of putting his name to it, is far gone towards that class of unfortunates whom the gods wish to destroy. Salt cannot save him, and no hellebore can cure.

In one of the good old-fashioned Democratic conventions held in this same Syracuse, after "the slate" had worked smoothly and the two or three leading nominations had been safely effected, one old politician appropriately named Stryker, stepped up to Dean Richmond, the chief fugleman of the machine, and asked, "Well, Dean, who have you got on the slate for Canal Commissioner?" Dean replied with a bland smile, "I don't know. Probably the convention will select some good man." Whereupon Stryker, in mortal terror, burst out: "Hell and damnation! You aint a going to leave it to the convention?"

It is well for human progress that discovery and invention are continually improved upon. One new wrinkle after another is added till any given machine attains perfect powers and proportions. The people of the present age will hardly recognize the old Democratic machine under cover of the improvements some Liberal inventors and manipulators in Boston have put upon it. Here and in this cultured age and town the officers of the Liberal League nominate themselves and accompany the nomination with a threat; "the slate" is broken and its beneficent uses done away with altogether; the Local Leagues are directed to select their delegates, certify them, and then send their names and certificates to the officers now in power, who have nominated themselves for re-election, in order that the views of the delegates and the way they are likely to vote may be passed upon by these same self-nominated officers bent upon holding on to their power. The early Butler delegates catching a hall in Worcester last week is a trick worth a great deal less than this. Even if there was no "nigger" in this fence, it would be suspicious, vexatious, and the extremest of red tape. Even Annual and Charter members, with certificates in their pockets, and their addresses already on the books of the League or of the Index which is sent to them every week, must spend time, postage, and red tape to write to Boston, send their addresses and ask the proprietor of the League if he will kindly certify that they are Annual, Charter, or other members, and entitled to seats in the convention.

Compare the "call" of last year with this one. No machinery of this kind was set up for that convention. Delegates presented themselves at Rochester with their credentials in hand, and there was no objection to their admission. What has occurred to make such extraordinary formalities necessary now? What but that this "despiser of coyness and false modesty," about to steal an office, "doth fear each bush an officer," and cannot trust the Leaguers in Convention assembled after having so outrageously misrepresented them.

The "repeal party" have no platform nor candidate to present to the Liberal public, neither "with equal frankness" nor with equal coyness and false modesty, nor at the demand of a candidate who usurps the power of examining the credentials of candidates. The Convention is the place to present both platform and candidate; and, in full view of the peril of "hell and damnation" anathematized upon us by this Pope who issues bulls and proposes to pack a congress to suit his own views, we "leave it to the Convention."

The despiser of "coyness and false modesty" says: "We propose to take the bull by the horns. We propose to fight darkness with light—secret plots with public discussion." Now really! One would think so! Any reader of The Index must have been struck with the ardent preference of the Candidate-Editor for light rather than darkness. See with what avidity he hastened to lay before Index readers no word, account, or quotation from Mr. Wakeman's masterly and unanswerable argument for repeal of the Comstock Postal laws. All readers of The Index will remember with what delight they failed to find that argument in its columns, and had to subscribe for THE TRUTH SEEKER to get it. Also the Watkins Convention, which the Call writer flings at as an "irresponsible mass-meeting," because he had not the certifying of the credentials of its delegates nor the dictating of its resolutions—the despiser of "coyness and false modesty" and the lover of light will some day conclude to hear of that Convention and publish its resolutions as the expression of the opinions of an important body of Liberals in an important State.

Now, Liberals of the National League, there is no occasion for any alarm. There is no real feud or schism, or scarcely disagreement in the Liberal ranks. There is only one marplot, and he can be easily displaced. With him either submissive or resigned, the Liberal force would march on unobstructed and undivided. For the present we must accept his informalities and irregularities and meet him in convention. Then, all we shall have to do will be to take those crumpled horns by the entire bull and crush him under the Liberal locomotive against which he is so vainly and stupidly butting. A candidate who doesn't know enough to "look out for the engine when the bell rings" is not fit to be President of the National Liberal League.

Let all Local Leagues select their delegates early, and send full representation to Syracuse. We await the result with confidence.

THERON C. LELAND.

A Private Letter.

DEAR BENNETT: The following, although a "private letter," has a responsible name to it, and is righteous indignation poured out from a good and honest heart. It ought to be printed, and I know friend Green will excuse me for letting THE TRUTH SEEKER readers see it. T. C. L.

SALAMANCA, N. Y., Sept. 20, 1878.

FRIEND LELAND: I have just been reading the Index, and will admit the truth. I am mad, too mad to write a letter, but writing may relieve me a little. The National League Congress has been called to meet at Syracuse, Oct. 26th, and no one is to be admitted to the hall but those who have a certificate from Abbot. I am one of the Directors, and have worked night and day for the League during the past year, and I have not been consulted in the least as to the time, place, or arrangements. Abbot sent me his card, asking me to sign it and join the other Directors in being candidates for re-election and in laying down a platform for the Congress; and because I preferred to leave all these questions to the Congress, and objected to making an ass of myself, he went into a "huff" and consulted me no further. I sent a long report of the Watkins Convention to The Index, but he found no place for it, as he has found none for our resolutions.

Now what shall we do? That is the question for consideration. I have no objection to the place; it is my old home, and I have lots of friends there whom I can count on to stand by the right. I am confident we can get delegates enough present to frustrate Abbot's plan of putting the convention in his pocket. Shall we do it? I hope the friends in New York will at once get together and consult and see what is the best thing to do. I would like to meet with you, and I will try to come down and consult with you. This is my position. I think the only ground of recognition as a Liberal Leaguer should be, "Are you in favor of the entire separation of Church and State? if so, I care not what you may think on other questions."

The course Abbot is taking is a great outrage, and will destroy the Liberal League party unless the Liberals generally will come to the rescue. You can depend upon five delegates from this county who will stand for the right, and I am confident the delegates generally from western and central New York will be all right. But I will write no more. I am not in condition to write. I am too excited. Let me hear from you at once. Yours for justice,

H. L. GREEN.

Free Religious Convention.

A two days' meeting of Spiritualists and Liberals will be held at Garrettsville, Ohio, on Saturday and Sunday, Oct. 5 and 6, 1878. Able and eloquent speakers will be present. Among them, A. B. French, Hudson Tuttle (one or both expected), A. J. Fishback, Frederick K. Gillette, and others. Arrangements will be made to accomodate all who come, and a cordial invitation is extended to all. It is intended to make this a gathering of the earnest-minded who are seeking fellowship in wider thoughts and nobler hopes than are contained in a theology—"old overmuch."

A Letter From Boston.

BOSTON, MASS., Sept. 22, 1878.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: In The Index of Sep. 19, I read an editorial article in reference to the approaching congress of the Liberal League and the contest over the question of the repeal of the United States obscenity law likely to be precipitated there. In it the writer, Mr. Abbot, charged the "repealers" with resorting to "tricks of intrigue, misrepresentation, and abuse," insinuated that they were sneaking cowards, accused them of "underhanded operations," and flourishingly proclaimed the purpose of the modificationists to henceforth "fight darkness with light, and secret plots with public discussion." Learning that there was to be a meeting of the Paine Hall Liberal League to-day for the election of officers and the choice of delegates to the congress, I attended it, simply as a spectator, however, for I am not a member of the League. The proceedings which I witnessed there were somewhat amusing when viewed in connection with the editorial above referred to.

A very proper objection was entered at the outset by Mr. J. S. Verity that the meeting was an irregular one and ought to be at once adjourned, only a portion of the members having been notified; but this was overruled, the majority seeming to think that as long as they were present it was of no consequence whether the other members knew anything about the affair. A motion was then passed that the election of officers be proceeded with, whereupon Mr. Sawtelle, one of Mr. Abbot's lieutenants, arose, with a paper in his hand, and said that the "committee had decided to submit the following names as officers for the coming year." "What committee?" "Who appointed them?" "Where did it get its power?" were the questions loudly asked on all hands. "Oh!" said Mr. Sawtelle, "the Board of Directors." "But what right have they got to select a list of officers?" asked Mr. John Davies. "Why," said Mr. Sawtelle, "they arranged this list because they thought it would be a harmonious working force. The members of the League have shown a generous confidence in their Directors heretofore, and I hope they will not withdraw it not." But all the members did not seem to place the trust in Mr. Sawtelle and his associates that they thought themselves worthy of, and were inclined to view the action of the Board as an unwarrantable exhibition of cheek. Accordingly, they upset this "secret plot" by a little "public discussion," and informed Mr. Sawtelle that if he wished to do any nominating he must do it on his own responsibility. A ballot was then proceeded with, and Mr. Sawtelle, thwarted in his "cut-and-dried" project, was obliged to content himself with industriously, though rather officiously, circulating ballots containing the names of his favorites.

After the officers had been elected, a delegation of five was chosen to attend the annual congress, consisting of B. F. Underwood, Mrs. Hope Whipple, John S. Verity, Frank Rivers, and Henry Damon. Two of these are pronounced "repealers," two pronounced "modificationists," and one doubtful. And thus Mr. Abbot's friends, instead of adopting the method of open combat, as they had promised, have fought their first battle by an attack in the rear. If Mr. Abbot really wishes, as he says, to "take the bull by the horns," I will gratuitously inform him that the horns are not situated at that end of the animal.

Sincerely yours, BENJAMIN R. TUCKER.

Constitution of the National Defense Association.

PREAMBLE.

WHEREAS, We, the undersigned, citizens of the United States, and of the State and county of New York, friends of liberty, justice, and equality, of freedom of thought, speech, and press, having observed the pernicious and outrageous application of certain special laws by the agent of a "Society for the Suppression of Vice," at the request of which society these laws were enacted; having seen the strong hand of the law misapplied in the persecution of good citizens and incarceration of honorable men through the operations of this society and its agent; having become familiar with these special laws framed for the ostensible purpose of suppressing vice and obscenity, though secretly aiming to destroy the dearest privileges of the American citizen, and knowing them to be indefinite and ambiguous, capable of being employed to prevent and punish the honest expression of opinion on questions relating to religion, morals, and science; furthermore, believing these laws, as recently interpreted, to be clearly unconstitutional, impolitic, and subversive of the liberties of the people as granted by the Constitution, and remembering the pertinent maxim of the eminent statesman, James Madison, "It is proper to take alarm at the first experiment on our liberties;"

Therefore we, the undersigned, declare our abhorrence of these encroachments on our liberties and the revival of inquisitorial and inhumanitarian practices, do hereby associate ourselves together as a permanent organization, with the trite maxim, "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty," as our watchward, and adopt the following

CONSTITUTION:

Article I. The name of this Association shall be "The National Defense Association—a Society for the Promotion of Virtue."

Art. II. The objects of this Association are to investigate all questionable cases of prosecution, under what are known as the Comstock laws, State and National, and to extend sympathy, moral support, and material aid to those who may be unjustly assailed by the enemies of free speech and free press;

To rescue those who may be convicted and imprisoned for no other crime than exercising the natural right of an American citizen, to think his thought and express it orally or in print;

To defend honest investigators in all departments of science, and to uphold the rights of the people to acquire a thorough knowledge of human physiology;

Finally, to employ all peaceful and honorable means to roll back the wave of intolerance, bigotry, and ignorance which threatens to submerge our cherished liberties.

Art. III. Membership.—Any friend of the cause may become an active member of this Association by the payment into its treasury of the sum of ten dollars ($10.00), and the payment of one dollar ($1.00) shall entitle the donor to a certificate of honorary membership for the period of one year, and to a report from the officers of this Association of its receipts, disbursements, and transactions.

Art. IV. The officers of the society shall consist of a President, Vice-President, Secretary, Treasurer, and a Local Executive Committee of five, the duties of whom shall be those usually appertaining to these offices. These officers shall constitute a Board of Directors, and three shall be a quorum. The Board of Directors shall be empowered to add to the Executive Committee the names of persons in other cities, who shall give their consent, whose duty it shall be to inform the Association of cases in their localities deserving of its action and aid, to receive pledges and donations for the treasury, which shall be forwarded to the Treasurer, and to act as agent for the Association in carrying out its objects in such manner as may be expedient.

Art. V. The time and place of meeting shall be declared before the adjournment of each previous meeting, in default of which, or when otherwise necessary, regular meetings may be called by the President, Secretary, and a member of the Executive Committee.

The National Defense Association is now a fixed institution and holds regular meetings for the purpose of discussing ways and means to further its objects and accomplish its purposes. All Liberals living in New York city are invited to correspond with the Secretary to learn of the time and place of meetings, to interest themselves personally by becoming active members, and lend their advice and experience in the matters which come up for deliberation. Friends living elsewhere may increase the strength and usefulness of the Association by sending for a certificate of honorary membership under the conditions referred to in Art. III. of the Constitution. This will create a fund of ready cash in the treasury, which will be very serviceable in carrying on such minor operations as may be deemed advisable. The Association is formed not only for defense, but, as the last paragraph of Art. II. of the Constitution indicates, it includes within its scope the effort to create public sentiment in favor of its objects, to enlighten lawmakers of the injustice of existing laws, and, in fact, to do as much as possible to ward off future assaults upon natural rights. Something has already been done in this line by disseminating Mr. Wakeman's clear exposition of the unconstitutionality of the Comstock Postal law, but this very convincing argument should be spread far and wide, and especially where it will "do the most good." Judge Clifford's harsh sentence of Mr. Heywood was given before he had been fully informed of the true state of things, for since the Indignation Meeting at Faneuil Hall has opened his eyes to the fact that there are deep principles involved, he has taken the pains to consider the construction of the Postal law, and his reason teaches him what it will any one else who exercises it in this matter, that the law is not fit to remain on the statute books of an intelligent nation. If Mr. Wakeman's argument had been placed in Judge Clifford's hands earlier, a great deal of trouble might have been saved, and possibly if the Supreme Court Judges had each been presented with a copy before giving their last decision on the subject, they would have been saved the unpleasantness of reversing their own opinions, or the ignominy of having them reversed by their successors—as will surely occur some day.

It is necessary that Judges, Congressmen, and all others who may have any influence in the framing of laws, should be well informed on this very important subject, and it is regarded as a very fitting work for the National Defense Association to do. A great deal of this kind of work can be done if its friends will contribute according to their ability, and enroll themselves on the list of honor. The pledges are all appreciated, and are of use in making known who and how much may be depended upon in time of great necessity; but a little ready cash put to such good uses as above explained may ward off large disbursement in the work of actual defense, as a stitch in time saves nine.

The blank Certificates of Membership—about as large as a greenback and illustrated with appropriate designs—are now ready, and the Secretary is willing to fill them out till his hand cramps, or to hire assistants to do it at his own expense, if the demand for them becomes great.

A Note from "Anti-Fraud."

MR. EDITOR: You omitted—inadvertently, probably—a sentence or two in my last communication. I stated, or meant to state, that the letter sent was from a prominent Spiritualist, whose name I would give if the substantial correctness of the conversation were denied by Col. Mackay himself.

That Mr. Jenkins' communications, with their sensational heading, "A Week with the Ghosts," are helping advertise Mott admits of no doubt. How far the writer is influenced by a desire to help Mott is known, of course, only to himself. It is not likely he is entirely indifferent to the personal welfare of such an extraordinary man as he represents Mott to be. That he is in the paid interest of Mott & Co. I have not alleged. That he was influenced to give his "Week with the Ghosts" by the medium and his friends was not an unreasonable inference, considering the fact that Mott had been exposed, and Spiritualists as well as non-Spiritualists had lost confidence in him and his performances. That Mr. Jenkins believes in Mott's ridiculous claims I believe, not only from his own statements, but from others that I have read; but that Mott is a fraud in the claims he makes, and that he has been fully exposed, and can be again, if he will submit to conditions that do not prevent the possibility of his detection, I firmly believe. But exposed mediums seem to thrive about as well after exposure as before. Credulous men like Mr. Jenkins will continue to give them their sympathy and support.

Mr. Bennett is responsible for nothing I have written, nor is there any reason at present why Anti-Fraud should give his real name. ANTI-FRAUD.

[The fault is partly ours and partly "Anti-Fraud's." The statement was embodied in a note which seemed not to be intended to be printed.—ED. T. S.]

Literary Piracy.

MR. EDITOR: Nearly the whole two columns in the last TRUTH SEEKER under the title "If you Take Away my Religion, What will you Give me in its Stead," "Delivered before the Newark Liberal League, June 2, 1878, by H. B. Martin, M.D.," is taken, almost word for word, from an address by B. F. Underwood. To give and publish another's lecture as his own may accord with Dr. Martin's idea of honor and honesty, but some persons regard it as a very grave offense. The first lesson of Liberalism is honesty.

Astronomy.

ADAPTED FROM THE LATEST AND BEST AUTHORITIES.

To the unaided eye Venus presents the appearance of a mere star, distinguishable from other stars only by its intense brilliancy. But when Galileo examined this planet with his telescope, he found it to exhibit phases like those of the moon. Desiring to take time to assure himself of the reality of his discovery, without danger of losing his claim to priority through some one else in the mean time making it independently, he published the following anagram, in which it was concealed:

"Hæc immatura a me jam frustra leguntur o. y."
(These unripe things are now vainly gathered by me).

By transposing the letters of this sentence he afterwards showed that they could be made into the sentence,

"Cynthiæ figuras æmulatur mat amorum"
(The mother of the loves imitates the phases of Cynthia).

That the disk of Venus was not round was first noticed by Galileo in September, 1610. A computation of its position at that time shows that it must have been a little gibbous, more than half of its face being illuminated; but after a few months it changed into a crescent. Therefore Galileo could not have found it necessary to wait long before explaining his anagram.

The variations of the aspect and apparent magnitude of Venus are very great. When beyond the sun, it is at a distance of 160,000,000 miles, and presents the appearance of a small round disk 10 seconds in diameter. When nearest the earth, it is only 25,000,000 miles distant; and if its whole face were visible, it would be more than 60 seconds in diameter. But, being then on the same side of the sun with us, its dark hemisphere is turned towards us, except, perhaps, an extremely thin crescent of the illuminated hemisphere. Between these two positions it goes through all the intermediate phases, the universal rule of which is that the nearer it is to the earth, the smaller the proportion of its apparent disk which is illuminated; but the larger that disk would appear could the whole of it be seen. Its greatest brilliancy occurs between the time of its greatest elongation from the sun and its inferior conjunction.

The earlier telescopists naturally scrutinized the planets very carefully, with a view of finding whether there were any inequalities or markings on their surfaces from which the time of rotation on their axes could be determined. In April, 1667, Cassini saw, or thought he saw, a bright spot on Venus, by tracing which for several successive evenings he found that the planet revolved in between 23 and 24 hours. Sixty years later Blanchini, an Italian astronomer, supposed that he found seven spots on the planet, which he considered to be seas. By watching them from night to night, he concluded that it required more than 24 days for Venus to revolve on its axis. This extraordinary result was criticised by the second Cassini, who showed that Blanchini, only seeing the planet a short time each evening, and finding the spots night after night in nearly the same position; concluded that it had moved very little from night to night; whereas, in fact, it had made a complete revolution, and a little more. At the end of 24 days it would be seen in its original position, but would have made 25 revolutions in the mean time, instead of one only, as Blanchini supposed. This would make the time of rotation 23 hours, 2 1-2 minutes, while Bassini found 23 hours 15 minutes from his father's observations.

Between 1788 and 1793 Schröter applied to Venus a mode of observation similar to that he used to find the rotation of Mercury. Watching the sharp horns when the planet appeared as a crescent, he thought that one of them was blunted at certain intervals. Attributing this appearance to a high mountain, as in the case of Mercury, he found a time of rotation of 23 hours 21 minutes.

On the other hand, Herschel was never able to see any permanent markings on Venus. He thought he saw occasional spots, but they varied so much and disappeared so rapidly that he could not gather any evidence of the rotation of the planet. He therefore supposed that Venus was surrounded by an atmosphere, and that whatever markings might be occasionally seen were due to clouds or other varying atmospheric phenomena.

In 1842, De Vico, of Rome, came to the rescue of the older astronomers by publishing a series of observations tending to show that he had rediscovered the markings found by Blanchini more than a century before. He deduced for the time of rotation of the planet 23 hours 21 minutes 22 seconds.

The best informed astronomers of the present day look with suspicion on nearly all these observations, being disposed to sustain the view of Herschel, though on grounds entirely different from those on which he founded it. It is certain that there are plenty of observers of the present day, with instruments much better than those of their predecessors, who have never been able to see any permanent spots. The close agreement between the times of rotation found by the older observers is indeed striking, and might seem to render it certain that they must have seen spots which lasted several days. It must also be admitted in favor of these observers that a fine steady atmosphere is as necessary for such observations as a fine telescope, and it is possible that in this respect the Italian astronomers may be better situated than those farther north. But the circumstances that the deduced times of rotation in the cases both of Mercury and Venus differ so little from that of the earth is somewhat suspicious, because if the appearance were due to any optical illusion, or imperfection of the telescope, it might repeat itself several days in succession, and thus give rise to the belief that the time of rotation was nearly one day. The case is one on which it is not at present possible to pronounce an authoritative decision; but the balance of probabilities is largely in favor of the view that the rotation of Venus on its axis has never been seen or determined by any of the astronomers who have made this planet an object of study.

The appearance of Venus when nearly between us and the sun affords very strong evidence of the existence of an atmosphere. The limb of the planet farthest from the sun is then seen to be illuminated, so that it appears as a complete circle of light. If only half the globe of the planet were illuminated by the sun, this appearance could never present itself, as it is impossible for an observer to see more than half of a large sphere at one view. There is no known way in which the sun can illuminate so much more than the half of Venus as to permit a complete circle of light to be seen except by the refraction of an atmosphere.

The appearance to which we allude was first noticed by David Rittenhouse, of Philadelphia, while observing the transit of Venus on June 3d, 1769. When Venus had entered about half way upon the sun's disk, so as to cut out a notch of the form of a half-circle, that part of the edge of the planet which was off the disk appeared illuminated so that the outline of the entire planet could be seen. As this appearance was not confirmed by other observers, it seems to have excited no attention. But it was found by Mädler in 1849 that when Venus was near inferior conjunction, the visible crescent extended through more than a half circle. This showed that more than half the globe of Venus was illuminated by the sun, and Mädler, computing the refractive power of the atmosphere which would be necessary to produce this effect, found that it would exceed that of our own atmosphere; the horizontal refraction being 44 minutes, whereas on the earth it is only 34 minutes. He therefore concluded that Venus was surrounded by an atmosphere a little more dense than that of the earth.

The next important observation of the kind was made by Professor C. S. Lyman, of Yale College. In December, 1866, Venus was very near her node at inferior conjunction, and passed unusually near the line drawn from the earth to the sun. Examining the minute crescent of the planet with a moderate-sized telescope, he found that he could see the entire circle of the planet's disk, an exceedingly thin thread of light being stretched round the side farthest from the sun. So far as known, this was the first time that the whole circle of Venus had been seen in this way since the time of Rittenhouse. It is remarkable that both observations should have been made by isolated observers in America.

Notwithstanding the concurrent testimony of Rittenhouse, Mädler, and Lyman, the bearing of their observations on what was to be expected during the transit of Venus in December, 1874, was entirely overlooked. Accordingly, many of the observers were quite taken by surprise to find that when Venus was partly on and partly off the sun, the outline of that part of her disk outside the sun could be distinguished by a delicate line of light extending around it. In some cases the time of internal contact at egress of the planet was missed, through the observer mistaking this line of light for the limb of the sun.

Voltaire in Exile.

HIS LIFE AND WORK IN FRANCE AND IN FOREIGN LANDS.

BY M. GASTINEAU.

(Translated for THE TRUTH SEEKER.)

II.

Voltaire, banished from France, chose for his residence London, where existed neither Bastille nor bastinadoes for philosophers, nor Jesuits to prevent their speech, and where, to use his own expression, "reason knew no restraint."

England was then full of Freethinkers and Whigs. An ancestor, a father of free thought, Shaftesbury, was dead, as well as the celebrated philosopher Locke, the author of the "Essay on the Understanding," the apostle of political and religious liberty. But Toland, Collins, Wollaston, and Tindal were yet living when Voltaire landed in London. Bolingbroke, pardoned, had returned from France. Wollaston had just published his "Discourse Against the Miracles of Jesus Christ," the journalist, Richard Steele, colleague of Addison in the Spectator, his ringing pamphlets, and Bolingbroke, his learned criticisms on Christianity.

Politics, philosophy, science, letters, all flourished, all were fruitful, ripened by the sun of liberty, by the rays of that great Revolution of 1688, which had put an end to absolute power and given wing to English genius. Thus thinkers, writers, publicists now saw all roads opened before them. Far from being persecuted, gagged, and castigated, as in France, they could aspire to the highest charges.

The electrifying effect produced by emancipated England upon our fugitive from the Bastille, upon the man just out of the French trap, will be easily imagined. What dazzling brightness, what feast of thought for Voltaire entering the modern Athens! From the darkness he was emerging into the light, from the midst of courtiers and slaves he found himself suddenly transported into a land of free men, organizing their activities in all independence.

The English, with their self-government under George I., their freedom of meetings, of association, of the press, of political and religious propaganda, presented a perfect contrast to the French bent under the royal bonplaisir and the Jesuitic arbitrary will. The frank, bold, impetuous character of the Englishman captivated Voltaire.

He drank with avidity from the British tankard the nectar which strengthened his powerful faculties and gave a solid basis to his mind. He devoured everything, books, pamphlets, journals, speeches, sermons. He attended meetings, gatherings, circles. His laborious and studious life was at that period, he has said, the life of a Rosicrucian, "ever hidden, ever on the march."

Carlyle informs us, in his "History of Frederick the Great," that upon his arrival in London, Voltaire lived for some time in an old house, inhabited to this day, in Maiden Lane, Covent Garden. He was very cordially received at Wandsworth, in the cottage of an opulent merchant of London, a friend of letters and well read himself, Mr. Fawkener.

The houses of the great were not slow to open themselves for the French exile. He was received with the utmost cordiality at Pall-Mall, in the sumptuous mansion of Bolingbroke, and in his residence at Dawley.

Voltaire remained three weeks with Lord Petersborough. He also very assiduously frequented the house of Pope, the illustrious author of the "Essay on Man," and whom he estimated "the most elegant, correct, and harmonious poet of England."

At the homes of Lord Bolingbroke, Lord Petersborough, and Pope, Voltaire found himself in relations with nearly all the British celebrities—with Clarke, Gay, Congreve, Thomson, Young, Swift, whom he called the English Rabelais. In that circle of brilliant minds philosophical discussions sometimes became very lively. According to his wont, Voltaire put a slight curb upon the expression of his thoughts. At one of Pope's great dinners, if we must believe an English chronicler, he treated Christianity in such a cavalier way that Pope's mother, a good Catholic, rose from the table and withdrew. Admitting the authenticity of this incident, it did not interrupt his good relations with Pope.

Lastly, Voltaire dwelt in Beletery Square with a certain Cavalier. It is not probable, however, that it was the hero of the Cévennes, who, in Holland, had been his rival in his love affair with Pimpette.

It would appear that Lady Laura Harley had much inclination and admiration for Voltaire. But this cosmopolitan English woman had for appendix a very jealous husband—a very Othello, who very quickly put an end to the romance.

Voltaire placed himself in relations with all the personages of mark and originality; political and literary men, poets and philosophers. He did not even omit to see and frequent the Quakers.

Among other visits of Voltaire, his commentators speak, in their memoirs, of his interviews with the famous comic author, Congreve, the German Fabrica, Lady Lundon, and the Princess Caroline. He charmed every one, and gained his city right by the vivacity and the brightness of his wit, his tact, his ton of man of the world, and also, it must be said, by amiable flatteries, which he dropped upon his way, as formerly Buckingham threw pearls at the feet of admiring belles.

Voltaire knew, in London, the celebrated Duchess of Marlborough, then occupied with the editing of her "Memoirs." But he failed to see the greatest scientific genius of the eighteenth century—the legislator of the heavens, he who had subdued the world to the great law of universal attraction—Isaac Newton, already sick at the time of his arrival. On the 25th of March, 1727, he assisted at his sumptuous obsequies with all England, pondering, perhaps, that in France Moliere had been denied a sepulture.

BY W. S. BELL.

Move which way you will, Christian morality will bring you up standing before the great command, Believe or be damned.

Christian morality has no foundation. There is no foundation for rational morality in the Jehovah god of the Bible. There is no ground for rational morality in theology, which teaches total depravity, election and reprobation, and infant damnation. There is no basis for morality in the teachings of Jesus, except in such of them as have been taught by other great teachers.

More than all this, we have the results of science to offer you. We should bear in mind the fact that Christianity has attempted two things in regard to science. It is attempting two things to-day—that is, it is declaring that science is Infidel and Atheistic, and Christian writers and preachers are at the same time declaring that science and religion are in harmony. Many volumes have been written to show the harmony between revelation and geology; many volumes have been written to show that Darwinism, evolution, and science are irreligious, if not Atheistic. The Church has always, when in her power, suppressed the men of science, but still the cause has gone marching on. The grand achievements of this century have been but the early fruit of the scientific spirit. The new age is emphatically an age of science. It is an era of increased and increasing knowledge. Mankind is coming out of the woods. Old customs are now cast aside, as the bird leaves behind it the shell from which it is fledged. The genius of humanity has become touched with its own possibilities, and is striving to rise to a higher plane of life. Rational morality is aiming to destroy the very roots of crime, poverty, and disease by a larger education, a broader liberty, and the possession and exercise of equal rights. In the coming age our civilization will be looked upon as barbarous and savage. In such an age people will read with horror of these times of hanging men and women for crimes they could not avoid—for crimes for which society itself is more to blame than the individual. They will be amazed to read of worship offered to a God who damned infants not a span long to the endless torment of hell. The reason for this inhuman treatment, they will read, was that no priest had put a drop or two of water on the smiling babe's head.

The reader of the next age will read this item of our times:

"A few weeks since, a rector in Wenchelia, England, buried two of his sheep-killing dogs in coffins, in graves, and with many religious forms; and in another parish, not far away, another rector refused to bury a child, because it had not been baptized."

That is what religion can do even for a dog. Sectarianism would sooner help a dog into heaven than an unbaptized child or an impenitent Infidel.

I have referred to science as the child of to-day. It is necessary to keep this in view to appreciate the character of the new age in which we live.

The stupendous industrial enterprises mark one phase of our superior conditions. Railroads, telegraphs, and ocean cables have sprung into existence in this age. They have been the product, largely, of free labor and free life. A civilization borne down by a system of mental and social slavery never could have produced such results. These countless enterprises have increased the wealth of the world, and, on the whole, improved the condition of the laboring classes. A more important result, as it seems to me, is the bonds of universal brotherhood which these facilities of commerce and communication have quickened into life between the different nations. The world is rapidly coming to see that all men are brothers. Humanity by and by will receive the service now so fruitlessly offered to the unknown but terrifying gods. Then mankind will rejoice in manhood.

Commerce is the pioneer in the van of civilization. Science is the schoolmaster; and in the immediate future all the civilized world will enter the school of science. All professional men except ministers have already entered it. Lawyers, doctors, historians, philosophers, and students of all sorts have sat down at the feet of science. This is the school of a larger humanity. It has taught the nations an enlightened self-interest; and, as a consequence, there are now fewer and less barbarous wars. There is, too, a more humane temper in the public mind. A nation cannot wage an unprovoked war upon another nation simply for the sake of aggrandizement and power. Nor can the sentiment of patriotism be stirred, as formerly, by such mottoes as "My country, right or wrong!" Rational morality demands that our country shall be right, or at least claim to be right, before the public mind will approve.

But science is not confined to human industries; it presses hard upon nature for her undiscovered truths. What is the meaning of this brief life? Millions of anxious minds have asked this question, but have sunk to rest without obtaining an answer; only the echo of their question fell upon their ears as they closed their eyes in dreamless sleep.

A Card.

We, the undersigned, Directors of the National Liberal League, offer ourselves as candidates for re-election at the Second Annual Congress of the League, on the following platform of principles:

1. The right of absolute individual freedom of thought, of speech, and of the press on all political, religious, social, and other questions, and the right of being wholly uninterfered with by the courts, no matter what opinions, as such, may be advocated or promulgated.

2. The right and duty of Congress and State Legislatures to pass, and the right and duty of the National and State courts to enforce, laws to suppress the circulation of obscene literature, including the exclusion of such literature from the United States mails: provided that the offense known as "obscenity" shall be so strictly defined in the statutes as to render impossible the prosecution or punishment of any one for the expression of his honest opinions on any subject.

3. The flagrant wrong of intrusting the execution of the laws for the suppression of obscene literature to any official or officials who shall not scrupulously confine their action within the limits here clearly defined.

And we decline to be candidates for re-election if the principles of the above platform shall fail to be approved by the National Liberal League at this Congress.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Pres.
J. A. J. WILCOX, Treas.
Ch. Ex. Com.
D. G. CANDON, Ch. Finance Com.

The above was sent to H. L. Green, Chairman of the Executive Committee of the National Liberal League, by Mr. Abbot, for his signature, and the following is Mr. Green's reply:

NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE, OFFICE OF H. L. GREEN, CHAIR. EX. COM.
SALAMANCA, Sept. 16, 1878.

DEAR MR. ABBOT: I have read carefully the "card" you sent me signed by four of the members of the Board of Directors of the N. L. L., and I fully indorse the principles of the three planks therein set forth.

You request me to sign the card as Chairman of the Executive Committee. I cannot, for these reasons among others:

1. I am not a candidate for re-election to the important office I now hold; there are many in our ranks who can fill the place much better than I can.

2. Because it appears to me the issuing of this card has the appearance of forestalling the action of the coming Congress and of any committee that might be appointed to present a platform for consideration.

3. That, as officers of the National Liberal League, we have no authority to issue such a manifesto.

As to the coming National Liberal League Congress, I have faith that the intelligent men and women there assembled will, in their wisdom, lay down a platform so just, broad, and catholic that all the true friends of our new party can conscientiously stand upon it and work unitedly for the entire secularization of the State. We must all work for so desirable a result.

Fraternally yours, H. L. GREEN.

The National Liberal League.

THE SECOND ANNUAL CONGRESS.

The Second Annual Congress of the National Liberal League is soon to assemble. It is very important that it be composed of a body of men and women who by their characters, ability, and numbers shall command the attention and respect of the whole country; and that the delegates there convened represent every branch of the Liberal party and every section of our country. The time that intervenes between now and its meeting is so short that no time should be lost by those who desire that it should be such a body.

THE DELEGATES.

By the Constitution no one is permitted to vote or take part in the Congress but delegates from Local Liberal Leagues. Each Local League is entitled to send its President, Secretary, and three members—five in all—as delegates. Therefore every Local League should at once call a meeting and elect their delegates, and be sure and select good men and women, persons who can be relied upon to stand firm in behalf of the fundamental principles of the League. Other Liberal Leagues and Liberal Societies that have not already taken out charters should do so at once and selec their delegates; and wherever ten or more Liberals can be got together, a new League should be immediately formed, and charters taken out, and delegates elected in time for them to attend the coming Congress.

LIBERALS NOT DELGATES.

If this Congress follows the precedent of former ones, all known Liberals of the country who are in attendance will be permitted to take part in the proceedings, and, whether that be so or not, it is very important that there be a general attendance of Liberals from all parts of the country. Their, presence, counsel, and encouragement will be of great service to the Congress.

And especially do I desire to urge individual members of the present Executive Committee of the National Liberal League and the various State Committees to attend this Congress and to at once go to work in an effort to have their respective States well represented.

THE PUBLIC MEETINGS.

It is expected that many of the ablest Liberal speakers in this country will be present and that the public meetings to be addressed by them will constitute a very interesting and profitable portion of the proceedings of the Congress.

HARMONY.

It is patent to every Liberal in the land that for months past there has been engendered between some of our leading Liberals a spirit of unfriendliness, to call it by no harsher name, that has greatly retarded the work of the League movement, and is justly bringing upon us all the contempt of our enemies.

Without attempting to decide who is to blame in this disagreeable controversy, I desire to urge upon all our friends who shall attend the coming Congress the necessity of keeping these contentions out of its deliberations and doing all in their power to conciliate and harmonize all parties, and then and there cultivate a spirit of fraternity that shall enable us all to join hearts and hands in the all-important work in which we all feel such a deep interest, incorporating into the Constitution and laws of our country the great American ideas of the entire separation of Church and State and the civil and religious equality of all persons.

Financial.

The monetary question has been under discussion throughout the civilized world for ages in the past, and at present there seems to be no immediate indication of its final solution. Like all social, moral, or political problems, objections infinite in number can be raised against the present system, yet who will suggest a better one? How is an improvement to be consummated, or what new system can we inaugurate which will be less objectionable than the present one? These are questions which the irredeemable currency advocates would do well to seriously consider before further crowding their wild inflation-schemes upon an already currency afflicted people. The freest and fullest discussion of this subject should be encouraged by all; the opinion of the masses must be heard as well as that of the political economist. Every person who has a truth to offer upon this subject deserves respectful consideration.

It is to be regretted, however, that not a few of our new born economic writers, either from a defective memory or a lack of opportunity to correctly inform themselves, appear to be sadly deficient in their knowledge of our financial statistics.

Nothing can be more fatal to a logical conclusion in finance than a perversion of the facts, or a misstatement of statistical records. It is also to be regretted that the statements of political speakers cannot always be relied upon, and that even editors of strongly partisan papers often mislead the public by a perversion of the statistical facts when referring to our national finances. A few years since an editor of one of our leading political papers, in commenting upon the public debt statement published in the same edition, prefaced the article something as follows:

"Reckless squandering of the people's money by the administration. The public debt constantly on the increase. Our ten-forty bond account increased over eight million dollars during the last month."

Another political editor on the same day published a copy of the same official public debt statement, commenting as follows:

"Gratifying report of the Secretary of the Treasury. Extraordinary decrease in the public debt. Ten million dollars in 5-20 bonds paid off in a single month."

A careful examination of the official figures revealed the fact that both editors had stated just enough of the truth to carry their partisan points, and that both were guilty of attempting to seriously mislead their readers. At a public meeting not long since, a prominent greenback orator stated in the presence of the writer, that "according to the London Economist the French people were now enjoying a paper currency of fifty dollars per capita." A mistake of over four hundred per cent, which, in the opinion of some people, would destroy nearly the entire force of his argument upon the currency question. Had the orator said fifty francs instead of fifty dollars he would have quoted more correctly from that celebrated statistical register.

Mr. Kersey Graves writes to THE TRUTH SEEKER, July 20th, in substance that "It is impossible for any commercial nation to prosper in business with a currency of but thirteen dollars per capita," regardless of the fact that the United States have prospered as a commercial nation, from the organization of this government up to 1860, with an average currency of less than one half of that amount, the exact figures for twenty years prior to the Rebellion being five dollars and ninety-two cents per capita.

Again, September 7th, among other grievous errors, the same writer places our currency in circulation twelve years ago at two billion dollars, more than double the real sum.

Mr. J. R. Parks makes the very erroneous statement that, "France has a larger paper circulation than we" (See TRUTH SEEKER, June 29th).

In 1876, no less a man than Hon. Peter Cooper addressed an open letter to his rival candidates for the Presidency, in which he stated that, "the paper currency in 1865, amounted to $2,192,395,527, which in 1878 had been reduced to $631,488,676, showing a contraction of the currency in eight years of $1,561,906,851, referring for corroboration to a speech made in March, 1874, by Hon. John M. Bright of Tennessee.

Unfortunately for the enlightment of the masses, for the past two years these figures have been paraded before the public, and both these great men have been repeatedly referred to as authority by greenback orators and inflation writers throughout the United States. Again and again the fallacious arguments of Mr. Bright and the grossly incorrect figures of Mr. Cooper have been thoroughly exposed by those who have examined the statistical records at Washington, by the annual official reports of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Comptroller of the Currency. Although Mr. Cooper has acknowledged in substance that in order to swell the aggregate currency in 1865 to $2,192,000,000 he had to include more than 1,200,000,000 dollars of the interest bearing debt of the United States with the real paper money of the country, yet he fails to acknowledge the fact that in order to make the contraction of the currency in 1873 appear as great as possible, all such interest-bearing government obligations were by him at that date carefully excluded from the remaining currency. Mr. Cooper would lead the people to believe that the contraction of the currency from 1865 to 1873 was over 1,561,000,000 dollars—an amount exceeding the actual contraction by more than four hundred per cent. Had that great philanthropist, in referring to the people of the United States, placed our present population at 180,000,000, he would not have been so far from the real population as when he stated that the contraction of the currency exceeded 1,561,000,000 dollars. If Mr. Cooper could persuade himself to believe that government bonds bearing interest at 7 3-10 per cent in currency and 6 per cent in coin constituted a part of the currency in 1865, surely he should have the fairness in 1873 to count as currency government bonds bearing a much lower rate of interest, with which the 7-30 and 5 20 bonds were redeemed.

For the benefit of those who are interested in this question enough to examine statistics without prejudice, preferring facts and correct figures to wild statements and political sophistry, I herewith present the following statistics, carefully compiled from official figures at the Treasury Department in Washington, showing the entire paper currency circulating as money in the United States from the year 1840 to the present time, and the average purchasing power of the same as measured by the world's standard:

By the foregoing statement it appears that on the 30th of June, 1865, our total paper currency circulating as money, including bank notes, greenbacks, demand notes, compound interest notes, and fractional currency, reached its maximum, $983,318,686. In 1873 this had been reduced to $750,000,000, showing a contraction of the currency in eight years of $283,000,000, instead of $1,561,000,000, as stated by Mr. Cooper and other inflationists.

Second Annual Congress of the National Liberal League.—Call.

BOSTON, Sept. 13, 1878.

The Second Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, organized at the Centennial Congress of Liberals at Philadelphia, July 1–4, 1876, will be held at Syracuse, N.Y., on Saturday and Sunday, Oct. 26 and 27, 1878. Further particulars as to hall, speakers, etc., will be announced hereafter.

In addition to the hearing of reports, election of officers for the ensuing year, and other ordinary business, questions of the utmost practical importance to the Liberal cause will come up for decision at this Congress. Among them the following may be specified:

1. What efficient measures can be adopted for securing a great increase in the number of Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues, and thereby winning for Liberal ideas the public influence to which they are justly entitled?

2. Shall the National Liberal League nominate candidates for President and Vice-President of the United States at the present time?

3. How can the National Liberal League most effectively promote the cause of State secularization, and foil the schemes of those who are seeking to pervert the Government to sectarian purposes? What action shall it take with reference to the Constitutional Amendment already twice reported to the United States Senate by the Judiciary Committee, the practical effect of which, if adopted, will be to recognize in the Constitution the right of the Bible to be read in the public schools as a book of divine authority, and the right of church property to be exempted from taxation?

4. How can the rights of free mails and a free press be most effectively defended, and how can the wrongs of persons unjustly punished under the so-called Comstock laws be most effectively righted?

5. Shall the National Liberal League abandon the stand it originally took on the "obscene literature" question at Philadelphia, July 4, 1876, or shall it continue to defend equally the cause of public morality and the cause of free mails and a free press? Shall it now demand the total repeal of the existing laws on this subject, and thereby practically protect and foster the circulation of obscene literature? Or shall it continue to demand the radical reform of those laws, in such manner as shall protect freedom of thought to the uttermost without protecting obscenity in the least?

The last two of these questions are peculiarly important at this time, and will inevitably come up for settlement by the approaching Congress. The resolutions adopted at Philadelphia were as follows:

"Resolved, That this League, while it recognizes the great importance and the absolute necessity of guarding by proper legislation against obscene and indecent publications, whatever sect, party, order, or class such publications claim to favor, disapproves and protests against all laws which, by reason of indefiniteness or ambiguity, shall permit the prosecution and punishment of honest and conscientious men for presenting to the public what they deem essential to the public welfare, when the views thus presented do not violate in thought or language the acknowledged rules of decency; and that we demand that all laws against obscenity and indecency shall be so clear and explicit that none but actual offenders against the recognized principles of purity shall be liable to suffer therefrom.

"Resolved, That we cannot but regard the appointment and authorization by the Government of a single individual to inspect our mails, with power to exclude therefrom whatever he deems objectionable, as a delegation of authority dangerous to public and personal liberty, and utterly inconsistent with the genius of free institutions."

The future growth, prosperity, and influence of the Liberal League movement will depend largely on the action to be taken by the Congress on these two questions. Any weakening of the stand taken at Philadelphia will work great and perhaps fatal disaster to the National Liberal League.

In order, therefore, that these vital questions may be fairly and wisely decided, it is recommended that all Local Leagues elect their delegates with special reference to it. The Congress will not be an irresponsible mass meeting, but a convention composed of delegates and members duly accredited, and seats for them will be reserved. Delegates from Local Leagues will receive Certificates of Membership of the Second Annual Congress by forwarding at once the proper credentials, signed by their own local officers, to the "National Liberal League, 231 Washington street, Boston;" charter, life, and annual members who intend to be present will receive theirs by simply forwarding their names and present addresses. These Certificates must be presented at the door and exchanged for Tickets of Admission to the reserved seats, the rest of the hall being open to the public at large. By this arrangement all confusion will be obviated. The Congress will be composed of accredited members, who alone ought to vote on questions of business affecting the League; every member will be admitted to the reserved seats; and the Committee on Membership will be enabled to make an accurate report to the Congress.

Liberals are urged everywhere to organize themselves into Local Auxiliary Liberal Leagues and elect good delegates, in order to give this Congress a large local constituency and an influential delegation, and thereby to increase the weight of its decisions with the general public. The questions to be acted upon are of the gravest consequence to the whole Liberal cause, and ought to be dealt with by a responsible representative body. A large delegate convention will certainly exert a powerful influence for good. Applications for charters, each signed by ten or more persons and accompanied by ten dollars, will secure them without delay, if addressed to the "National Liberal League, 231 Washington street, Boston."

By order of the Board of Directors:

FRANCIS E. ABBOT, President.
WILLIAM H. HAMLEN, Secretary.

IT is easy to advise a person, but how difficult to receive, under similar circumstances, that same advice from another, because we are so prone to believe that what we accept is truth, and that those who cannot see with our eyes are all wrong.

LIKE the tender, clinging vine that creeps lovingly around the strength that supports it, surrounding it with inimitable grace and beauty, is the loving but lonely heart that responds to the clear, sweet call of a soul whose divineness has become perfected in one thought, one feeling of true and strong sympathy for every weak and sad, burdened heart on earth.

Call for the Liberal League Congress.

In other parts of the paper we give the call for the Congress to meet at Syracuse on October 26th next, as well as the "Card" from The Index of Messrs. Abbot, Hamlen, Wilcox, and Crandon, offering themselves for re-election, and laying down a platform only upon which they will stand. They thus give the Liberal Leagues of the country to understand who are to be elected as national officers of the League, and what planks must be in its platform. It is to be hoped that the instructions or orders thus voluntarily sent out to the members of the leagues of the country will be duly appreciated by all parties concerned, and that every individual member will be prepared to act accordingly.

In addition to the call and card, we take from The Index the following leading editorial in reference to the coming Congress:

PUBLIC DISCUSSION vs. SECRET PLOTS.

From numerous independent sources during the past few months we have received information that a secret movement is on foot to surprise and capture the National Liberal League at its next Annual Congress for the purpose of making it reverse its record, and come out in favor of the total repeal of the obscene literature laws as opposed to their radical reform. A private letter, dated September 7th, conjectures the following programme of operations:

"I think we ought all to make one resolute stand, and strive to our utmost to save the League from falling into disaster and utter wreck. Let me tell you what I think. First, there will be an attempt made to seize the organization of the convention, displacing yourself from the Presidency of the League, and putting in that position either Bennett or some one in affiliation with him. With their own man in the Chair, they will have, as they did at Watkins, a Business Committee, so far as the majority is concerned, of their own sort and kind. Failing in the first step, if they should, they will endeavor to secure the Business Committee on Resolutions; and should they perchance fail there, they will resolutely seek to have a large enough representation on hand in the convention to vote down the resolutions they do not want and to vote up those they do. I apprehend that the delegates from New York city may vote solidly one way; and the danger is that from New York, Boston, and Philadelphia, in all which cities, as I think, the Freelove doctrine has obtained among Liberals a considerable foothold, the convention may be overborne and swamped. Then there is more or less of an infusion of this virus all through the country. But I believe that, if the people at large were fully posted in regard to what is up, and would send in their delegates, we should find the declaration would be on the right side."

The success of this secret movement would be the utter perversion of the National Liberal League from its original objects, and the certain destruction of its growing influence. At the time of its birth, the League assumed a firm and wise position on this "obscene literature" question; and it needs now to maintain this position with increased clearness, vigor, and emphasis. If it should now abandon or in any degree weaken this position—if it should consent to parley or compromise with the "Freelove" folly, or surrender itself to the management of those who are deluded by its feeble sophistries—the National Liberal League will simply commit suicide. Those of its members whose character, ability, and reputation have commanded for the League no small measure of public respect will speedily retire from its membership. The organization will soon tumble to pieces, and one more monument will be erected to the executive incapacity of Liberals as a class.

The Directors of the League have, therefore, felt it their duty to act with boldness and promptitude. Instead of stooping to tricks or opposing plots by counter-plots, they have resolved to lay the whole case candidly before the Liberal public, and abide by their deliberate, well-considered decision. The success of every plot depends on its secrecy; and the Directors have put it within the power of the League, by informing them fully of the vital issues at stake and providing effectually against any attempt to pack the convention, to defeat the present plot utterly, and to settle these issues with freedom, wisdom, and dignity.

In addition to the "Call" for the Second Annual Congress of the League, the Directors also publish this week a "Card," to both of which we invite special attention. Persistent attempts have been made to obscure and cloud the real issues at stake, and to convince the Liberals that they must either surrender their liberties altogether or else demand the total repeal of the "obscene literature" laws. To scatter this fog and to bring out the real issues with clearness, the Directors have announced in their "Card" a platform of principles identical in substance with those proclaimed by the League at Philadelphia. Further, in order to concentrate public attention upon these principles, and insure a careful and deliberate public judgment of their real value, the present Directors offer themselves as candidates for re-election, to stand or fall with the principles thus put forward. It is needless to say that they are not at all anxious for re-election; they will be glad to be released from public service, if a new and well-chosen Board of Directors shall be elected on the same platform; they will cordially and earnestly unite in sustaining such new officers to the best of their power. But meanwhile they feel it their duty to represent these principles before the public, and to bear the standard till it can be put into better hands; they despise the affectation of coyness and false modesty, and say publicly that these principles are too vitally important to the welfare and progress of the Liberal cause not to be represented for the time being by candidates who will avowedly share their fate. For this reason alone they take the somewhat unusual, though not unprecedented, step of volunteering their own candidature; and they know that their motives will be misconstrued by no generous or just mind.

Now let the platform and candidates of the "repeal" party be presented to the public with equal frankness. If it possesses better principles than those of the "Card," let it not hide its candlestick under a bushel. Let there be no miserable personalities, but a strong, fair, frank discussion of both sides of this subject. We call upon the advocates of "repeal" of the laws in question to show by argument, without distortion or misrepresentation, wherein the principles set forth in the "Card" are either false, or inadequate, or to be improved; and to state without verbiage or ambiguity exactly what principles they themselves propose instead. If they are unable to do this, the public will find it out and act accordingly.

We "take the bull by the horns." We propose to fight darkness with light—secret plots with public discussion; and if the "repeal" party expect to carry their point at the Second Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, we give them warning that they must do it by fair, open, and honorable means, and by these alone. If by such means they can convince the League that "repeal," and not "reform," is the measure needed to protect freedom of the press and the mails, well and good; the only object of the Directors is to secure for the Congress the conditions of a fair debate and vote on the merits of the question, and to prevent any underhanded operations by which such a fair debate and vote would be cut off. Let the Local Leagues understand that the delegates they send will be called upon to act on this question; and let them therefore choose such delegates as shall best represent their views. The fate of the National Liberal League is in its own hands; it may commit suicide, if it chooses to do so; its present officers have no object whatever but to protect it from being waylaid and assassinated. Meanwhile, they boldly and frankly state the principles of "reform" by which they themselves propose to stand or fall in this Congress; and they call upon the advocates of "repeal," if they have any principles which they dare set forth in opposition to these, to give them to the public with equal frankness, and to name the candidates who are to represent them. The Liberal public will think none the worse of them, if they abandon the tricks of intrigue, misrepresentation, and abuse, manifest a little courage, and rely henceforth on the power of truth to win her own way in a fair field. Come, gentlemen who insist on "repeal" and scout "reform" as insufficient for the protection of freedom, publish your platform and your candidates to an anxious world!

We cannot help regretting that the editor of The Index should have deemed it necessary to present such a mass of false representations to the Liberal public. His apprehensions and his fears about "secret movements" and "secret plots" to "surprise and capture" the National League are wholly without foundation. There have been no plots of the kind, and no secrecy in reference to the officers of the National League for the coming year; and we cannot help slight doubts as to his having received the letter he gives the public, as well as the similar information "from numerous independent sources" of a secret movement to seize, capture, etc. If he has really received such a letter, and he thought the public ought to be made acquainted with it, why did he not exercise the fairness to give the author's name? That would have enabled his readers to judge somewhat of the amount of respect and consideration due the writer, as well as the letter itself. If we were to be favored with the letter, pray why not with the writer's name?

While there has been no plotting, no stratagem, no mischief-making, no conspiracy, no secrecy, with regard to the conduct of the coming N. L. L. Congress, we think we can truthfully state that the position upon the Comstock postal laws which Mr. Abbot unwisely took and has persistently maintained, has, in the estimation of a large majority of the Radicals of the country, unfitted him as a proper leader for the Liberal forces of America; but there has been no secrecy in the expression of this opinion. His scholarship, his culture, and his ability are conceded, but his narrowness in the direction indicated has caused large numbers to doubt the propriety of his leadership; but, we repeat, there has been no secrecy in this matter. He undoubtedly represents a certain portion of the Liberal public, but a small portion; the much larger portion do not accept his views.

So far as the editor of this paper having been named as the President of the National League, it is entirely false. No such suggestion, to our knowledge, has been made; and had it been, we should have positively declined the honor. When the editor of The Index last year placed us in the list of thirty-two Vice-Presidents of the N. L. L., our highest ambition in that direction was gratified. We do not want the candidacy of President, nor the office itself, and would not accept it.

The fears and whines about Freelovers are altogether unnecessary. It is a side issue, with which the Congress of the League need not feel called upon to interfere. The advocates of it are not aggressive and ask to insert no planks in the platform. They simply exercise the right which they possess of maintaining their honest, settled convictions.

As regards capturing the N. L. L. Congress or forestalling its action, the editor of The Index has certainly gone much further than any person we are acquainted with. He has undertaken, prior to the assembling of the Congress, to introduce a new plank or two new planks into the platform of the league—planks which have heretofore never formed any part of its platform—and he has had the cruelty to say in advance that unless his planks are inserted he will not stand on the platform nor be a candidate for re-election. This certainly looks more like capturing the convention or dictating to it than anything else we know of. He not only lays down the law that we all must accept, but then tells us that he will not be a candidate for re-election if the same is not adopted. If there has been any plotting done, here it is. If any attempt to capture the N. L. League has been made, this is it. Mr. Green's suggestion that all this should be left for the Congress to decide when in session is evidently far more just and reasonable. No one man, nor four men, have the right to dictate to all the leagues of the country. The delegates to the Congress are the ones to deliberate and decide the questions at issue, and Mr. Abbot does not possess the power to forestall the action of the Congress and fix up the platform to suit himself. This is a palpable departure from the previous action of the National League, as well as the new ruling in regard to sending to Boston for certificates to secure admission to the Congress when it assembles. These are new requirements or new impediments, that have not before been known. Does it not strike the reader as smacking strongly of injustice and dictatorship for the man who offers himself for re-election, or, rather, the four men who offer themselves for re-election, to constitute themselves a board to decide upon the eligibility of the delegates who are to elect them, giving certificates to whom they please and withholding from whom they please? Do they not thus assume the power to admit their friends and virtually name those who shall be allowed to vote upon their re-election? This certainly looks more like plotting and capturing the League than anything else existing in the country. These anomalous movements are probably what Mr. Abbot terms "the light," while all who venture not to approve of his position are in "the dark," and he proposes to fight our darkness with his light. If the fight is forced upon us, we, of course, will be compelled to accept it. In view of these unwarranted innovations, or this species of despotism, as it may properly be called, the gentleman's flings about "stooping to tricks," "secret plots," etc., are simply contemptible.

For further information relative to Mr. Abbot's fighting our "darkness" with his "light," and of his "taking the bull by the horns," the reader is referred to letters from Messrs. Leland, Green, and Tucker, on page 612. By the latter it will be seen that in attempting to take the bull by the horns Mr. Abbot committed a sad mistake, and made his attack at the opposite end of the animal. It is to be hoped that the gentleman will learn, before the struggle is over, the difference between the horns and the opposite extreme.

After laying down the law we must accept and naming the candidates we must elect, the editor, with not a little flourish and bluster, calls upon the opposing or "repeal" party to name their platform and candidates. So far as we are concerned we have no special platform prepared, but in addition to that heretofore adopted by the League we would wish to have added a clause condemnatory of the Government or courts of the United States, or the Postal Department, being empowered to examine into the moral quality of matter that passes through the mails. If it is left with them to decide what is moral and what is not, and they are allowed all the power which many want them to exercise, they can easily decide all heterodox views to be immoral, and everything not strictly orthodox may be ruled to be criminal. No one can tell where this power, if once granted, will ever stop. It is not the duty or right of any branch of the Government to investigate the morality of what passes through the mails. So long as our Christian opponents are the ones to interpret what shall be held as immoral or indecent, we shall ever be in their power, if we concede this right; but as the whole thing is positvely unconstitutional, it should not of right form any portion of the laws of our land. Our postal facilities should be free for all shades of belief and opinion. The Postal Department is in no way responsible for the moral quality of the mail matter it transports.

We are in favor of adequate laws for the suppression of real obscenity. We would have offenders punished, not for sending it through the mails, but for issuing it at all. The Comstock Postal law is not adequate to the suppression of obscenity, but other means are, and are also perfectly legitimate and constitutional. We favor constitutional measures and disapprove of those unconstitutional. Our liberties are too dear to be frittered away upon the altar of respectability or by pandering to fashionable orthodoxy.

We are quite willing to stand upon a platform on the basis of the speeches made by Elizur Wright and T. B. Wakeman at the Faneuil Hall Indignation Meeting, in the latter of which, especially, the unconstitutionality of the Comstock Postal laws was clearly presented. The editor of The Index has made no mention of those speeches, nor has he answered their arguments. We have learned that he was present and heard them, but he has not shown up the fallacy of their arguments, if any, nor has he called attention to them. Mr. Wakeman's amended speech has appeared in these columns, but lest the attention of the editor of The Index has not been called to it, we will mail him a copy. In that argument he will find the platform upon which we are willing to stand, and we would be very glad if he would have the fairness to lay the gist of it before his readers and point out to them the fallacies and weak points in the argument. We are, however, in favor of all changes in the platform of the National Liberal League being discussed by the Congress when it assembles, but we are not in favor of its being fixed up in advance by any individual, and the Congress being compelled to adopt the same.

More especially do we accept and recommend as a basis for a platform the series of resolutions adopted at the Watkins Convention. That body was made up of intelligent Liberals from all parts of the State and the country at large, and they were eminently qualified to adopt the resolutions so boldly presented. They strike us as very fair and able, and the spirit of them can hardly be improved upon as a platform for any Liberal organization in the country. Those resolutions have appeared in all the Liberal papers of the country save The Index. Its editor has not had the fairness to publish them though he has been specially requested to do so. There is something about them that he does not quite like, but if that is the case he might still have the fairness to lay them before his readers. It would undoubtedly be better than taking the same amount of space in berating others and falsely charging them with "plotting" and "laying secret plans" to "surprise and capture," etc. Is there any means by which the editor of The Index can be induced to publish the resolutions adopted by the Watkins Convention?

Mr. Abbot says unless his new planks are inserted into the platform that he will not be a candidate for President. This is saddening in the extreme, but as we cannot accept his planks just as he has prepared them, we may be under the painful necessity of looking up another candidate. Our choice is the Hon. Elizur Wright of Boston. His broad and clear views upon the unconstitutionality of the Comstock Postal laws; his independence and boldness in avowing his position; his disinclination to bend the knee in subserviency at the shrine of Mrs. Grundy, or at the altar of pseudo-respectability; his belief that constitutional liberties should not be sacrificed for the porpose of retaining the good opinion of our enemies; his great experience, ability, and moral integrity constitute him a very worthy candidate for the office of President of the National Liberal League and an unfaltering leader for the Radicals and Freethinkers of the country. We doubt not that a large majority of the Liberals of the land have the fullest confidence in that excellent man, and feel that he will never prove recreant to the highest principles of American liberty.

Getting into Scrapes.

The following is from a valued patron, whose name, we believe, has been upon our list from the time our little sheet first stepped out into the world and claimed an existence:

WALTON, IND., Sept. 18, 1878.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: I see that it is time to send you some more money, by the tab that comes on my TRUTH SEEKER. You will find money for Mrs. Besant's new book, "The Law of Population," paper cover; the balance is for THE TRUTH SEEKER.

I see that you have been getting into another scrape. If you get into a few more scrapes I shall haul off from your subscription list. I always made it a business to not keep company with a man that was too often in some scrape. I never hear of Horace Seaver or J. P. Mendum getting into trouble of that kind—with the Paine Hall exception, which is of a different character. Your many friends will get tired after a while in pulling open their wallet-strings to pay court fees and lawyers. Forbearance, in course of time, ceases to be a virtue. That is all I have to say this time.

Yours respectfully, E. VAN BUSKIRK.

REPLY.—We have read the above letter of our friend two or three times over to be able to make up our mind whether it was written in a humorous vein or in downright earnest. As the humor is not decidedly apparent, we have come to the conclusion that Mr. Van Buskirk meant just what he wrote. We are very sorry indeed if our brother harbors the opinion that our "getting into scrapes," or in other words, being arrested on the foul charge of selling obscene literature, is a matter of our own choosing. If he has come to that conclusion, he is very much mistaken. When we were arrested by Anthony Comstock, aided by a United States deputy marshall, in November last, we were occupying our little office and quietly pursuing our legitimate business. All we had done to get into that scrape was to send through the mail some of the Truth Seeker Tracts to Comstock's false name, S. Bender, Squan Village, N. J. The arrest was as much unlooked for by us as would be a similar arrest by our friend Van Buskirk, should a marshall call upon him and take him off to prison. We have not to this day been able to perceive how we were at fault by getting into that scrape. We simply had expressed our honest convictions, and had used the mail facilities to send the same to those who ordered them. Would our friend have us do less?

At Watkins we were perfectly quiet, and attended to our legitimate business of selling books. We did not raise our voice in public. We did nothing to get into a scrape save to hand up a pamphlet, by request, from the table of Miss Tilton, while she was temporarily absent. For this we were taken by an officer before a magistrate, and held to bail, and for this Judge Oliver P. Hurd, two clergymen, and their Grand Jury found a bill of indictment against us, and we are now under bonds to appear again in December before the same judge when with his petit jury we doubt not he will do all he can to convict us of a felony, and send us to prison. Possibly Mr. Seaver or Mr. Mendum, or even Mr. Van Buskirk would not have committed the same offense we did, but Mr. Mendum had books there for sale, and Mr. Seaver spoke two or three times in public, thus doing quite as much towards getting into a scrape as we did.

True, we never heard of Messrs. Mendum and Seaver being arrested, but their predecessor, the founder of the Investigator—the brave Abner Kneeland—was. He got into a scrape and was arrested, tried, convicted, sentenced, and sent to prison on a charge of blasphemy. He served out his sentence, but we have never heard that any of his friends condemned him for getting into that scrape, or that they threatened to "haul off" from him on account of it. We doubt not that by the same ruling both Messrs. Mendum and Seaver have published much for which Christian bigots might think they ought to go to prison if not to the stake. They have done far more to get into a scrape than we have, and have kept up the scraping much longer. If Mr. Seaver has not got into a scrape and been arrested, less than a year ago he got into a scrape enough to be knocked down in a public street by a ruffian, or an enemy at all events, but which fortunately did not take his life. We have never heard that Mr. Seaver was censured for getting into that scrape, and even had the assault or something like it been repeated, we hardly think his friends would have felt it incumbent on them to desert him on account of it. We have never heard of the lamb in Æsop's fable being censured for being attacked and devoured by the wolf.

Many men, in ages past, have shown a similar capacity for getting into scrapes. Socrates, the old Grecian philosopher, though a most excellent man, got into a scrape by not entertaining such views as his enemies approved of, and, in consequence, he was compelled to take poison, which ended his life. That was a bad scrape for poor Socrates. One Jesus Christ, about whose existence there is no small amount of uncertainty, is also said to have got into a bad scrape. He entertained views and taught doctrines not approved by his enemies, and they scraped him up before the authorities, and he was condemned to pay the penalty by crucifixion, which must have been a very painful death. This was an unfortunate scrape for the amiable Jesus, and he did not seem to enjoy it at all, for he called out most piteously towards the last; but the scrape is claimed to have been of great benefit to the world, as it made it possible for some of them to be saved from the eternal fires of superheated sulphur. We believe none of the friends of Jesus have condemned him for getting into that scrape or have threatened to desert his cause on account of it.

The learned and brave Bruno, one of the greatest philosophers of the sixteenth century, got into a bad scrape for maintaining the truths which Copernicus taught in reference to the solar system and the motions of the heavenly bodies, and for holding other opinions which the Church did not approve. He was thrown into the torture-dungeons of the Inquisition, where he languished for two years, after which time he was led to the stake, where he nobly offered up his life, a martyr to science and truth. His name is an honored one. We have never heard him aspersed for getting into that scrape, and we believe even Mr. Van Buskirk must entertain the highest respect for him.

Vanini, another Italian philosopher, a learned and excellent man, had the bad fault of getting into scrapes. He would entertain views that were not approved by the bigoted priesthood of his time, and for this he was condemned to have his tongue cut out, and was then burnt alive. He gave up his life in the bravest manner, and even his enemies were forced to acknowledge that he was a man who knew no fear. We hope no man would blacken his memory, or even speak disparingly of him for getting into that scrape.

Thousands and hundreds of thousands of people have got into bad scrapes with the authorities of the Church because they would think a little differently or speak what they thought, and by this means have been tortured in the infernal Inquisition, their bones have been broken on machines of the most cruel character, their tongues have been torn out by the roots, they have been reduced to starvation, their flesh has been pinched with red-hot pincers, burning splinters of pitch-pine have been thrust into their flesh, they have been suspended by their thumbs and their toes, and hundreds of fiendish inventions have been resorted to to inflict pain and suffering. These poor wretches have been beheaded and burnt at the stake, and all because they would get into these scrapes by thinking contrary to what the Church demanded of them.

Many of the best friends to the Liberal cause have been so unfortunate as to get into similar bad scrapes, and have been arrested and thrown into prison. Among this number may be mentioned Thomas Paine, Robert Taylor, Richard Carlile, Charles Southwell, George Jacob Holyoake, Edward Truelove; and even Charles Bradlaugh and Mrs. Annie Besant have been arrested and subjected to the annoyance of paying court fees, etc., etc., with the peril of being sent to prison, for some slight offenses which they gave to the dominant class. We have no recollection that any of these parties have been censured by the Liberals of Europe or America for getting into these scrapes, nor have their friends threatened to break friendship with them on account of their misfortunes; and we are sorry if a contrary fate is reserved for us, and that we are to lose our friends because we have exercised the liberty to think for ourselves and to express our thoughts. We know no better way for us to pursue than to continue this course of conduct, and if we lose friends by it we cannot help it. We shall act true to our convictions though hundreds order their names from our list and withdraw their friendship and support.

We will however repeat what we have said before, that we have not wished these arrests, and we will explicitly make the declaration now, that we wish never to be arrested again so long as our life continues. We do not wish to subject our friends to expense in getting us out of scrapes that we get into. We simply wish to live in peace, and to quietly pursue the even tenor of our way. We however have our convictions, and believe in our right as an American citizen, to utter them, whether our opponents like it or not. Liberal friends do not, as a general thing, wish us to stifle our convictions, or act the coward's part, even though in doing so we should avoid another scrape.

We hope we may never become a heavy tax to the Liberal public. We have labored for them early and late, according to the best of our ability, that we might be able to return value for every dollar we received from them. We are willing to fight their battles and to oppose what we all believe to be wrong so long as our strength and life hold out. We know we are a rock of offense to our Christian opponents. We feel it to be our duty to oppose their rule and to expose their fictions and fables. It is somewhat dangerous to do this, and it is very possible that in thus exercising our rights as an American citizen who does not believe in the tyranny of priestcraft nor the truth of supernatural pretensions, and in holding up to view the wrongs of our persecuting enemies, we may again get into scrapes; and in that case we hope there will be a goodly number of our friends who will not throw us aside on account of it, but will still bear us company and sustain us to the end.

Pious Work.

As we go to press, the trial of Madame De Forest and her three unfortunate girls whom the Agent for the Society for the Suppression of Vice, Anthony Comstock, and five other men, on June 14th last, by a good deal of persuasion and by offers of money, induced to make an exhibition of themselves in a state of nudity, is progressing. Comstock has given his evidence, as also has his man Friday, Joseph A. Britton. Officer Sheldon and others who were with them in the very pious business of inspecting nude girls gave in their evidence. There were some discrepancies in the testimony as sworn to by the different witnesses. For instance, Anthony swore that he gave the girls but fourteen dollars to exhibit their persons, while Officer Sheldon swore it was twenty dollars. Anthony swore he was in the room when the girls were naked but twenty minutes, as the sight sickened him so that he could not stand it, and he was obliged to leave. Officer Sheldon, on the other hand, swore that Comstock remained in the room an hour and a quarter or an hour and twenty minutes, and did not show any signs of being sickened. There were other points in which the evidence of Comstock and his pals did not agree. The lawyers for the defendants asked Comstock if the Society for the Suppression of Vice employed him to induce persons to commit crimes that they might be arrested, and what salary they paid him for his services. His reply was that he considered the question an insulting one. He refused to state what his salary was, although it is well known that he draws four thousand dollars a year for the miserable services he performs by getting people into trouble and submitting them to heavy expense.

As the trial is not completed as we go to press we cannot give a full report of it this week, but will endeavor to do so in our next. It cannot be denied, however, that the whole thing is a most disgraceful proceeding and that the Christian Society for the Suppression of Vice with Samuel Colgate, Esq., at the head of it, will certainly lose the respect of all honest, upright people if they project and sanction such vile conduct in their agent and representative. If the mission of the society has degenerated to this low degree the best thing they can do is to dissolve and declare that they as individuals will never again authorize nor approve such disgraceful conduct.

It will perhaps be well for the admirers of Anthony Comstock, who think he is engaged in doing such a grand and good work, to state whether they particularly approve and admire his conduct in this, one of the latest of his exploits.

Pledges to the National Defense Fund.

We hope our kind and sympathizing friends scattered over the varions States and territories will not loose sight of the approaching trials and struggles. Four of us are now under bonds to appear before the Court of Oyer and Terminer, and other arrests are threatened. Some heavy fighting will have to be done in opposing our intolerant and tyrannous enemies, and funds are necessary to carry the cases triumphantly through the courts, or even to conduct them in any way. There is nothing like being well prepared for battle.

The following are the pledges that, up to this time, have been given:

Dr. E. B. Foote, Sr., $60.00; James Parton, $25.00; Cortlandt Palmer, $25.00; A. Lohry, $20.00; J. K. Ingalls, $25.00; E. M. Sellon, $10.00; T. B. Wakeman, $10.00; Mrs. E. Wilcox, $10.00; T. R. Smith, $10 00; Chas. Winterburn, M. D., $10,00; G. L. Henderson, $10,00; A. L. Rawson, $10.00; C. A. Codman, $10.00; H. B. Brown, $10 00; T. C. Leland, $10 00; E. B. Foote, Jr., M. D., $10.00; D. M. Our Liberal friends are requested to state such amounts as they are willing to pledge to meet the necessary expense in defending any who are wrongfully attacked. Let a fair sum be rolled up. Whose names shall be added next?

A NEW PAMPHLET IN POETRY. By Warren Sumner Barlow, author of "The Voices" (price 10 cents) entitled, "If, Then, and When," from the doctrines of the Church. It is a sharp and pungent examination into many of the absurdities of theology, and will well pay a perusal. We will give a quotation to show its style.

"From one source came all existence;
From one cause came all effects;
From one center universal
All unfolds as cause directs.

If two sources, good and evil,
Seem to wage a war on earth,
One must antedate Jehovah,
Else Jehovah gave it birth.

Surely both cannot be senior,
And the God whom we adore,
Infinite in love and wisdom,
Never hath a demon bore.

Satan—hoary myth of ages,
How thy hackneyed visage pales—
Too transparent for a shadow,
Where the light of truth prevails."

We hope all our readers, whether subscribers or not, will remember that we are offering THE TRUTH SEEKER three months and Paine's "Age of Reason," or the new American Dictionary (30,000 words), illustrated, bound in good style, for 60 cents. All not now on our list should place themselves there without delay.

The Godly Women of the Bible.—Continued.

BY AN UNGODLY WOMAN OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

REBEKAH.—CONCLUDED.

As soon as Esau went to the field to hunt for venison, this false woman, wife, and mother instructed her younger son how to deceive his old, blind, doting father and to rob her elder son of what rightfully belonged to him. So she ordered him to go and fetch two kids from the flocks, and she would make them savory meat for his father, that he might "bless him before his death." Jacob meets his mother with objections, saying, "My brother is a hairy man, and I am a smooth man. I shall seem to my father as a deceiver; and I shall bring a curse upon me, and not a blessing." "And his mother said unto him, upon me be thy curse, my son; only obey my voice, and go fetch me them." She urged him, and he did as she bade him and brought the kids, and she made savory meat, and took goodly raiment of her elder son, Esau, and put them upon Jacob, and the skins of the kids upon his hands and the smooth of his neck, gave him the savory meat, and sent him off in a hurry to the old man, lest Esau should return before the fraud was consummated. It is enough to make one curse, even though it be a Hebrew fiction, to read how this blind old man questioned this liar, as he thus came into his presence, and the replies given him:

"Who art thou, my son?"

"I am Esau, thy first-born," said he who was to be one of the progenitors of the Messiah. "I have done according as thou badest me."

And Isaac said: "How is it that thou hast found it so quickly, my son?"

And he said: "Because the Lord thy God brought it to me."

Who will wonder, after reading this, that those persons who take the holy Bible for their only rule of faith and practice do not fear to tell lies in the name of God, when it promotes the interests of the Church or their own individual pecuniary interests?

"Come near, I pray thee," says then the old man, "that I may feel thee, my son, whether thou art my very son Esau or not;" and then, as if only half assured when he felt him, he said, "The voice is the voice of Jacob, but the hands are the hands of Esau."

But yet he blessed him; and then, as if fearful that some trick had been played upon him, as, perhaps, he had often before had done, he inquired for the third time:

"Art thou my very son Esau?"

And he said, "I am."

Wasn't that a whopper?

And then he brought him the supposed venison and he ate, and wine, and he drank; and he blessed him, and kissed him, and smelled him, and blessed him yet again, and told him his mother's sons should bow down to him, and that whoever cursed him should be cursed and whoever blessed him should be blessed. And that was the way, fast young America would say, that "Jake and the old woman pulled the wool over dad's eyes;" but Christians pull down their vests, wipe off their chins, and very sanctimoniously whine, "It was Gord's divine plan to fulfill his purposes." I should say it was a bad woman's bad lie, and a bad example for her impressible son to follow, which, it appears, he did to the end of his bad life, and that his posterity after him did not forget it.

And where was Rebekah all this time? Peeping in at the door to see how well her strategem succeeded? Who can imagine the feelings of that mother when Jacob was arguing the case with her, obviating his objections, quieting his fears, throwing herself into the gap, saying, "Upon me be thy curse, my son; only obey my voice"—and that voice a lie! herself making the savory meat that was to deceive her blind, dying husband; herself selecting from Esau's raiment such as would the most effectually conceal and disguise Jacob, and with her own hands placing them upon him; herself putting the skins on his hands and the smooth of his neck; herself giving the savory meat and the bread she had prepared into the hand of Jacob, and in all probability putting the lies into his mouth, and then behold him going into the presence of his father—her husband, with whom she had enjoyed such a sweet honeymoon—hearing the conversation related, and much more; perceiving Isaac in his blindness tremblingly feeling for the hands and neck of Jacob, as if used to deception, and then the pouring forth of the blessing intended for Esau! Did she not falter? did she not repent of the deception? did she not wish in her heart she had never sought to deceive and defraud her three nearest relatives? for they were all deceived and defrauded! If she did not then relent, it would seem as if her heart must have melted when Esau returned and discovered the foul trick played upon him, and when the foolish old father affirmed, "I have eaten of all before thou camest, and have blessed him, yea, and he shall be blessed.

"And Esau cried with a great and exceeding bitter cry, Bless me, even me, also, O my father!"

The old man answered, with more truth than sympathy, "Thy brother came with subtilty, and hath taken away thy blessing."

Now hear Esau in wisdom reply: "Is he not rightly named Jacob? for he hath supplanted me these two times: he took away my birthright, and behold now he hath taken away my blessing. Hast thou not reserved a blessing for me?"

Isaac gave him no consolation, but rather added to his agonies by saying, "I have made him thy lord, and all his brethren have I given to him for servants, and what shall I do now unto thee, my son?"

Poor Esau, and weak old man! It does not seem to occur to him that he ought to revoke his sentence, recall the blessing and place it where it belonged, and disinherit the younger for the trick he had played upon him, and give Mrs. Rebekah a piece of his mind for counseling his son so falsely; no, not a bit of that; and when Esau saw the stern firmness of the old patriarch, again he pleaded in the jaws of despair: "Hast thou but one blessing, my father? Bless me, even me, also, O my father! And Esau lifted up his voice and wept." But it was of no use; the miserable old man was inexorable; the fiat had gone forth; the scheme had worked well, and the smoothing over the matter by Isaac's again reminding Esau that he should serve his brother, only exasperated the young man all the more. Now it was Esau's turn. He had had his pleading, and now came his desire for revenge. And who wonders?

Old Isaac was well satisfied with this falsehood, for, instead of condemning Rebekah and Jacob, he confirmed his blessing on the latter by saying to Esau in his desperation, "I have blessed him, yea, and he shall be blessed." Blessed him! bless such wickedness as that! Well might the subtle mother and wary son laugh in their sleeves, if they had sleeves, when the good old patriarch, Isaac, of whom but one other mean act is recorded—viz.: denying his wife instead of turning on his favorite's side and justifying his first-born—decides against him and in favor of his treacherous son duped by his disloyal wife. No wonder Esau hated Jacob for supplanting him, and sought to kill him; it is a greater wonder that he did not include the godly mother in his vengeance, if he knew the role she played in the conspiracy. Neither repented, as we have any account, but gloried in their crime.

Nevertheless, the old lady became frightened for fear she should lose her favorite, and resorted to lying again to screen her motives and cover her purposes. When she heard that Esau would kill Jacob for his subtlety after their father's death, she ordered him again to obey her voice and flee to Laban, her brother, in Haron, and then went to the old man with a lie in her mouth as usual, pretending, as an excuse why she sent him away, "I am weary of my life because of the daughters of Heth; if Jacob take a wife of the daughters of Heth, such as these which are of the daughters of the land, what good shall my life do me?"

What a lying hypocrite! Did she, this godly woman, fear that Jacob could find any worse wife, any greater liar, a more unfeeling and inhuman woman and mother, than his father, Isaac, found in Rebekah, his mother, the daughter of Bethuel, whom Abraham's servant brought from Nahor out of his own country, and from among his own kindred, that she desired him not to take a wife from them for fear they would weary her life out of her? O Rebekah, Rebekah! you were a bad e-g-g, and in these modern times would not answer for a first-rate deacon's wife; but Bible-makers could not dispense with you, as you were one of the great-great-grandmothers of the second person in the Trinity, the immaculate Savior of mankind.

This remarkable godly woman and holy mother in Israel is not again mentioned in the Old Testament, though referred to in the New as one of the mothers of the Hebrew nation (Rom. ix, 10).

Jacob went to his uncle Laban's, and his career will be pursued in connection with Laban's godly daughters, his future wives, the amiable Rachel, and her exquisite sister Leah, without whom the Deity could not have incarnated himself in the person of Jesus Christ.

The Argosy.

BY W. F. JAMIESON.

The "ship" is launched by H. N. F. Lewis and his talented wife, Jennie T. Hazen Lewis, at Chicago, Ill. I esteem the captain and his mate very highly; but as I never permit my friendship for any human being to impede free utterance of my convictions I herewith "draw a bead" on the Argosy. If I could sink the craft I would. We have enough, and more than enough, Christian and semi-Christian publications. It is my firm opinion that just so far as "aid and comfort" is rendered to Christianity, just that far the human race is cursed. I think my friends (and I know them well enough to know they will not feel less friendly toward me on account of this round shot) have mistaken the "signs of the times." The demand of every truth seeker is for uncompromising utterances; clear-cut, individual expression, rather than organized uniformity. An organization or association formed at the cost of truth is not worth the cement which holds it together.

The Argosy says:

"The Spiritualist has been arrayed against the Christian, and the Christian, in turn, against the Spiritualist.'

That hardly conveyed a correct impression. It is a fact that Christians, as a rule, true to the instincts of their system, are against the person as well the principle. But Spiritualists, while opposing Christianity, do not make war upon the individual. If Christians construe the attacks upon their religious ideas as assaults upon men and women, it is only the result of their own mode of warfare. The Argosy would have Christians and Spiritualists united into one body because they believe in the "ministry of spirits," which, says the Argosy, is "a most beautiful truth, which should constitute a cementing link of union." Both parties believe in the beautiful truths of geometry. One point of disagreement will prevent union, though there be ninety-nine points of harmony. The science of chemistry inculcates this lesson. There is too much worship of a mere man, and mere books, and mere authority among Christians to permit them to affiliate with any class that repudiates such worship. Christians still preach too much hell, devil, damnation, depravity, and angry godology to suit people who have outgrown such childish fables. The differences between Christianity and Spiritualism are too radical to ever be ignored. No amount of "soft sawder" will ever blend them into loving accord. The differences are heaven-wide, for which the Spiritualists ought to be thankful. But the Argosy says that the "antagonism" caused by arraying angel ministry against "organized religions" is "unreasonable," and has proved "unfortunate." It has had the effect to degrade "the ministry of spirits" in the "popular apprehension. If these organized religions are such excellent institutions, and they already possessed what Spiritualism gives, of what earthly use has Spiritualism been? According to the Argosy it has been a great damage to the world.

The Argosy has sweet words for the Christian's pet—Jesus. But it unwittingly confesses that Jesus was naughty: "The Great Reformer of Nazareth spoke sentiments antagonistic and distasteful to the people of his time." So he too was against the "organized religions" of his day. He spoiled all chance for union!

It appears to me that when people abandon all compromise methods, the practice of policy for the sake of a large following, search boldly for the truth, teach and live it as fast as found, they will avoid the Niagara whirlpool in which the Argosy is whirling and plunging. The query then will not be as the Argosy now says, "The ways and means is the question that perplexes," but "What is Truth," and as fast as we learn it leave "ways and means" to adjust themselves to the truth, and never the truth to ways and means. The Argosy is afloat with a splendid Captain and Mate, but has no keel and not much rudder.

Pious Correspondence.

Deacon Skidmore's Eighth Letter.

HOME PERSECUTIONS.

ZION HIL, N. J., Sept. 23, 1878.

MR. EDITUR: Yu need not think yu ar the only wun hoo iz being persekuted for thinking and reeding and saing what yu beleev to be tru, for I am getting a littel tuch ov it myself. I hav ekspekted it for sevral weeks. In fakt, I had not ben taking yure paper a munth before I made up my mind that I wood not be aloud to reed it in peese. I not only perseevd that I wood hav sum trubbul at home but that meny ov my good brethren and sisters in the church wood bizzy themselvs sumwhot about my affares. And it haz turnd out jist about az I ekspekted. Zion Hil church iz very much disturbd about whot its furst deeken reeds and whot he thinks. I tel yu the eksitement runs hi, and, in the wurdz ov the inspired samist, "The devil iz to pa." I'v seen this thing wurking for sum time, so I am not taken much by surprize. I ges I told yu in wun ov my furst letterz that wife Sally waz not in favor ov yure wiked paper kuming into the hous, and evry Frida, when it makes its apeerans I kan se that it throze hur into an unhappy state ov mind, and the wa she spits out hur anger iz not alwaze plezant to put up with. "Wel," she wood sa, "yu hav brot home that old Infidel paper agen. I do think it iz a downrite disgrase for that abominabul sheet to kum into this hous, and I do feel az tho it aut to sink rite into the erth, or be struk with the litenings ov heven, if that paper kontinuze to kum heer. I kant understand whot God iz thinking about that he duz not bring sum terribul jujment upon this hous or the peepel in it if that ungodly paper keeps kuming heer evry week. I do sumtimes think God iz remiss in hiz duty, that he duz not stop all the Infidelity in this kuntry, and strike down the Infidel papers and palzy the Infidel editurs hoo ar sending out thare damnabul darknes and unbeleef week after week. I do think he iz to blame that he lets this kind of thing go on the wa he duz from yeer to yeer. He haz to much kindnes and long-suffring altogether. It iz wel that supreem powr aint plased in my hands, for if it waz, thare wood not be a singel Infidel left to kumber the ground in a week after I kum into powr. I think I wood not only exterminate the editurs hoo kondukt the papers but evry man and woman hoo kontributes to them, and evry printer hoo sets type on them, and evry binder hoo helps to make such stuff up into books. Yes, Deeken Joel Skidmore, if I waz only God Almity for the term ov 3 weeks, I ges yure Infidel frend Bennett, and all the rest of them, wood find it out to thare sorro."

Thus my wife went on, and thus from time to time she spends her breth, and the worst ov it iz she kant keep from tawking hur unhappy feelings to other members ov our church, espeshally the wimmin, whenever she meets with them. She and Mrs. Jones vizit bak and forth. Wun afternoon in the week my wife goze over to her hous, aud wun da the next week Mrs. Jones kums heer and staze all the afternoon.

Mrs. Jonesiz a vary pius wuman, and undoutedly haz relijun enuf for eny 3 wimmin in the kounty. In fakt, she haz so much piety that it makes her pozitivly unhapy. She sees a grate deel that is rong and that she haz to kondem most emfatikally. She haz such a keen sense ov smell for evrything that iz not just rite that her noze iz turned up in an unplezant manner neerly all the time. She seez sumthing in evry person that she kan find fault with, and she don't hezitate to do it, yu had better beleev. Tha do sa that she leeds her poor huzband an unhappy life, and she haz him so kompleetly under her thum that he don't hardly dare to speek a loud word or sa hiz soul iz hiz own. But it happens she don't hav to go far from home to find imperfekshuns and mistakes. Her oldest dawter, Beky, waz deseeved by Tom Fletcher, hoom she thawt wood marry her, and the rezult waz she had a little wun, and she haz never marrid yet, but livs at home with the old fokes. Wun ov her boys iz akkused ov playing a similar game upon Amanda Finch, only dawter ov Wido Finch, and who waz a favorit with evrybody. He won her affekshuns, ruind her, and then refuzd to marry her. It haz kast a blite upon that little family that never wil be removed. Amanda don't go into sosiety eny more, and when she attends church she hardly ever razes her ize or speeks to enybody, and her muther looks 15 yeers older sinse that unfortunate okkurrense took plase.

Anuther ov Mrs. Jones's sons sined hiz father's name to a 25-dollar note without the old man's nolej, and if the thing had not ben hushed up by the old man's paing the note and 50 dollars more with it, the yung man wood hav ben sent to State prizen.

So, with all ov Mrs. Jones's piety, and with all her abhorrense of the faults ov uthers, her own family is about az far from being perfect az eny in the naborhood, unless it iz sum ov thoze Methodists in Pius Holler, and I must sa tha hav dun wurse things than most eny ov Zion Hil church fokes hav ben gilty ov. I am sorry to hav to speek in this wa about my Kristyan brethren and sisters, but truth kompels me.

Wel, az I waz saing, Mrs. Jones vizits my wife wunse evry uther week, and az she keeps her mind on the jump, her ize steddily employd, and her noze on the sent for sum faults ov sumbody's which she kan tawk about and hold up for konsiderashun, she iz not much bothered in alwaze finding sumthing to bizzy herself upon. About 2 weeks ago, when she waz making her regular vizit here, she diskovered a kopy ov THE TRUTH SEEKER lying on the table. I had ben looking it over, and had just stept out ov the room and lade down on a lounge in the side room to reflekt on what I had red, and to rest myself. Mrs. Jones pikt up the paper, and kwestyund my wife in this manner:

"Why, Mrs. Skidmore, what paper iz this? It ain't a Baptist paper, iz it?"

"No, indeed!" replied Mrs. S. "It iz no Baptist paper, I'll assure yu. Thare ain't a bit ov the Baptist sperit in that paper."

"Then, whot kind ov a paper iz it? Do tell me. I hav never seen wun before."

"Why, if yu must no, Mrs. Jones, it iz whot iz kalld an Infidel paper; but I'm reel ashamed to hav yu se it. I try to keep it out ov site, but my huzband waz reeding it a littel while ago and left it thare, I suppoze, so yu kood get hold ov it. I wood rather hav burnt a lofe ov bred in the uven than for yu to hav seen that wiked paper."

"Why, yu skare me. If it iz so wiked, what in the wurld iz it doing here in this hous, which aut to be the best hous in this hole naberhood. Deeken Skidmore iz our first deeken, and we expekt, ov kourse, that he wil not allow enything not striktly akkording to the hiest standard ov morality. Tel me how in the wurld he ever got hiz own konsent to take an Infidel paper, which I find lying here rite side by side with the Examiner and Kronikle."

"Wel, yu se, in the first plase, he konsiders Kaptin Smith hiz partikular frend, and Smith used to lend him TRUTH SEEKERS, and I notised he took an interest in them and liked to reed them. He next took a noshun that he wood like to rite a seriez ov letters for the paper to konvert the editur and all hiz reeders. He subskribed for three munths, and he haz been riting a letter for it every week. Don't yu beleev it takes about haf a da evry Mundy for him to get hiz letter reddy to send off to that abominabul old TRUTH SEEEER; and I kan se that he sees hiz name and hiz letters in it with a grate amount ov satisfakshun. When the new wun is brawt from the post-offis, yu aut to se how kwik he goze for it; and the first thing he looks for iz hiz own mizerably spelt letter. And I kan se by the wa he smiles and gloze that hiz vanity iz tikled kleer up to hiz eers. He iz vane enuf to think that hiz letters ar going to konvert that wiked old Bennett, and perhaps hundreds ov others; but I tell him he iz an old fool to think eny such thing. I am a grate deel more afrade that he wil get konverted himself, and Suzan, to. I don't want to sa enything about it outside our own family, but it iz the onest truth that my dawter iz littel better than an Infidel. She thinks more to-da ov that mizerabul old Bennett than she duz ov Elder Goodly himself."

"Why, Mrs. Skidmore! how yu do surprize me! Hoo wood hav thawt things wood ever hav kum to this state ov things? I feel az tho our church iz disgrased, and I regard it az my duty to se that sumthing iz dun to stop this heresy; for heresy it iz. If heresy kannot be put down eny other way, I beleev it wood be rite to go bak to the rule ov a fu hundred yeers ago and hang and burn thoze who wil harber it. Thare iz nuthing that I no ov that seems so bad az heresy, and when I think it over I do not blame our Kristyan frends, the bishops and rulers, hoo used to tortyur and burn and hang thoze hoo wood perzist in thare infernal heresy and wood not aksept the tru fathe. I don't no but it wood be a good plan to try that medisin a littel even nowadays. I ges if that man Bennett hoo prints this bad paper waz put on the wheel awhile, or waz about haf roasted by a green-oke fier, that he wood be indused to part with a littel bit ov hiz heresy and unbeleef. Thare waz probably sumthing vary perswasiv in the use ov thoze severe applianses that tha used to uze a fu hundred yeers ago to korrekt the tendensy to go astra which waz shown by thoze hoo did not chooz to be diktated to az to whot tha shood aksept and whot tha shood refuze. I am much afrade that that kind ov punishment was dropt a fu hundred yeers to soon. And now, Mrs. Skidmore, I am going to hav this littel biznes about yure huzband taking and reeding that TRUTH SEEKER lookt into. I don't think it iz right for a prominent member ov our church, and a deeken to, to be taking such a vile sheet. I am going to se Mrs. Kragehed, Mrs. Putnam, and Mrs. Studley. We will tawk the matter over, and then we will kall on Elder Goodly and giv him our vuze relativ to this departure ov the deeken's from the fold ov Zion. We wil also se a fu more members, and we wil bring such an influense to bare that the deeken wil find he had better throw that paper awa, never hav it in hiz hous agen, and, in prare and humiliation, seek the forgiveness ov evry member ov the church."

"Oh, Mrs. Jones! yu friten me! Pra don't take eny such steps. If yu do whot yu threten, we shal be awfully disgrased; and I kannot bare the thawt ov that."

"Wel, rite iz rite; I kannot put up with heresy, and I wil not. I am going to do just what I hav sed. I meen no harm to yu, but I must do my duty. If I se yure huzband taking the downward path to destrukshun, I must do whot I kan to save him."

And thus, Mr. Editur, thoze 2 wimmen went on about yure paper and yure humbul servant, and I had to laf hartily to myself to heer it go on. And I had a good laf, too, with my wife after Mrs. Jones had gone home. My wife was neerly skart into a konnipshun fit about the matter and sed we wood be set bak in the pozishun we now okkupyd in the church, and we wood be forever disgrased. I replyd that if I never did enything to disgrase myself and family eny wurse than to rite a letter onse a week to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and to reed whot it haz to sa, I shood get through life vary onerably. I furthermore told my unhappy wife that I had undertaken to reed THE TRUTH SEEKER for 3 munths, and that I shood karry it out if my life waz spared. I sed, "Kum, Sally, cheer up; don't let whot Mrs. Jones haz tawked kauze yu eny unhappines." Suzan joind in with me, and sed she did not like to se enybody hav kwite so much piety as Mrs. Jones had; and, for her part, she liked Kaptin Smith's religion much better than she did Mrs. Jones'. She sed she had much rather se her father giv up the offis ov deeken than to akt kowardly and be koersed into doing enything hiz konshunse did not diktate.

Sinse that da a good deel ov buzzing has ben dun by the extra pius soles in the church. Several ov the old wimmin and sum hoo ware, pants, hav taken it upon themselves to deside for me what iz proper for me to reed, and ov the grate sinfulness ov my reeding THE TRUTH SEEKER. A grate many hav ben to Elder Goodly about it. At first he tryd to kwiet the thing down by saying that he did not beleev enything I red wood do me much hurt; I waz old enuf to not be led astra, and all that. But Mrs. Jones would not yield the point, and she has kept on stirring up the matter until a speshal church meeting haz ben kalld for next Frida, the 27th, konsisting ov the adult members ov the church, to inquire into the propriety ov Deeken Skidmore's taking THE TRUTH SEEKER and riting for it also. It iz expekted we wil hav a pretty lively time. Mrs. Jones and her klik wil ov kourse be on hand and do all in thare power, but I ges tha wil spare my life. I don't feel at all uneezy. I no I am rite, and I shal go on in my duty regardles of what al the old wimmen in town have to sa.

To show how undisturbed I am, I wil order in this letter 6 more kopys ov THE TRUTH SEEKER for trial subskribers and 3 dikshunarys, and 3 "Age ov Reezens." Sum hav herd that book denounsed so long tha want to see what it iz. You wil find the names on the enklozed peese ov paper. Al to kum to this offis. The dikshunary yu sent iz a good wun, and the wunder iz how yu kan giv so much for so littel. I shal rite you an akkount ov the churching I get next Frida. In the meen time, beleev me wun hoo wil stand up for the rite. Yures truly,

JOEL SKIDMORE,
1st Deeken ov Zion Hil Baptist Church.

The Fear of Death.

MR. EDITOR: The imaginary horrors of death—the incentive of orthodoxy—the vague hallucinations of the mind of hell and its torments, form the greatest impediment to intellectual liberty and spiritual refinement. The disintegration of the soul, the disseveration of combined organisms, approaches quietly, unseen, tenacious to its purpose, insatiate as the ocean, relentless as the fierce northwestern blast, alike on youth, middle and old age, high and low, rich and poor, in the exhilarating presence of the May shower, the cool, refreshing shade of August, or the bleak and desolate winds of December, it goes on to completion, death, an exhausted nature, the only friend of peace, that which brings to man the Church's greatest boast—that sometime in the dismal future they promise you rest. It is the messenger of peace and the quiet of the long hoped-for rest. Its work is quiet—why abhor it? Painless as sleep—why fear it? It does not deal with the finer sensibilities of man: they by lassitude and disease become stultified and obtuse, and the separation takes place gradually and without pain, let the cause be what it may. The greater and more sudden the cause which produces death, the greater and more suddenly follows the destruction of the sensibilities or finer feelings of man. With the gulosity of a starving hyena, it lurks in the inner recesses of the soul, intangible until it has routed all animation; there in a perfect state of invisibility we confess ourselves hopelessly conquered, and peacefully concede its supremacy over all animation. While death is thus performing its friendless function, surrounded by friends of its victim half frenzied with anguish and the revolting idea of forever separating, never to know each other more; with uplifted hands in "reverential prayer," as we have been taught that our creator will sustain us in trouble and disarm our enemies; yet the great destroyer, in every instance, unmolested, continues his work to a successful termination, and our pleadings and intercessions fall unnoticed and unsuccessful.

The most painful thing about death is the mental agony of separating from surrounding friends; the thought of this is repugnant to the human heart. It is one of the worst features of nature to think of parting forever with those near and dear to us. Let us, then, study our organism, its susceptibility to the law of cause and effect, and in many instances, for the time being, we may be able to avert its functions. How frequently, from observation and experience, we have learned that a mortal wound produces no pain; if inflicted in the dark, the victim scarcely realizes his injury until his attention is attracted by the flow of blood, proving conclusively that the more sudden the cause of death, the less painful the effect. I speak from experience, having twice been inclosed in death's cold embrace during my existence in this fair land—once by drowning, the sensation of which was as peaceful and as agreeable to me as sweet sleep; the other was a sudden dash to the earth, which so completely destroyed my sensibilities that even that was quiet and ease. Then why fear, why abhor death? Its coming is as quiet as the dawn; its presence as peaceful as sweet sleep. Respectfully yours,

A Reader of The Truth Seeker.

Letters from Friends.

Carthage, Mo., August 21, 1878.

D. M. Bennett, Esq., My Dear Sir: The Truth Seeker is getting better with each number, and this fall I shall again try to raise you some more subscribers. Brother W. F. Jamieson will give a course of lectures here the last week in September, and I think the Liberals will be wakened up. About that time if you will send me a few copies of the paper I will circulate them judiciously, and send what subscribers I can get. Your sincere friend, Eber Budlong.

Alliance, Ohio, Sept. 16, 1878.

D. M. Bennett, Dear Sir: I inclose 60 cents, for which please send by mail to my address below "The Holy Bible Abridged" (in paper), "The Trinity" photograph, and "Cupid's Yokes." I am going to read this work at the risk of becoming morally corrupted; and if Anthony Comstock thinks proper to arrest me for having it in my possession, he will have no difficulty in finding me, and will be met with a warm reception. I would like the honor of ridding the world of such a black villain as he. May you be enabled to go on with the good work you have begun.

Very respectfully, Mrs. Annie E. Edwards.

Lowell, Mich., Sept. 15, 1878.

D. M. Bennett, Dear Sir: I am glad to read your paper, and am glad you were arrested at Watkins. If any one is to be arrested, I hope it may be one so able and brave as yourself to defend. You have a powerful pen, and as to material aid, the liberty-loving people will contribute freely. That Comstock is simply a savage.

I see that the Catholics are bringing religion into politics now at Columbus, where a speaker said that when the Republicans were burning their convents the Democrats were their friends. Now, do you know that the whole war against the Chinese is incited by the Catholic Church, because they cannot proselyte them and can get no money out of them? The ball was set a-rolling by Father Walsh, of San Francisco, four or five years ago, in his lecture in Platt's Hall, on the subject, "Chinaman or White Man—Which?" Then he was followed by Frank Pixley, a third-rate politician. They both made gross misstatements, and were answered by, I think, Robinson, who had been a missionary to China. From that time to this it has not been safe for a Chinaman to walk the streets of San Francisco without being stoned by the Irish boys. I have myself seen on Fourth street eight or ten half-grown boys on Sunday pulling a Chinaman's cue, throwing his hat on porches, etc., and this on a Christian Sabbath. Free country, this! Walsh's and Frank Pixley's and Robertson's lectures were published in the San Francisco Chronicle at the time. I have not a copy, or I would send it to you. W. R. Frink.

P. S.—I am not stationary, or I would subscribe for your paper, but I always buy it at the news-stands when I can find it. I have taken the Banner of Light for ten years, out of general principles, as I think it has been instrumental in making it possible for Bob Ingersoll to speak in New York and Boston without being mobbed. W. R. F.

Belle Plains, Wis., Aug. 21, 1878.

D. M. Bennett, Dear Friend: The "Champions" was duly received, and I have carefully examined its contents. It is a complete exposure of the insane Christian career of indulgences in holy cruelties for many centuries up to the present time. Of all your valuable works this is emphatically the masterpiece; the accompanying superb portrait of its author is most heartily welcomed. The price, three dollars, is very low for such a valuable and extensive work. It ought to adorn every library in America.

A thousand thanks to the noble Truth Seeker for noticing the health reform tract entitled the "Salt Eating Habit" published by Austin, Jackson & Co., Dansville, N. Y. I sent 60 cents for a dozen copies for distribution amongst the salt-intoxicated God-worshipers of Wisconsin, and by incessant agitation of the salt question have succeeded in making a complete uproar amongst the Christian fanatics, as it is the excessive salt-eaters, or intoxicated salt-drunkards who are invariably the most zealous church members.

Salt, i. e., chloride of sodium, is now positively known as the king of poisons by its causing a much greater destruction of the human race than the entire balance of poisons yet discovered in the entire range of the science of toxicology. Fully nine-tenths of all human suffering for more than thirty centuries can be ascribed to the universal use of salt in articles of food, either as a seasoning or condiment or antiseptic. Salt is also exceedingly poisonous to all domestic animals.

I should rejoice to see your paper advertise the "Salt-Eating Habit" at wholesale and retail, as it ought to be in the hands of every American. Also Trall's "Popular Physiology," published by S. R. Wells & Co., which should be in every family and public school in America. It is the only physiology that discourages salt eating. You should also extensively advertise Dr. Trall's "Hygeian Cook Book," 25 and 50 cents. It alone has saved my life as there is no salt used in it. It should be used everywhere instead of Bibles. Where this work goes in sickness goes out, and no doctor is wanted with his deadly poisons.

I rejoice to see that the fearless Truth Seeker is making rapid strides towards inaugurating rational hygienic health reform, through which reform only can our country ever be redeemed.

The splendid portrait of Mrs. Lawrence the great sanitary reformer, which so gracefully adorns the pages of your paper is a very welcome visitor.

Rational health reform is the basis of all reform. I should rejoice to hear of still more hygienic health reformers in the field. Before these true scientists old theology must vanish like dew before the sun.

Your bold stand taken in regard to obscenity is thus far correct. In nature obscenity is entirely unknown, excepting to those who are suffering from disease i. e. salaciousness, which invariably results from the arrant Christian habit of salt-eating, and which habit is entirely unknown amongst strict vegetarians, of which the lamented William Cullen Bryant the great American poet was a noble example.

Your plain vegetarian habit of living, which you formed while residing amongst the Shakers, makes your blood pure, which makes a sound mind in a sound body; hence you know no suffering from obscenity or salaciousness. Thus your triumph is complete over your salacious enemies. They must reform before they can cope with strict sanity.

As Brother E. H. Heywood uses neither rum nor tobacco the too common Christian custom and habit, I infer that he is a strict vegetarian, if so, I hope sincerely that he will yet be the Governor of Massachusetts or the President of the United States, when in either event he would not retaliate in kind, but would on the contrary exercise for all, whether friends or enemies, true love, charity, and magnanimity. His heartless and extremely cruel incarceration will eventually tend to purify the moral and sanitary atmosphere. Yours for truth and sanity,

J. Melendy.

Sandusky, Ohio, Sept. 1, 1878.

D. M. Bennett, Dear Sir: The surrounding country, thickly populated, contains, despite the continual efforts of revivalists, a large amount of the Liberal element which needs only the force of Liberal literature to make it patronize the cause which is destined to free mankind from the chains of superstition and hypocrisy. Such Liberal works as I have circulated have proven the weight of Infidel over Christian reasoning, and I propose to use such other works as I may order, in the same way. I have frequently requested you to forward a copy of your Truth Seeker for inspection, but as yet have received none. John McLoughlin.

Friend Bennett: We notice that some of your writers seem to be most clear and logical in all respects save one, but in this where it seems to us they should be most clear, they are strangely silent. We frequently commence reading one of their articles, which precisely meets our own views, when all at once they have something to say about the goodness of God, the bright hereafter, or something to that effect. It is on this point that we need a little information. Before this can be of any service to many of your readers it will be necessary for them to understand what the writers are talking about. Before they can believe in the goodness of God, they must believe in that something to tack the goodness on to, which they (the writers) call God.

In reading The Truth Seeker for over a year, we have found that many of its writers frequently speak of God, hereafter, etc., as though they were well established facts. Why not come out Bennett, Underwood, or Slenker-like, and if they know nothing about such things say so, and say it loud. Should any of these writers, though, feel disposed to prove this God-and-hereafter business, then "it were well 'twere done quickly." Ingersoll says "an honest God is the noblest work of man." If he had said a non-est god's the noblest work of man, he would have struck the nail square on the head. We do not object to gods, Allahs, and Mumbo-Jumbos if there are any, but we object to making them, most decidedly. A Reader.

Fort Leavenworth, Kan., Sept. 18, 1878.

Bro. Bennett: You can append my name to the card relative to Heywood's book on page 585 of last Truth Seeker, under heading "Declaration of Rights." I have read "Cupid's Yokes," and do not regard it as an obscene work. I do not agree with his views, but I believe in free press and free speech, at any and all times. Petition for Heywood's pardon is being circulated here.

Fraternally, Wm. Emmette Coleman.

Lawrence, Mass., Sept. 10, 1878.

D. M. Bennett, Dear Sir: I see by The Truth Seeker that you have been once more arrested by the bigots of the nineteenth century. What a shame it is that a man is deprived of his liberty of speech and the right to think for himself! How would your enemies like their liberties taken away and be forced into prison for acting according to their belief? In the Bible they ought to read the story of Lot and his two daughters, and old King David's history, and Solomon's—of his numerous wives and concubines. It looks as though it might be a little obscene. I hold that they ought not to be deprived of reading that obscenity in "God's Book," and thinking their own thoughts, which they can't help, without being arrested and flung into prison. What are they thinking about? Who is running this world? Are they running it for God, or is God doing it? They ought to be ashamed of themselves. If their God was a sensible God, he would be ashamed of them. They ought to read your book, "Interrogatories to Jehovah," one of the best books I ever read, for an eye opener. I think if they had read that they never would have thought of arresting you, as they would see that you and Jehovah were on the best of terms. I want you to send me six copies of those "Interrogatories," so that I can hand some of them around to read. Readers of this book will get a good insight into the Bible; they will never need to read the Bible any more, as they will be familiar with the whole book from beginning to end. You ought to send a copy to Judge Hurd; it would help him to instruct the jury in your case. I think if he should read it you would stand a fair chance to be released. I hope every truth seeker will buy one of these books and keep it out among his Christian friends to read until it is all worn out, then send to you and get another, and do likewise with it. Yours truly, your friend

Benjamin Griffin.

Tom's River, N. J., Sept. 23, 1878.

Dear Friend Bennett: I feel proud to live in a country and an age that calls out the metal of true man and womanhood as manifest in the "Declaration of Rights" published in the truth teller called The Truth Seeker. Please add my name to that list of true-hearted defenders of the rights of American men and women. There I feel it will be an honor to stand and defend the rights of all to mental and physical freedom, to act for the greatest good to the greatest number. How fortunate is the nation to have so true a champion of free press as yourself. And so grand a defender of an honest American finance system as the Hon. B. F. Butler. As well as labor, its brave and fearless advocate of free speech for the poor man, as is to be found in the person of the hero of California's workingmen, Denis Kearney. I am thankful that our paper is free to give all sides of any question of public interest, and especially the money system. And when the masses who do all the business and labor and pay all the taxes and interest, learn the deep enormity of their wrongs, they will curse the ignorance that made them slaves, that furnished the conditions of their own bondage. Then will they rule this goodly land, and all other lands. Then will they no longer submit to the select undermining of all honesty, all goodness, all equity, all manhood, or generosity, by that infernal outrage, that sanctified moral financial monster, interest on money. It is the culmination of all misery, tears, wails and woes, heart-throbs of pain, homeless families, supperless children, overworked fathers and mothers, that the world has witnessed for centuries; the organized destroyer of all human hopes and happiness, and has held undisputed control of the destiny of nations for hundreds of years, and has in the past so held this nation in its grasp, until the nation has awakened as one man to look at the real power of this legalized, loafing robber of honest toil. Ere long the demand will be made and justly too, that interest on money shall die. Equity shall be established instead. Then shall the lender be willing to pay for the safe keeping and sure return of all moneys borrowed. And not till then will human love prevail. Yours for progress,

O. N. Bancroft.

Hartford, Conn., Sept. 10, 1878.

Bro. Bennett, Dear Sir: I see you and three other free American citizens have been arrested because of your honest thoughts and deeds, but as Pope said, whatever is, is right, and these late arrests may be; but don't these pretending pious fools know that persecution is the surest means of success in any cause, and especially in your case where you have philosophy, reason, justice, and truth to sustain you, while on the other hand these Christian fanatics have nothing to sustain them but assumption, bigotry, superstition, and blind faith. But don't fear; truth is mighty and will prevail. It is only a matter of time. Liberalism has never grown faster than it has since your persecution last winter, and this last arrest will simply add fuel to the flame. Don't be discouraged, for the friends of truth and enemies of bigotry and superstition will rally to your aid, bearing a thousand banners upon which shall be written, "Truth and reform, justice and equal rights to every man, woman, and child." This will be the religion of the future. Living facts; no more dead faith; works and deeds instead of prayers for the starving and naked poor. We had a good illustration of that mode of relief in this city last winter. $30,000 spent for lip twaddle for Moody, Sankey, Pentecost, & Co., and not one dollar to put shoes on the bare feet of God's children. This is Christianity; this is the kind of stock that pays to-day, but those who possess a large amount, I advise to sell out, for the day is not far distant when it will not bring the price of common paper rags. I have often heard it said that the prayers of the righteous availeth much, and that the Lord is a prayer-answering God, but I am beginning to have grave doubts in the matter, for Catholics, Episcopalians, and all other denominations have been praying to and imploring the Almighty God for weeks to stay this terrible plague in the South, but it has been increasing right along from day to day. God has either forsaken these petitioners, or else he is so far away that he can't hear them, or won't, and more than all, he never will give them the reason why. The only prayers, in my opinion, that will amount to anything in checking the plague will be vigilant and strict sanitary measures, and a few good frosts which God or nature in his own good time will send along when ready, independent of all the senseless prayers offered in his or their behalf, not even thanking the poor dupes for their senseless waste of breath and time. Crush hypocrisy out of existence to-day, and there is not a religious denomination in this country that could exist one year from date. Science and common sense would then be the order of the day. Comstockism, persecution, and tyranny would soon take their places among the things that were, and peace and good will would reign supreme. But the millions of money annually filched from the ignorant for the support of hypocrisy will make a desperate struggle to crush Liberalism, science, and truth, and all we can do is to labor on as you are doing. I know of nothing that is doing so much good as your glorious paper, and the books and pamphlets sent out from your office are unequaled. Every friend of truth should freely give to sustain you and the other friends who are under arrest in the coming trial, caused by clerical thieves, liars, murderers, cut-throats, and destroyers of virtue, truth, and justice, as history clearly proves the clergy to be, ever since the first religious sect has been organized to the present time. My article I fear will weary you, but if it does, throw it in the waste basket, after you receive my mite to your relief fund, as it does me some good to put my honest convictions on paper, whether read or not. Yours in haste,

D. Bodifield, M.D.

231 W. 37th St., New York, Sept. 17, 1878.

Friend Bennett: You will please put my name on the Roll of Honor, the "Declaration of Rights," and furthermore put me down on your Defense Fund for an additional $5.00, guaranteed when needed. Not only this, but I assure you, come what may in your approaching trial, I will stand by you while strength and means last to the extent of my ability, and I trust that I will prove but one of thousands who will make the coming issue of liberty or serfdom their own. I want a copy of "Cupid's Yokes," one "Holy Bible," one "Trinity," "Crimes and Cruelties of Christianity."

Little Rock, Ark., Aug. 29, 1878.

Mr. D. M. Bennett, Dear Sir; The tracts you sent were duly received, and have been thoroughly digested. By referring to the Bible and history I find the grounds taken and the points made are fully sustained, and there is no denying it. That they speak for themselves may be easily seen by examining them, not simply reading them, but by taking each point and item, and searching histories and the Bible for proof. In this way it will be seen that no mistake can be made, and that the truth must prevail. If people could be induced to take this method and apply it thoroughly, as a test, to the Bible and religion, I am satisfied that the Liberal ranks would not want for numbers, and that religious bigotry and fanaticism would soon disappear from our midst.

As it is, preachers throughout the country preach up freedom of thought, of speech, and of the press. At the same time, if you ask one of them to explain some obscure point in the Bible, they tell you that it is wicked, ungodly, and a sin to examine into or doubt these crooked portions of the Scriptures, and that we should accept them as a whole without regard to their contradictions. If you attempt to reason for yourself or to discuss these points, they call you a skeptic and a heretic, and hurl all kinds of abuse at you, and use their influence in every possible way to lower and degrade you in the eyes of the community, asserting that you are irreligious (a terrible crime in their eyes) and immoral. But they do not stop here; they use their influence to injure your business or to have you thrown out of employment, thus reducing yourself and family to want and distress. If an editor inserts anything in his paper in regard to their religion, or comments upon their sacred (humbug!) Bible, they cast their foulest reflections upon him and his paper, have him arrested and cast into prison, and appeal to the holy Jesus to destroy the blasphemer and his paper. All this is done for the sake of that blessed, meek, and merciful Savior!

Thus it is that those who would be Liberal—would read and think for themselves—are kept from doing so by those humble followers of Jesus, who use their holy influence to destroy their business, take away their liberty, and reduce them to want and poverty. And thus it will be until all true lovers of liberty and justice unite in their demands for true freedom of speech and freedom of the press, and that in the broadest sense of the word.

I am glad to note the position you have taken in regard to Spiritualism and Atheism as well as Comstockism. There will be a day of reckoning for Comstock; and when it does come, he will sink into that oblivion which he so justly merits. The law should be repealed at once, and unconditionally. The different States should pass laws to prohibit the publication and sale of obscene literature; and the word "obscene" should be thoroughly defined, so that such designing and unprincipled scoundrels as Comstock & Co. could not pervert the law to oppress innocent persons.

In opposing this oppressive and unjust law you are doing a noble work, the effects of which will be seen for ages to come. May you live long and ever prosper in the good cause which you have so earnestly espoused.

Respectfully yours, T. H. Lewis.

P. S.—Inclosed you will find a petition for the release of Mr. E. H. Heywood, signed by over one hundred prominent citizens of Little Rock, most of whom are business men.

T. L.

Rush Centre, Kansas, Sept. 16, 1878.

Dear Bennett: Keep on with the good work. Show the enemy no quarter. Saw a copy of "The Champions of the Church" the other day, and as soon as able will have one of my own. It is undoubtedly the most destructive weapon that has ever been used against fanaticism. There are about twenty-five Freethinkers in this county, and I think I can get up a society and perhaps a large club for your paper. I will do my best at any rate.

I was at a Methodist meeting last night, and heard that doleful story about the death of Thomas—excuse me—"Old Tom Paine." After the speaker had concluded, I demanded his authority, and all he could say was that it was a "historical fact." This I denied, and as I had just completed Col. Ingersoll's "Vindication of Paine," I was able to tell the whole story. I then branched out about the contradictions, cruelties, and all that, and about half of the congregation, thinking they had never heard such blasphemy, folded their robes around them, "and silently stole away."

Respectfully yours, Polk Cline.

Florence, Iowa, Sept. 17, 1878.

Bro. Bennett: Attach my name to the Declaration of Rights. Let that Declaration go forth as the calm, deliberate utterance of the free men and women of America; as the sharp challenge of defiance to the massed legions of superstition and tyranny, and let it bear its message of freedom and justice to every city and hamlet, to every one who toils in factory or mine, in shop or store, in the dust and heat of the crowded city, or amid the beauteous flowers of the smiling country-side. There is no obscenity in "Cupid's Yokes," but if there were even more than there is in the Syriac Scriptures, my word would be still the same. Who is to judge in this matter? and what shall be our standard? Shall we be guided by the lights of a false and pernicious supernatural morality, or shall we trust ourselves to the directing hand of nature, whose clear-voiced heralds proclaim the grand truth that in all the rock-bound volumes of her great book, there is nowhere to be found that magic watchword of the tyrant and prude—Indecent. I shall consider it the proudest moment of my life when my name shall appear on that noble roll of honor.

Yours for justice, E. C. Walker.

Dear Mr. Bennett: In justice to myself, my reputation for accuracy being at stake, I ought to correct an error into which E. H. Heywood has fallen by trusting entirely to his memory. Theodore Tilton did not express himself regarding "Cupid's Yokes" as Ezra H. Heywood quoted in his letter to The Truth Seeker of Sept. 14th.

Yours truly, J. Flora Tilton.

P. S.—Will you print the above in your paper next week, if it is too late for this? J. F. T.

468 Tremont Street,
Boston, Sept. 20, 1878.

Mr. Editor: Make haste and put my name to that Declaration of Rights originally written and signed by Hon. Elizur Wright. When not in the Liberal lecture field, I am out of my element, so I am nearly crazy to get back where I belong, and shall as soon as General Butler becomes Governor of Massachusetts; until that little event is accomplished everything that passes through my brain gets mixed with "Hard times," "Financial crisis," "Government lands," "Contraction of the currency," "Specie resumption," and "Fiat money."

And so you are determined to sell "Cupid's Yokes?" Good! Here is my ☞. When you are shut up, pass your books over to me, and I'll peddle them in the streets or auction them in the market places. If matters go on as they seem to be going, there will soon be no place for an honest man but in prison.

You know I am a Spiritualist all over, and have been for fifteen years. Spiritualists, I presume, have been ashamed of me many times in the last half-score of years, but now the thing turns. When I see Spiritualists hastening to bolster up every fraud practiced in its holy name, when I see it losing sight of reforms and reformers, when I see it driving persons from its platforms for no other reason than because they have thoughts and will utter them, I acknowl- that I feel a little chagrined at being classed with them. If I must give up one or the other, let me stand alone in my own strength and reach down to help my fellow-beings up to a higher plane, rather than lose sight of persons who need my help, in my effort to get in communication with the world beyond. I hope to be ever found humbly receiving light from all who are above and beyond me in either world, and imparting it to all in need, wherever found.

You know Laura Kendrick, one of the noblest women ever in grand New England. For nearly a year she has been preaching in Boston. Investigator Hall is well filled every Sunday night to listen to her administrations. Her trumpet never gives an "uncertain sound," She always speaks right out in a way that cannot be misunderstood. Boston has been trying to starve her to death, but it has not succeeded. Something has put it into somebody's head to furnish the neatest little tenement you ever saw and tell her to move in, and she has obeyed. You ought to see her at home!

We have another grand worker here, Maggie Folsom; she is a Spiritualist too. Well, something put it into her head to get up a reception for Laura in Investigator Hall. The affair came off last Wednesday night. It was an "oasis in the desert." The people came in with baskets, boxes, and bundles; and besides that, a purse of money was made up, enough to keep Mrs. Kendrick and her family as long as Elijah could live on the food the angels gave him.

With best wishes for The Truth Seeker, and all connected with it, I am, As ever, Moses Hull.

West Gloucester, Mass., Sept. 1878.

D. M. Bennett, Dear Brother: I am stopping for a time in this quiet and pleasant home, to recuperate from a recent severe attack of congestion of the brain, apoplectic in its nature, and having been close to the change called "Death," I feel that I have had ample opportunity to test my spiritual faith, and I can truly say it has not failed me; on the contrary, it is stronger than before, confirming the truth of the words you have published from my hand, that

> There is no death! this clod of mortal clay,
> May lose its form through Nature's sure decay;
> But the freed spirit, in realms supernal,
> Solves life's mystory—the life eternal.

Dear brother, what a grand figure-head you make for ignorance, bigotry, superstition, and malevolence to fire at, all of these elements being concencrated in that miserable tool of the Y. M. C. A., Anthony Comstock, the sneak par excellence! This title should be burned into his forehead with a branding-iron, so that when he and his co-working tools sneak into a brothel to feast their lecherous eyes upon the charms of naked women, and then win immortal infamy by their arrest and imprisonment, he may be kicked out in advance, and before he has had a chance to gloat over their nude persons.

What action must the people take to right this great wrong, and to secure protection against the visits of this sneak? Petitioning seems to avail nothing so far. The law under which so many men and women have been persecuted, while pursuing an honorable calling in selling books calculated to do humanity service by giving the people needed information in regard to themselves—this law still remains in force, and any man or woman who sells a book, however valuable, that does not suit his bigoted and narrow views, is liable to arrest and imprisonment upon his complaint or at his instigation. Under these circumstances and without legal redress, how would a coat of tar and feathers and a free ride suit Anthony's case? I pause for reply.

Bro. Bennett, I cannot congratulate you upon your former victory. Had your "foeman" been "worthy of your steel," I should feel very different, and could look back upon your triumph with pleasure, but when it comes to fighting a skunk, "Distance lends enchantment."

Seriously, my brother, as a soldier fighting for freedom, and as a man who dares think for himself and his race, I bid you God-speed in the fight. I close with an ode. It is worthy of the subject.

THE SNEAK.

> O, Anthony Comstock, miserable sneak,
> How cussedly mean you must feel,
> When through some crack, keyhole, or crevice you peek,
> To spy what sights a room may reveal.
> Yet Anthony Comstock, I must take it all back,
> You could not feel mean if you tried,
> No matter how much you peep through keyhole or crack,
> For meanness in you is wool-dyed.

The "machine" refuses to grind more of so mean a grist, and I quit. Fraternally yours,

Horace M. Richards.

Lunenburg, Mass., Sept. 8, 1878.

My Dear Bennett: I want to say a word on the signs of the times. It is war to the knife, and knife to the hilt. There is no truce, no middle ground, and I am glad to see so many of our strong men taking ground against compromising things. I hate a coward. I pity a half-witted stupid coward, but your two-sided janus-faced cowards I loathe with my whole soul, mind, might, and strength. Had we a dozen such men as Richard M. Johnson who stemmed the whole evangelical current on the Sunday mail, the Comstock obscenity mail question would soon wither like a burnt boat. But while the men who create popular sentiment for half the world halt to tell the Church and the State they hate nastiness and illustrated French snuff-boxes, and very lewd pin-cushions, why, we shall have men and women in prison. But, my dear sir, the landmarks of the ages are too distinct to misjudge the future.

> "Saints and heroes, throned in bliss,
> See all ages blessed in this.
> What are judge or priestly lies,
> In a conflict with the wise."
> Let them sentence as they will,
> They in turn shall taste the pill.

The amount of suffering these self-righteous guardians of public and private morals are crowding into peaceful and well-intended families is truly appalling. The last onslaught at Watkins is really enormous, and what are we to expect in the issues that must grow out of these conflicts? Does the Evangelical Church and the Republican party believe they hold over as a fixed fact in fate? Let them bide the time. Orthodoxy is an impersonal vagary. Let it slide. Republicanism may too soon for its good feel the might that slumbers in a peasant's vote. A. H. Wood.

The Old Made New.

Mr. Editor: In a tract written by the editor of The Index, entitled "The Impeachment of Christianity," in the closing paragraph is the following remarkable language: "I impeach Christianity in the name of Humanitarian Religion because it proclaims ideas of God which would drive every reflective mind acquainted with modern knowledge into absolute Atheism, were it not that modern knowledge itself furnishes the elements of a far higher idea of God in universal nature. It thus appears as the most insidious enemy of the religious sentiment—the destroyer of that pure and ennobling worship which recognizes the Divine throughout all Time and Space, and creates in the soul of man a consciousness of profound spiritual oneness with the vast Whole of which he is a part."

The author of the foregoing manifestly entertains "ideas of God," and "recognizes the Divine," and believes in the "religious sentiment," and that "worship creates in the soul of man" a something which he calls "a consciousness of profound spiritual oneness." Now, it is respectfully submitted that these are the essential ideas of Christianity and Judaism, and by far more indistinctly expressed than in those systems. The paragraph is conceived to contain several gross inaccuracies. To say that the "ideas of God" in the Christian religion would drive reflective and scientific minds into Atheism were it not that "modern knowledge" provides a far higher conception of God, is the most radical nonsense. It is equivalent to saying that it would if it could, but it can't; therefore it does not. "If modern knowledge" teaches that there is a "God" in universal nature, that is what it teaches, and it is nonsensical to argue that it would teach that there is no God if it were not for the very significant fact that it teaches that there is one. Of course, if "modern knowledge" teaches Theism, it does not teach Atheism. But what is this "far higher idea of God"? Christianity's God if the Carpenter of the universe, without any attempt to disguise the fact. It affirms that there is a God. Mr. Abbot, however, does not affirm that there is a God, but affirms that "modern knowledge" furnishes the elements of the "idea of God." Does Mr. Abbot entertain the "idea of God"? For the present it will be assumed that he believes in God in universal nature." Now, Mr. Abbot, is your "God" the author of "nature"? or is nature simply a habitation he has chosen to occupy? Do you cognize him through his "works" or through the senses as a direct object of thought? For what does the term "God" stand? It is used, and must be interpreted. It stands for an idea. Does it represent a distinct object of thought? Does "God" differ in any degree from "Nature"? In reading the above-quoted paragraph, the mind is governed by the law that we can think only in terms of matter. This is a fundamental law of thought. To think "Nature," then, is to conform to the law; but to think "God" is also to conform to the law—the thought "God" is in terms of matter. It is also a law that our thought is limited to certain forms of matter. To think "Nature" is to confine thought to certain forms of matter. To think "God" is to limit thought to a form of matter. Therefore "God" and "Nature" are but forms of matter; and no religionist, "free" or otherwise, can escape the conclusion. Thus the "idea of God" in free religion adds nothing to Pantheism. Is Mr. Abbot a Materialist? If so, let him say so in so many words, and if not, let him define himself. Who or what is God? In this scientific age slip-shod assertions will not be accepted as culture or logic.

And what is meant by "pure and ennobling worship"? Does it mean anything different from the "pure and ennobling" worship of Christianity? But it seems, at least, that in this new kind of worship the "Divine" is recognized "throughout all space." But the worship prescribed by Christianity is the recognition of the Divine throughout all space. And so if Christians recognize their Divine in all space, how much better is this new "religious sentiment," which can do no more? Christianity also provides a form of worship called "pure and ennobling;" and certainly the assumption of Christians is just as good as Mr. Abbot's. Their worship is also claimed by them to "create in the soul of man a consciousness of profound spiritual oneness." I submit this language to experts, as a fair specimen of old-fashioned Methodist twaddle. Consciousness of spiritual oneness rises above the confines of the realm of faith, and "we see face to face." The holy spiritual oneness brings the Methodist face to face with his Savior. What is the difference between profound spiritual oneness and holy spiritual oneness? "The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirits that we are the children of God."

Mr. Abbot, it is true, leaves the matter somewhat in doubt, by the vagueness of his language, as to what the second term of the "oneness" is, but it will be assumed that it is "he." Now, what brings about this union? Manifestly, a "pure and ennobling worship." Words are signs of ideas. Here are words signifying an act. Now, does Mr. Abbot's act of worship differ in anything save his assumption of its loftier tone from orthodox worship? But, as a matter which exact science has a right to examine, what is this "spiritual oneness"? How do "he" and "the vast Whole" unite? How is it manifested to us? What idea does the word "God" convey? Is it an intelligence or not? If an intelligence, then it must be urged that no conception of "God" as an intelligence can rise superior to the mind conceiving. The conception of God in the mind of the savage is ganged by the capacity of the mind, and hence the degraded conception; and if the idea of God in the mind of the erudite editor of The Index be that of an intelligence, it is only as much higher than that of the savage as his mind is superior to that of the savage.

I would now respectfully submit that the time has come when cultured minds no longer need a God of any kind, or a religion of any type. The race has suffered enough from gods and religions. Give us rest! The cultivated intellect has arisen above the necessity for gods and religions and priests. Exact thought has led us to see that man is but a form of matter, and that mind is a property thereof. Let cultivated men take a stand upon truth. Call things by their right names. "God" is a myth; religion is its outgrowth. Man is the highest. It is silly to worship himself—degrading to worship aught else. Matter, and matter alone, is. Man and a blade of grass have the same origin and the same destiny. O. A. Phelps.

A Japanese Love-Song.

Yes, 'tis Autumn, dearest, see
Cold, rough signs on every side;
Listen to the fluttering leaf,
Borne before the tempest tide.
Listen to the mournful song,
Wafted from the pine trees tall;
Listen to the torrent's voice,
Loud resounding over all.

It was in the gladsome Spring,
When we met and told our love;
Nature sang in ecstacy,
The skies were bright and blue above.
Then we hoped, and had no thought
That darksome days could ever be;
The golden hours flitted by
In mirth and loving revelry.

Then Summer came—we lovers still
Trifled the long sweet hours away;
In scented woods, and deep, dark shades
With jest and smile, and old world lay,
Or, on the cool, broad river's wave,
Floating along, we wove our dream,
Nor thought of those who toiled for gain
In the great city's busy stream.

'Tis Autumn now, and Winter soon
Will change the fair world's smiling face;
A year, alas! will then have flown,
To us a fleeting moment's space.
Oh, ere the Spring comes back again,
In all her radiancy divine,
May fortune smile upon our love,
And let me call thee, dearest, mine!

I Want to be an Infidel.

BY DR. J. L. YORK.

I want to be an Infidel,
And with Infidels to stand;
No crown upon my forehead,
Nor harp within my hand.

I'd rather be an Infidel
To every book and creed
That binds the soul in galling chains,
And fails to meet its needs.

I want to be an Infidel
From superstition free;
My God and heaven within my soul,
My church and priest to be.

I'd rather be an Infidel,
And champion human rights,
Than wear the garb of priest or king,
With all their lordly might.

I'd rather be an Infidel,
My church within my mind,
Than lend a hand to sect or clan,
My brother man to bind.

I love the name of Infidel,
'Tis sweet music to my ear;
A synonym of liberty—
A charm for childish fear.

I want to be an Infidel,
Like Ingersoll the brave,
And help to lift the masses up,
Though it lead to martyr's grave.

I would that all were Infidels;
It is superstition's tomb;
It brings the day of science near;
'Tis manhood's richest bloom.

Oh, who would not be an Infidel,
And the ranks of freemen swell,
To fight the wrongs of Church and State,
And quench the fires of hell?

I'm proud to be an Infidel,
Though of gold it brings small gain;
'Tis wealth enough, the power of thought—
The "Common Sense" of Paine.

Miracles, Mules, and Methodists.

We are glad to be able to announce that the Methodist Church of San Francisco has a miracle worker. The Rev. Dr. S. G. Simonds, now in the Custom House, and doubtless a good Republican, works miracles through the efficacy of prayer. Once, on a journey over the Sierra, his mule fell over a precipice. "Lord, help!" he cried, and seizing the mule by the tail, he swung him back to the trail as easily as he would a cat. Once he was falling down stairs. "Lord, help!" he cried, and angel hands bore him up. He had a cancer in the face, and on one occasion, when it gave him a vicious twinge, "Lord, help!" he prayed, and that was the last twinge. "Prayer," says the Rev. Simonds, now in the Custom House, "never fails me." Now, we are glad to announce this fact right in our midst. This beats Catholic miracles all hollow. The last one of the rival establishment was the Baroness Scuppa, in Calabria, whose sore thumb was cured by the hair of Pius IX.; but our Protestant fellow-citizens of the Methodist faith do not go abroad for their miracles. We have no thaumaturgical faith; we are just a bit skeptical in this matter; but as we are always willing to be convinced, we suggest to the Rev. Dr. S. G. Simonds, of the Custom House, to establish a miracle guage, and give an exhibition of the faith that is in him. We will find a mule, and put him on the dead level of equality with our Methodist fellow-citizen. The doctor shall seize the mule's tail, and proceed to swing him as he would a cat, and if the mule does not kick out all the brains that we think our Methodist brother possesses, we will score one point for the doctor. The second test shall be this: the President shall appoint us Collector of the Port; we will at once proceed to send the Rev. Simonds a yellow-covered envelope containing the information that he is dismissed from the Custom House; he shall cry "Help!" and if the devil, or any other politician, can hold him up by his party tail, and keep him in office, we score again for the doctor. If holding up mules and politicians by their tails is not regarded as a fair test, we will propose to nail the Doctor's ears to a whipping-post—or any other person who may have faith in miracles—and if the combined prayers of all the superstitious asses who affect to believe in this kind of humbuggery get him loose before he starves to death, we will toss up the sponge, consider the game lost, and give in our adherence to that wing of superstition and ignorance that now insults the intelligence and wounds the Christian faith of the age in which we live.—S. F. Argonaut.

Meant to, But Did Not.

Suppose the Society for the Suppression of Vice suspects a certain "doctor" of dealing in unlawful remedies; and the agent of the society visits him and narrates a fictitious case calling for such remedies, or writes a letter in a woman's hand and name, asking for advice and prescriptions. The "doctor" falls into the trap and sells the drugs or implements solicited, or answers the letter. This shows the moral guilt; it attains an exposure; the community can be warned of the character of the practitioner and his corrupt purposes. But the wicked purpose is not enough to insure a punishment. An actual violation of the law must have taken place. If it is not a violation of law to furnish agents of the State with samples of prohibited articles for their use in enforcing the laws, or to give information to the police where unlawful articles can be procured, and if this is all that the accused has actually done, he cannot be convicted, although he meant to sell to a victim, and supposed he did so.

This is the tenor of a recent decision of the United States Circuit Court in Missouri. The indictment was for sending a letter through the mail giving information that the writer would sell certain prohibited articles. But the letter, when produced on the trial, was unintelligible in itself. It was addressed to Miss Nettie G. Harlan, Butler, Ga., and only said "I have what you desire. Price, $10." The proof showed that there was no such person as Nettie G. Harlan. The defendant had been suspected of immoral sales, and a detective had written him a letter asking if he would supply certain articles, had signed it Nettie G. Harlan, and by aid of the postal authorities in St. Louis, had procured it to be delivered as if it had come from Georgia. When the answer was mailed, the postal authorities in St. Louis, instead of forwarding it to Georgia, gave it to the detective; and the prosecution followed. The court quashed the indictment. Both judges concurred that while the physician was morally guilty, he had not been guilty in act. The criminal purpose was evident; that is one element; but the act, which violates the law, was wanting. The letter could not give the prohibited information to any one but the detective who wrote it; and giving information to him, in aid of the police work, was not really an infringement of the law, though what the doctor supposed he was doing would have been.

We give cordial approval to the purposes of the Societies for the Suppression of Vice, and to the courage and earnestness which have been exhibited by their agents, in a very difficult and repellant field of duty. We desire that these societies should have the support, moral and pecuniary, of the community, in all judicious and effective efforts. In questioning their methods we do not in the least question their ends. But we wish their methods to be upright and efficient. For detectives to make practice of entrapping suspected persons into the real commission of crime, for the purpose of prosecuting them for what has been thus brought about, is demoralizing. It cannot be long and extensively pursued without ill effects that will exceed any immediate good results. And contrivances which do not go the length of enlisting the suspected in actual commission of a complete offense are not efficient. They are useless in the courts, as the Missouri case shows.—Tribune.

The Convention at Watkins.

The following are the comments made by the Graphic on publishing the Watkins Convention Resolutions:

We give as a matter of curious history the resolutions adopted by the Convention of Free Religionists, which recently met at Watkins Glen. The Free Religionists were not treated fairly by the press. A body in whose deliberations men like ex-Representative Julian and Mr. James Parton took an active part, and before whom they delivered lengthy addresses, can hardly be classed as a meeting of boobies and noddies. Still, men will have a religion; they will have some one to worship, some creed to believe in, and some form or ritual in which to embody their faith and render homage to God. Free religionists may have an admirable system, but it is not a religion. Every belief only exists to be criticised, and while some of them do not deny that there may be some person or thing in the universe worth worshiping, they, to the last man, deny that there ought to be any thing binding in belief or ritual. Every man ought to be free to believe or not to believe, to worship or not to worship, as he thinks best. "Squatter sovereignty" in religion, or every man his own pope, is the outcome of the free religious movement, only no squatter is to have any power to bind any other squatter. The Watkins Glen conventionists are representatives of the old negative, iconoclastic, individualistic movement. This movement is on the wane in the matters of industry and government. It would be strange, indeed, could it succeed in matters of religion.

SINFUL SAINTS AND SENSUAL SHEPHERDS. By D. M. Bennett. Truth Seeker Tracts, No. 124. 47pp. 12mo. N. Y. Bennett. Paper, 10 cents.

Infidelity and vice are by many Christian bigots considered synonymous terms. With them a Freethinker is necessarily a "bold bad man," in popular parlance. Christianity, on the other hand, is deemed but another word for virtue, purity, holiness; and Christians, perforce, are the "salt of the earth." To counteract this pernicious error—to prove that Christians and saints of all ages and climes are sinful, fallible men and women like the rest of frail humanity—brother Bennett has presented, in this tract, a record of the crimes, of every hue, perpetrated by a large number of prominent Christian lights, clergymen principally. The prevalent vice, however, of the clerical evil-doers seems to have been that of licentiousness, for an overwhelming majority of the sacred sinners were guilty of adultery and fornication. A resume of the misdeeds of the more prominent Bible worthies, from Noah to Peter and Paul, with a sketch of the criminal practices of many eminent Christians famous in history, forms a fitting introduction to the major portion of the tract, which is occupied with the unholy deeds of several hundred "men of God," mostly of the present generation

THE BIBLE GOD DISPROVED BY NATURE. By William Emmette Coleman. Truth Seeker Tracts, No. 55. 39pp., 24mo. 8 cents.

THE RELATIONSHIP OF JESUS, JEHOVAH, AND THE VIRGIN MARY. By W. E. Coleman. Truth Seeker Tracts, No. 79. 4pp. 16mo., 2 cents.

WHO WAS JESUS CHRIST? By W. E. Coleman. Truth Seeker Tracts, No. 129. 6pp. 12mo. 2 cents.

The first of these tracts is devoted to a comparison of the teachings of science and those of the Bible God. Some twenty-seven branches of science are brought forward, each of which is in direct contradiction to the Biblical record. The immoral acts and precepts of the so-called Jehovah are also pointed out, and a short sketch given of the bibliography of Freethought.

According to the second tract, if orthodoxy be true, Jesus is his own son and grandson, his own father and grandfather; Mary is the mother, daughter, and sister of Jesus; and Mary is also the wife, daughter, sister, and mother of God!

In the third tract we find thirty-three prominent occurrences in the life of Jesus—one for each year of his life—concerning which two, three, and four inconsistent and irreconcilable accounts are narrated in the New Testament, commencing with his genealogy and terminating with his ascension to heaven. This tract is specially commended to the prayerful consideration of deluded Bibliolators and Jesus-worshipers.

ABSTRACT OF THE LAST WILL AND TESTAMENT OF JEAN MESLIER, a Roman Catholic Priest, who, after a pastoral service of thirty years, wholly abjured the Christian dogmas. By Voltaire. Translated from the French by Miss Ellen Carroll. 68 pp. 12mo. New York: D. M. Bennett. Paper, 25 cents.

The author of this work, although in his lifetime he did not dare to avow his conclusions, yet at his death left a pronunciamento to his parishioners, embodying the results of his earnest and candid reflections and his honest convictions upon religious subjects. The absurdities and inconsistencies of the Bible, and the unreliability of its statements both in the Old and New Testaments, are ably expounded; and his exposition, perhaps, in some respects has never been excelled, either by Paine, Voltaire, or present-day Freethinkers. Cure Meslier's devotion to the cause of the people, to the cause of truth and right in both Church and State, is plainly evidenced in the concluding sentence of this his last will and testament: "The end of my earthly course is drawing very near, and, to resume all the experiences of my life and career in a few words, I would that the last of the kings were strangled with the intestines of the last of the priests!"—W. E. Coleman, Spiritual Offering.

A NARRATIVE OF THE LEADING PHENOMENA OCCURRING IN THE CASE OF MARY LURANCY VENNUM,

By E. W. STEVENS,

With comments by Joseph Rhodes Buchanan, M.D., Professor of Physiology, Anthropology, and Physiological Institutes of Medicine in the Eclectic Medical College of New York: D. P. Kayner, M.D.; S. B. Brittan, M.D.; and Hudson Tuttle.

To members of the various learned professions we especially commend this narrative. We believe the history of the case as herein told to be strictly true. The account is given in a modest, unassuming way, with no attempt to exaggerate or enlarge; it could have been made far more thrilling and yet have remained within the bounds of truth. It will be observed there is no chance for the witnesses to have been honestly mistaken and to have thought they heard and saw that which in fact they did not. Either the account is in exact accordance with the facts or the author and witnesses have willfully prevaricated. The evidence which we publish herewith as to the credibility of the R—ff family could not be stronger, and the reputation of E. W. Stevens is equally good; the publisher has known him for years, and has implicit confidence in his veracity.

The case of Lurancy Vennum is not by any means an isolated one, and there are others which in some respects are even more remarkable. Yet, on account of its recent occurrence and the facilities for investigation, we believe this case deserves and demands the careful, candid, unbiased consideration not only of professional men, but of all who are interested either as advocates of a future existence or as disbelievers therein.

This narrative will prove a most excellent missionary missive. It will attract the attention of thousands who as yet have had no experimental knowledge of the truth of spirit phenomena, and from its well attested character will force conviction of its entire truthfulness, thereby bringing to many a desponding, doubting soul joy inexpressible.

The pamphlet is in octavo form, printed on good book paper, and illustrated with a portrait of Lurancy Vennum.

BY W. R. GREG,

Author of "Enigmas of Life," "Literary and Social Judgments," &c.

One vol. Crown, 8vo., with Complete Index. Cloth, $1.50.

"Some twelve years ago, in a London drawing-room, one of our most eminent men of science said: 'Why do not the bishops answer Mr. Greg's Creed of Christendom? They are bound to answer it—if they can.' In the lifetime of the present generation the earliest work at all similar was that of Mr. Charles Hennell, which, in various respects, had great merit; but Mr. Greg, coming later, had the advantage of access to many able German researches, and his work continues the most complete on all sides; to it one may most confidently appeal when assailed by eager Christians with the current commonplaces of their warfare. Since bishops, deans, learned canons, and academic divines do not reply formally to so thorough, clear, and learned a treatise, which has been so long before the public, we have the best of proof attainable that this historical argument—occupying precisely the ground which English academicians have chosen as their own—is unanswerable" (F. W. Newman, on "The New Christology," in Fortnightly Review).

WITH PREFACE AND NOTES BY SCHOLASTICUS.

First English Translation

Of the ancient Jewish story of Jesus, who was born at Bethlehem about 106 B. C., being the son of a betrothed maiden named Miriam (Mary) by Joseph Pandera. By the power of a charm stolen from the Holy of Holies he cured lepers, raised the dead, and wrought other miracles. Wherefore he was arrested by the elders of Jerusalem, scourged, crowned with thorns, and by order of the Sanhedrin stoned to death and hanged on the day before the Passover and the Sabbath, in the reign of Queen Alexandra, about the year 75 B. C.

A Roman Catholic priest, who, after a pastoral service of thirty years at Etrepigny and But, in Champagne, France, wholly abjured the Christian dogmas.

EDITED BY VOLTAIRE.

This little work contains very sound reasoning. Its utterances are among the most powerful and convincing. The clergyman gives most excellent reasons why the old dogmas of superstition and error should be discarded.

KIDDER'S SECRETS OF BEE KEEPING.

This book should be in the hands of every bee-keeper in our land, whether he has one swarm of bees or a hundred.

It is a guide to the bee-master, in every branch of the business.

No more losing bees in winter; nor in their flight to the forests in swarming time; nor in their being destroyed by moth millers, or by being robbed by other bees. No more stinging by bees when we go to the hive for honey or for any other purpose.

In fact the book shows how all losses and trouble with our bees can be successfully overcome and remedied.

And on the other hand it will instruct any one how they can keep bees with great profit, and with but a small investment.

This book contains more matter than any other book that sells for one dollar and fifty cents.

But in order to have a rapid sale and place the book within the reach of all, the publisher proposes to sell the book at the very low price of 75 cents bound, paper covers 50 cents.

DR. LYON'S Hygeian Home is at Springfield, Mo. See adv. in May Nos. TRUTH SEEKER. 13'25 Resp'y, J. S. LYON.

The distinguished physician for all PRIVATE CHRONIC and SEXUAL DISEASES, is without any exception the greatest living practitioner of the age. The thousands of cures he is performing annually substantiate this fact. He has patients in every State of the Union and in the British Provinces. Every reader of this who has any affection of the Head, Throat, Lungs, Heart, Stomach, Liver, Kidneys, Bladder Bowels, Womb, Genital Organs, Rheumatic or Neuralgic Difficulties, or Eruptions of the Skin, Blood Impurities, Tumors, Cancers, or any Nervous Affections or Diseases of the Eye or Ear, are invited to write to Dr. Fellows, whose charges are extremely low, so that those in most humble circumstances in life can avail themselves of his valuable services. The Doctor's crowning medical achievement has been in the discovery of an EXTERNAL or OUTSIDE APPLICATION for the permanent cure of SPERMATORRHŒA and IMPOTENCY, as the result of self-abuse in youth and sexual excesses in mature years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Powers, etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy. Dr. Fellows has prescribed his EXTERNAL REMEDY for 1,100 cases without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the Insane Asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others on the verge of Consumption, while others again had become Foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

Address, with stamp, Vineland, New Jersey, where Dr. R. P. Fellows is permanently located, and obtain his PRIVATE and other CIRCULARS, with cures SWORN TO, which is irrefutable testimony to the Doctor's unprecedented success in treating all the diseases here named. TERMS EXTREMELY LOW IN ALL CASES. WRITE YOUR ADDRESS PLAINLY.

(From the Rock Mountain Herald.)

"Dr. Fellows is a successful specialist for all the diseases which he claims to cure, such as chronic and sexual complaints. His wonderful skill and success are bringing him hundreds of cases weekly, by letter and otherwise, from all over the United States."

PERPLEX'D in faith, but poor in deeds,
At last he beat his music out;
There lives more faith in honest doubt.
Believe me, than in half the creeds.

He fought his doubts and gather'd strength;
He would not make his judgment blind:
He faced the specters of the mind,
And laid them: thus he came at length

To find a stronger faith his own;
And Power was with him in the night,
Which makes the darkness and the light,
And dwells not in the light alone,
But in the darkness and the cloud.
—Tennyson.

EVOLUTION is slow, continuous, and imperceptible. What intelligence has a child ere it is born, or immediately after birth? It has a capacity for intelligence, but the mind is perfectly blank; yet intelligence is evolved by its circumstances and surroundings. There is no apparent life or intelligence in a seed or an egg, yet a dead seed or a lifeless egg will not germinate. The egg has no intelligence, but the bird or fowl hatched from it has. Where does it come from it if it be not evolved from the matter composing and surrounding the living existence? We know nothing of the spontaneous generation either of life or intelligence; germs of both are found everywhere, in air, earth, and sea, but there is no sudden leap from matter to mind, or from matter to organized forms of life. If there was a time on earth when life was not and intelligence was not they must have been evolved from matter which already existed in the earth, or have been extraneously created by some power outside of matter.—Mrs. E. D. Slenker.

Odds and Ends.

A WASPS nest contains 15,000 cells, and you had better not go behind the returns and try and make a recount.

IT is useless for physicians to argue against short sleeved dresses. The Constitution of the United States says, "The right to bear arms shall not be interfered with."

IN a country church-yard we find the following epitaph: "Here lies the body of James Robinson, and Ruth his wife," and underneath, the text, "Their warfare is accomplished."

A BALL of pop-corn lies in the British Museum in London with a label on it reading as follows: "An article of food in America, greatly liked by the negroes in the Southern United States.',

AN Irishman was told by a teacher that his charges for tuition were two guineas the first month, and one guinea the second. "Then, be jabers," said Pat, "I'll begin the second month now."

"IF Colonel —— goes on drinking as he does now, he'll soon not have a coat to his back," said one friend to another. "Nor to his stomach, either," remarked a physician who was standing near.

AN old man who had been badly hurt in a railroad collision being advised to sue the company for damages, said: "Well, no, not for damages—I've had enough of them; but I'll just sue 'em for repairs."

IT is when a dry-goods clerk of sixty-seven pounds weight attempts to help from a farm-wagon a farmer's wife of two hundred and two pounds weight, that the reporter seats himself contentedly on the curbstone and waits for the catastrophe.

COLLEGE professor to junior who had been taking advantage of his absent-mindedness: "Young man, I find on looking over the records that this makes the fifth time in two years that you have been granted leave of absence to attend your grandmother's funeral."

MR. HEPWORTH DIXON once attended a masked ball without mask or domino. The lady of the house, a little piqued at this slight, approached him and said, "And pray, sir, what character do you assume?" "I appear as a gentleman," said Dixon. "Ah! a capital disguise!" and Hepworth withdrew for repairs.

MR. CHERRYBLES asked his wife the other morning, "What is the difference, dear, between bribing a man with a ten-dollar bill to keep his mouth shut and a mixture of Indian meal and water?" He almost took her breath away when he answered, "Why, you see, one is hush-money, and the other is mush, honey."

AFTER-DINNER orator: "It's in the wonderful insight inter 'uman nature that Dickens gets the pull over Thackeray; but, on t'other hand, it's in the brilliant shafts o' satire, t'gether with the keen sense o' humor, that Dickery gets the pull over Thackens. It's just this: Thickery is the humorist, and Dakins is the satirist. But, after all, it's 'bsurd to instoot any comparison between Dackery and Thikens."

HE was a bachelor, had traveled extensively, and could speak any language, dead or alive. Hieroglyphics were nothing to him. But when he returned home the other day and talked to his sister's baby, and when it cried and was pacified by its mother saying, "Did his naughty wauty uncle wuncle come homey womey any scarey warey my little putsey wutsey?" he just leaned over the back of the chair and wept.

A HARD CASE.—Enter young husband, who throws himself into a chair and exclaims, "What! toothache again, Maria? I do call that hard upon a feller! Why, you had toothache when I left this morning! And here have I been at the races all day, with the jolliest lot o' fellers ever got together in one drag, and won a pot o' money, and had no end of a jolly time, and I did think I should find something cheerful and jolly to greet a feller when I got home! And there you are! toothache again! I do call it hard on a feller—precious hard!"

HE WAS AFTER DICKENS.—"Do you want to hire a reporter?" inquired a red-nosed young man as he thrust his illuminated olfactory into this office yesterday.

He was informed that we had all the help we required at present.

"Sorry—very sorry," he said, bowing quite low. "Just noticed by squib in newspaper that the immortal Dickens began life as a reporter; first I had heard of it, and concluded at once to begin that way myself. Dickens made a great success of it, and what has been done once can be done again."

We acknowledged that Dickens had made quite a hit.

"A decided hit," put in the young man; "and all I want is to start under the same auspices. Sure you have no place for me?"

"No place at present."

"Mighty sorry," replied the applicant: "have just been reading 'David Centrefield,' and am quite charmed with the author's style."

"'David Copperfield,' not' Centrefield,'" we ventured to suggest.

"Perhaps you're right; yes, now I recollect; you are right; much obliged; been playing base ball lately, and have got names confused. Will be in town a few days, and hope you will not forget me if a vacancy should occur."

We promised to remember him, and the young man withdrew.

Protruding his beacon light once more, he said:

"Daniel Webster, Benjamin Franklin, and Napoleon Bonaparte also began life in newspaper offices; but I don't care for them: Dickens is the man I am after:" and he closed the door softly and went down stairs on his tiptoes.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

DEVOTED TO SCIENCE, MORALS, FREE THOUGHT AND HUMAN HAPPINESS

Vol. 5. No 40. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT.} New York, Saturday, October 5, 1878. {SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY.} $3 per Year

Notes and Clippings.

IN the opinion of the Boston Transcript, Noah kept his bees in ark-hives.

SANKEY sails for England on the 5th of October, taking his family with him. What will poor Moody do now?

THE News says Israel Putnam made out to struggle through life without a bloodstone sealring on his little finger.

THE British Consul at Pekin puts the deaths from famine in China at 7,000,000. The province of Shansi alone lost 5,000,000.

A MAN who can hum a hymn or keep his equanimity while putting up an old stove-pipe is ready to go and join the angels at once.

THE Rome Sentinel has discovered that immediately after every hard wind farmers come into town with choice lots of fresh hand-picked apples.

FRANK BUCKLAND, the naturalist, declares that babies swim naturally. A friend put one into warm water, and it took to it like a duck, swimming briskly.

THE Saturday Night says Webb Hayes' Fremont girl lives two miles out of town, and many a Sunday night has Webb-footed it out there to see the little duck.

THE Rev. George C. Crawford, a Brunswick, Me., pastor, has committed suicide. Can it be it was because he was in such a hurry to fly into the arms of Jesus?

MARY HOLLIS, colored, while shouting in the Methodist church in Buena Vista, Ga., was taken violently ill and died in a short time. It may ultimately be found that getting religion in that violent manner is unsafe.

PROF. TYNDALL contradicts the statement of the London Times that he once suggested that the earth must have received the germs of life from some other planet. He says he never entertained such an opinion.

The Bible does not lie.—Ex. It doesn't, eh? Have you never seen a Bible lying upon the table? and the page devoted to a record of births—does that always tell the plain, unvarnished truth?—Norristown Herald.

ELDER STEVENSON, a Mormon missionary, incidentally proposed matrimony to a widow and her two daughters in Hickman county, Tenn. They said, Yes, and are on their way to Salt Lake City, where the marriage ceremony is to be performed.

PROBABLY at the last dreadful day, when Gabriel blows his trump, if he doesn't stop once or twice between the blasts and shout, "General! General! Colonel! I say!" not more than two-fifths of the men in the American cemeteries will get up.—Hawkeye.

A LEWISTON pauper, living at the city Almshouse, says an exchange, recently offered up the following prayer: "O Lord, bless the boss of this house, be with him daily, and with all his'n; but especially, O Lord, we ask thee to make different arrangements in that cook-room."

IN Leicestershire, England, the remains of a laborer's wife were taken to the churchyard for burial, when the Episcopal vicar refused admission on the ground that the woman died a Wesleyan. This gave rise to indignation in the parish, and a mob followed the clergyman, beating pans.

JUGGERNAUT is in a bad way since the English Government imprisoned for life for murder the hereditary protector of the god, a man of high rank, to whom the Hindoos pay divine honors. The late Car Festival was a failure, and it is in contemplation to hand over the god's affairs to the management of the Court of Wards. A receiver for a religion—an insolvent deity! What next?

"Gem'len," said Bro. Gardner, as reported by the Detroit Free Press, "death mus' come to all. We can't escape it. Some of us will be hung, some burned up in barns, some git shot by de police, but it will be death jus' de same. Let us hev our cabins in order, an' let us be 'spectin' a visit from dat white-faced angel who moves so softly dat men hear not, and who strikes so swiftly dat men hev no escape."

ADVOCATES of total abstinence from intoxicating liquors may be pleased to learn that Lomer Griffin, who died in Lodi, Ohio, last week, at the extraordinary age of 106 years, was a total abstainer. He did not, however, form the resolution to do so until he was already 102 years old. During his long life, up to the above-mentioned period, Mr. Griffin indulged in stimulants. That at such an advanced age he was able to form and carry out faithfully a resolution of total abstinence is remarkable evidence of the power of a determined will to conquer habit. Mr. Griffin did not use tobacco. That his age was as great as claimed is shown by the family records and other uncontroverted proof.

WHILE there is a general anxiety in California to get rid of the Chinese, there is an equally strong anxiety on the part of the Peruvians to introduce free Chinese labor into their republic. In this scheme the Peruvians meet with opposition from the British authorities in Hong Kong, notwithstanding the existence of a treaty between Peru and China expressly stipulating that free emigration from the latter country to the former is to be permitted. The Peruvians claim that all traces of cruelty to Chinamen have disappeared in Peru, but this is not confirmed by the testimony of reliable persons who have recently traveled in that country. In preventing the deportation of Chinese, the British officials at Hong Kong are probably actuated by motives of humanity.

THE Herald and Presbyter says: "There are gambling-houses, and grog-shops, and theaters that are proposing to divide their gains with the yellow fever sufferers. Let us have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, but rather reprove them. If men whose avocation among us is to pollute public morals and destroy men's lives desire to aid the suffering by a partnership in their profits, let us not be entrapped by any complicity with them and their craft." According to this, it is better to let the yellow fever patients die in their misery than to relieve them with money which has been in the pockets of irreligious people. It is probable, however, that the sufferers in the South care but little whether the money that is sent for their relief comes from saints or sinners.

IN England there is an old law which provides for surveys to be made to parsonages which need repair. The "Ecclesiastical Dilapidations Fees" which are levied on poor clergymen under this law are a combination of the odious and the ridiculous. One suffering rector complains that his parsonage was recently ecclesiastically "surveyed," as it needed repairs to the extent of about £4. The surveyor spent half an hour at the parsonage, the result of which was this little bill:

For survey	3	3	0
Report of Bishop	1	1	0
Copy to self	0	2	6
Final inspection	1	11	6
Total	£5	18	0

The rector justly characterizes this as a bit of a swindle.

THERE seems to be something wrong with the Pope. The Whitehall Review is responsible for the following statement: "The Pope is an object of universal pity at Rome. They say that all the spirit he showed at first has disappeared. He weeps frequently, and has attacks of deep depression and cries, 'Is it necessary that an old man like me should end his life thus?' He feels like one who is standing in an open place to be shot. As a Cardinal, he used to hunt at Carpineto, and was fresh and active as a young man. Now he has aged overmuch, and is very thin; three times a day he will pack his box to go to Perugia, but he dares not carry out his desire. Since Franchi died, his fear of being poisoned has increased, and his brother is even more anxious than Leo himself. He never touches anything at table. His brother goes daily to the town and brings him back pies and turkeys cooked in jelly, which he carefully conceals under his cloak. This is the only food he ever partakes of. Leo makes his own coffee. He has his wine straight from Carpineto, from his own vineyard, and keeps it in his secretaire. Two attempts have already been made to poison him. Once it was a glass of wormwood, after drinking which he felt suddenly unwell. His brother fetched a physician whom he could confide in, and not the doctor of the Vatican. He gave him a counter-poison, which proved efficacious. Several cardinals, who were present, sought to prevent his brother from fetching aid. Many cardinals are opposed to Leo; they would rather that Bilio were pope. He is a true priest, according to their idea. Leo's greatest enemy is a foreign cardinal who lives at the Vatican, but whose name the Romans dare not breathe.

THE following story is represented to us as true, and we believe it has never appeared in print:

In the olden times, when all the convicts were kept in the Georgia Penitentiary at Milledgeville, Rev. Mr. Brantly, a Methodist minister, was appointed chaplain to the penitentiary. Soon after his appointment he was walking about the penitentiary, mingling with his new parishioners. One of them was inclined to be quite talkative, and in the conversation this dialogue occurred:

"You are Mr. Brantly, I believe, our new chaplain?"

"Yes, sir," said Mr. B.

"And they tell me you are a Methodist, Mr Brantly."

"Yes, I am a Methodist."

"Well, I am so glad to hear it. I am a Methodist myself, and there are a good many Methodists in here. In fact, most of us are Methodists."

Mr. Brantly walked off, wrapped in meditation.—Spartansburgh (S. C.) Review.

"AFRICA," says Bishop Simpson, "has no science; India and China have no science. How comes it that this science exists only where Christianity is?" It is a coincidence, your reverence; what really produces, fosters, encourages, and conserves science is the silk stovepipe hat. The silk hat is not worn in Africa; India and China have it not. Wherever the silk hat is planted on the human head, there science has taken root; no silk hats, no science—ignorance, error superstition, moral and intellectual night. It is the silk hat that has given us the graces, the refinements, the splendors of modern civilization—copious largess of wisdom and abundant benefaction of light. It is the beacon, the Pharos, of humanity, in the broad benignity of whose blaze our laden argosies elude the rocks and shoals of social disaster. Your reverence's theory (grotesque as it is) has this value: It marks the hitherto unobserved coincidence that the silk-hatted, and therefore scientific, nations happen to profess Christianity. It has not yet been observed that they practice it.—S. F. Argonaut.

THE trade in ready-made sermons for lay ministers is on the increase in England. There are many clergymen who find it cheaper and better to buy the ready-made article than to manufacture for themselves. The Church Times advertises this sort of merchandise freely, thus:

"Collections of manuscript sermons purchased and sold for cash; must be original, modern, legible, and of thoroughly good church tone. Apply, with specimens, to Messrs. W. Skeffington & Son, 163 Piccadilly, W."

The brethren who buy this variety of sermons expect to impose on the most critical observers of the document which they place before them on the pulpit cushion, as well as to be ready to respond in case any interested lady should desire to borrow the discourse. Here is another sort of sermon for those who want to exhibit the "manuscript," but are in no fear of being asked to lend it:

"Sermons (lithographed) upon the Sunday Gospels, Epistles, and Old Testament Lessons. (New Lectionary.) By a Beneficed Parish Priest. Sound, original, practical. Specimen, with particulars, on application.

"N. B.—More than 300 of the clergy have given voluntary testimony to the great superiority of this publication over others of the kind, and the great boon it is to them in their large, overcrowded parishes. Address the Rev. M. A. (Cantab), 7 High street, Haverfordwest."

And here is something out of the well-traveled rut, for ministers who have an ambition to get off special and timely discourses:

"New Harvest Sermon, alluding to past and present events, now ready, 1s. 6d.; single sermon for any Sunday, 12 stamps. Address the Rev. M. A., 12 St. John street, Bristol."

But what a bother it would be if two neighboring clergymen should each buy a copy of the "New Harvest Sermon" and deliver it simultaneously. Two gossiping congregations would speedily carry to each other the news of the remarkable similarity.

Events of the Week.

MRS. GENERAL SHERMAN is dangerously ill.

HARD-MONEY platforms have been adopted by the Republicans and Democrats in this State.

COL. INGERSOLL will lecture in this city on next Monday evening; subject, Robert Burns.

GILMORE'S band has returned to this country after a very successful musical tour through Europe.

THE yellow fever at the South is not only still desolating the cities, but is now ravaging the plantations.

A WEST VIRGINIA postmaster, the son of a Baptist clergyman, has been arrested for tampering with the mails.

THE new British steamship Yoxford, from this port for Havre, foundered at sea in a gale; the crew were rescued.

A STAGE coach, carrying the U. S. mail, was robbed by twelve masked men, on the 26th ult., near Fort Fetterman, Wyoming Territory.

THE Cheyennes are on the war path. In a recent engagement the troops were outnumbered and routed, with a loss of one killed and several wounded.

N. C. Martin, a worthy Christian, has been arrested at Youngstown, Ohio, for alleged forgeries to the amount of $64,000 on the Union Trust Co., of this city.

THE New York Elevated Railroad has commenced to run Sunday trains, to the great disgust of the preachers, who are looking for a divine judgment upon them.

THE Ohio Methodist Episcopal Conference has dismissed the Rev. F. A. Spencer from the ministry for immorality, and the Rev. J. K. Davis for unministerial conduct.

HUGHES and O'Leary, the pedestrians, are engaged in a six-days' walking-match in Gilmore's Garden, this city, for a wager of $1,000 and the championship of the world.

THE United States steamer Enterprise, which has been engaged in the exploration of the Amazon for the last five months, has returned to this port after a highly successful trip.

DAVID GOOD, of Brookville, Ohio, a pious Christian and regular attendant at church, is in jail for having seduced his own daughter, a beautiful young lady of eighteen. He narrowly escaped lynching.

THE Rev. Mr. Hayden, who was on trial for the murder of Mary Stannard, has been acquitted, but many of his neighbors are far from convinced of his innocence. There is some talk of re-arresting him.

WILLIAM O'NEIL, a newsboy of this city, saved three persons from drowning a few days ago. He has saved fourteen lives in all within a few years, and will probably receive a gold medal from Congress for his bravery.

A FUNERAL procession was run into by a locomotive in Brooklyn on Saturday last. Two persons were instantly killed, two others were badly injured, one of whom has since died, and several others were less seriously injured.

THE boiler of the steamer Adelphi exploded when she was leaving South Norwalk, Conn., for this city on the morning of the 28th ult. Eleven persons were killed, and many others were severely scalded by the escaping steam.

THE Catholics and anti-Catholics came near having a religious riot at a gospel tent in this city on Sunday last. It required the best efforts of a large force of police to keep the pious Christian from murdering each other. Revolvers were drawn and flourished, but no blood was spilled. The trouble originated through some denunciations of the Pope by a backsliding Catholic priest.

MORE storms in the West. At Decatur, Ill., the roof was torn from a schoolhouse, and large trees succumbed to the fury of the storm. At Fort Wayne an Episcopal church was struck by lightning and damaged to the amount of $8,000. At Lebanon, Ind., a large number of buildings were unroofed; the Presbyterian church, the finest building in town, is now a shapeless mass of brick and mortar, and the streets are filled with rubbish.

"The Asiatic churches had already perished. The Christian faith, planted in the dissolute cities of Asia Minor, had produced many fanatical ascetics and a few illustrious theologians, but it had no renovating effect upon the people at large. . . The frenzy of pleasure continued unabated, and in a great part of the Empire it seemed, indeed, only to have attained its climax after the triumph of Christianity.

"The condition of the Western Empire was somewhat different. . . She [the Church] exercised for many centuries an almost absolute empire over the thoughts and actions of mankind, and created a civilization which was permeated in every part with ecclesiastical influence. And the Dark Ages, as the period of Catholic ascendancy is justly called, do undoubtedly display many features of great and genuine excellence. In active benevolence, in the spirit of reverence, in loyalty, in co-operative habits, they far transcend the noblest ages of pagan antiquity, while in that humanity which shrinks from the infliction of suffering, they were superior to Roman, and in their respect for chastity, to Greek civilization. On the other hand, they rank immeasurably below the best pagan civilizations in civic and patriotic virtues, in the love of liberty, in the number and splendor of the great characters they produced, in the dignity and beauty of the type of character they formed. They had their full share of tumult, anarchy, injustice, and war; and they should probably be placed, in all intellectual virtues, lower than any other period in the history of mankind. A boundless intolerance of all divergence of opinion was united with an equally boundless toleration of all falsehood and deliberate fraud that could favor received opinions. Credulity being taught as a virtue, and all conclusions dictated by authority, a deadly torpor sank upon the human mind, which for many centuries almost suspended its action, and was only effectually broken by the scrutinizing, innovating, and free-thinking habits that accompanied the rise of the industrial republics in Italy. Few men who are not either priests or monks would not have preferred to live in the best days of the Athenian or of the Roman republics, in the age of Augustus or in the age of the Antonines, rather than in any period that elapsed between the triumph of Christianity and the fourteenth century" (Lecky's Hist. Morals, vol. ii, pp. 13–15).

"When we remember that in the Byzantine Empire the renovating power of theology was tried in a new capital free from pagan traditions, and for more than one thousand years unsubdued by barbarians, and that in the West the Church, for at least seven hundred years after the shocks of the invasion had subsided, exercised a control more absolute than any other moral or intellectual agency has ever attained, it will appear, I think, that the experiment was very sufficiently tried. It is easy to make a catalogue of the glaring vices of antiquity, and to contrast them with the pure morality of Christian writings; but if we desire to form a just estimate of the realized improvement, we must compare the classical and ecclesiastical civilizations as wholes, and must observe in each case not only the vices that were repressed, but also the degree and variety of positive excellence attained" (Ibid, p. 16).

It is evident, I think, from the facts and reasonings presented, that during the centuries that Christianity existed unmodified by skepticism and unimproved by science, art, and literature, it failed, on the whole, to improve the condition of mankind. I think we may go farther and say that it very materially retarded the civilization of the world.

While Christendom was enveloped in darkness, the flickering lamp of learning emitting scarcely a ray of light in all its domain, the Mohammedan Arabs were cultivating science and philosophy with ardor and success. When the capitals of Christian Europe were inhabited by barbarous hordes, the Court of Bagdad evinced remarkable lustre and liberality, and opened asylums to the learned of every land. Literary relics found in the conquered countries were brought to the foot of the throne. Latin, Greek, and Persian literature was translated into the Arabic. The Court itself was made up of teachers, translators, commentators, and philosophers. Schools were founded and libraries established in every considerable town. There was one college at Bagdad that had six thousand pupils and professors. Institutions of learning were liberally endowed. The revenue of kingdoms was expended in public buildings and fine arts. The Arabs excelled in mathematics and astronomy, architecture and agriculture, while they cultivated with success a long list of the arts and sciences among the most valued at the present day. Speaking of the earlier sovereigns of Bagdad, Hallam says:

"Their splendid palaces, their numerous guards, their treasures of gold and silver, the populousness and wealth of their cities, formed a striking contrast to the rudeness and poverty of the Western nations. In their Court, learning, which the first Moslems had despised as unwarlike, or rejected as profane, was held in honor. The Khalif Almamun was distinguished for his patronage of letters; the philosophical writings of Greece were eagerly sought and translated; the stars were numbered; the course of the planets was measured; the Arabians improved upon the science they borrowed, and returned it with abundant interest to Europe in the communication of numeral figures and the intellectual language of algebra" (Middle Ages, p, 552).

The Moors, a people of Arabian origin, that inhabited the countries now called Morocco and Fez —once known as Mauritania—formed the channel through which the learning and civilization of the Arabs, the seeds of which came from Alexandria and the East, traveled into Europe. The Moors took possession of Spain, and held it nearly seven centuries. They established a magnificent empire, and for centuries were the most enlightened people on the face of the globe. While the greater portion of the Western world was plunged in the darkest ignorance, the Moors of Spain were cultivating those arts and sciences which expand the mind, refine the taste, and give polish to society. "When Europe was hardly more enlightened than Caffraria is now, the Saracens were cultivating and even creating science. Their triumphs in philosophy, mathematics, astronomy, chemistry, medicine, proved to be more durable, and therefore more important than their military actions had been" (Draper's Intellect. Devel., p. 306). Some idea of the magnificence of the Saracenic Empire may be formed from the statement of a Moorish author regarding the city of Cordova, the capital of Andalusia. It contained, he informs us, 200,000 houses, six hundred mosques, and 900 public baths. Another writer says it had eighty public schools, fifty hospitals, and eighty thousand shops. A space twenty-four miles in length by six in breadth, along the Guadalquiver, was occupied with streets, gardens, private dwellings, and public edifices. "After sunset," says Draper, "a man might walk through it in a straight line for ten miles by the light of the public lamps." It had a public library of 28,000 volumes. The city of Granada was not less celebrated for its wealth, luxury, and learning. There were, it is said, 12,000 towns and villages on the banks of the Guadalquiver.

This people was the connecting link between ancient and modern civilization. The Arabs were the depositories of science during the Dark Ages, and "the restorers of learning to Europe." It is not true, as some Christian writers would have us believe, that the darkness of the Middle Ages was dispelled by the light of Christianity. The revival of learning was due chiefly to the study of pagan literature, and the Mohammedan schools of learning. Christianity exerted all its power to keep the world in ignorance, and, as we have seen, it was among the Mohammedan Arabs, whose religion did not at that time make war on knowledge, that appeared the first gleams of light which shot athwart the horizon of Christian Europe. I shall allow a Christian historian to state the facts in his own language:

"It was under the reign of this celebrated Khalif [Almamun, A. D. 833] that the Arabians began to take pleasure in the Grecian learning, and to propagate it, by degrees, not only in Syria and Africa, but also in Spain and Italy; and from this period they gave us a long catalogue of celebrated philosophers, physicians, astronomers, and mathematicians, who were ornaments to their nation through the several succeeding ages, and in this certainly they do not boast without reason."

"After this period the European Christians profited much by the Arabian learning, and were highly indebted to the Saracens for improvement in the various sciences; for the mathematics, astronomy, physics, and philosophy that were taught in Europe from the tenth century were, for the most part, drawn from the Arabian schools that were established in Spain and Italy, or from the writings of the Arabian sages. Hence the Saracens may in one respect be justly considered the restorers of learning in Europe" (Mosheim's Eccl. Hist., vol. i, p. 211).

"The Arabians during this whole century [the tenth] preserved that noble passion for the arts and sciences which had been kindled among them in the preceding age; and hence their country abounded with physicians, mathematicians, and philosophers, whose names and characters, together with an account of their respective abilities, are given by Leo Africanus and other literary historians" (Ibid, p. 241).

MEN glory in raising great and magnificent structures, and find a secret pleasure to see "sets" of their own planting grow up and flourish; but surely it is a greater and more glorious work to build up a man—to see a youth of our own planting, from the small beginnings and advantages we have given him, to grow out into a considerable fortune, and to take root in the world, and to shoot up into such a height, and spread his branches so wide, that we, who first planted him, may ourselves find comfort and shelter under his shadow.—Tillotson.

Science and the Arts.

The Doctrine of Filiation, or Descent-Theory.

BY PROF. ERNST HAECKEL.

The whole population of the tertiary epoch approaches much nearer, on the whole as well as in detail, to that of the present time than is the case in the preceding epochs. From this time the class of Mammals greatly predominates over all other vertebrate animals. In like manner, in the vegetable kingdom, the group—so rich in forms—of the Angiosperms, or plants with covered seeds, predominates, and its leafy forests constitute the characteristic feature of the tertiary epoch. The group of the Angiosperms consists of the two classes of single-seed-lobed plants, or Monocotyledons, and the double-seed-lobed plants, or Dicotyledons. The Angiosperms of both classes had, it is true, made their appearance in the Cretaceous period, and mammals had already occurred in the Jurassic period, and even in the Triassic period; but both groups, the mammals and the plants with enclosed seeds, did not attain their peculiar development and supremacy until the tertiary epoch, so that it may justly be called after them.

The fifth and last main division of the organic history of the earth is the quaternary epoch, or era of Civilization, which in comparison with the length of the four other epochs almost vanishes into nothing, though with a comical conceit we usually call its record the "history of the world." As the period is characterized by the development of Man and his Culture, which has influenced the organic world more powerfully and with greater transforming effect than have all previous conditions, it may also be called the era of Man, the anthropolithic or anthropozoic period. It might also be called the era of Cultivated Forests, or Gardens, because even at the lowest stage of human civilization man's influence is already perceptible in the utilization of forests and their products, and therefore also in the physiognomy of the landscape. The commencement of this era, which extends down to the present time, is geologically bounded by the end of the pliocene stratification.

The neptunic strata which have been deposited during the comparatively short quaternary epoch are very different in different parts of the earth, but they are mostly of very slight thickness. They are reduced to two "systems," the older of which is designated the diluvial, or pleistocene, and the later the alluvial or recent. The diluvial system is again divided into two "formations," the older glacial and the more recent post glacial formations. For during the older diluvial period there occurred that extremely remarkable decrease of the temperature of the earth which led to an extensive glaciation of the temperate zones. The great importance which this "ice" or "glacial period" has exercised on the geographical and topographical distribution of organisms has already been explained in the preceding chapter. But the post glacial period, or the more recent diluvial period, during which the temperature again increased, and the ice retreated towards the poles, was also highly important in regard to the present state of chorological relations.

The biological characteristic of the quaternary epoch lies essentially in the development and dispersion of the human organism and its culture. Man has acted with a greater transforming, destructive, and modifying influence upon the animal and vegetable population of the earth than any other organism. For this reason, and not because we assign to man a privileged exceptional position in nature in other matters, we may with full justice designate the development of man and his civilization as the beginning of a special and last main division of the organic history of the earth. It is probable indeed that the corporeal development of primeval man out of man-like apes took place as far back as the earlier pliocene period, perhaps even in the miocene tertiary period. But the actual development of human speech, which we look upon as the most powerful agency in the development of the peculiar characteristics of man and his dominion over other organisms, probably belongs to that period which on geological grounds is distinguished from the preceding pliocene period as the pleistocene or diluvial. In fact the time which has elapsed from the development of human speech down to the present day, though it may comprise many thousands and perhaps hundreds of thousands of years, almost vanishes into nothing as compared with the immeasurable length of the periods which have passed from the beginning of organic life on the earth down to the origin of the human race.

The table on page 610 presents the historical division of the eras of the larger and smaller palæontological periods, from the most ancient Laurentian up to the most recent Quaternary period.

Many attempts have been made to make an approximate calculation of the number of thousands of years constituting these periods. The thickness of the strata has been compared, which, according to experience, is deposited during a century, and which amounts only to some few lines or inches, with the whole thickness of the stratified masses of rock, the succession of which we have just surveyed. This thickness, on the whole, may on an average amount to about 130,000 feet; of these 70,000 belong to the primordial, or archilithic; 42,000 to the primary, or palæolithic; 15,000 to the secondary, or mesolithic; and finally only 3,000 to the tertiary, or cænolithic group. The very small and scarcely appreciable thickness of the quaternary, or anthropolithic deposit cannot here come into consideration at all. On an average, it may at most be computed as from 500 to 700 feet. But it is self evident that all these measurements have only an average and approximate value, and are meant to give only a rough survey of the relative proportion of the systems of strata and of the spaces of time corresponding with them.

Now, if we divide the whole period of the organic history of the earth—that is, from the beginning of life on the earth down to the present day—into a hundred equal parts, and if then, corresponding to the thickness of the systems of strata, we calculate the relative duration of the time of the five main divisions or periods according to percentages, we obtain the following result:

I.	Archilithic, or primordial period . . .	53.6
III.	Palæolithic, or primary period . . .	32.1
II.	Mesolithic, or secondary period . . .	11.5
IV.	Cænolithic, or tertiary period	2.3
V.	Anthropolithic, or quaternary period . .	0.5
	Total . .	100.0

According to this, the length of the archilithic period, during which no land-living animals or plants as yet existed, amounts to more than one half, more than 53 per cent; on the other hand the length of the anthropolithic era, during which man has existed, amounts to scarcely one-half per cent of the whole length of the organic history of the earth. It is, however, quite impossible to calculate the length of these periods, even approximately, by years.

The thickness of the strata of mud at present deposited during a century, and which has been used as a basis for this calculation, is of course quite different in different parts of the earth under the different conditions in which these deposits take place. It is very slight at the bottom of the deep sea, in the beds of broad rivers with a short course, and in inland seas which receive very scanty supplies of water. It is comparatively great on the sea-shores exposed to strong breakers, at the estuaries of large rivers with long courses, and in inland seas with copious supplies of water. At the mouth of the Mississippi, which carries with it a considerable amount of mud, in the course of 100,000 years about 600 feet would be deposited. At the bottom of the open sea, far away from the coasts, during this long period only some few feet of mud would be deposited. Even on the sea-shores where a comparatively large quantity of mud is deposited the thickness of the strata formed during the course of a century may after all amount to no more than a few inches or lines when condensed into solid stone. In any case, however, all calculations based upon these comparisons are very unsafe, and we cannot even approximately conceive the enormous length of the periods which were requisite for the formation of the systems of neptunic strata. Here we can apply only relative, not absolute, measurements of time.

Moreover, we should entirely err were we to consider the size of these systems of strata alone as the measure of the actual space of time which has elapsed during the earth's history. For the elevations and depressions of the earth's crust have perpetually alternated with one another, and the mineralogical and palæontological difference—which is perceived between each two succeeding systems of strata, and between each two of their formations at any particular spot—corresponds in all probability with a considerable intermediate space of many thousands of years, during which that particular part of the earth's crust was raised above the water. It was only after the lapse of this intermediate period, when a new depression again laid the part in question under water, that there occurred a new deposit of earth. As, in the mean time, the inorganic and organic conditions on this part had undergone a considerable transformation, the newly-formed layer of mud was necessarily composed of different earthy constituents and inclosed different petrifactions.

The striking differences which so frequently occur between the petrifactions of two strata, lying one above another, are to be explained in a simple and easy manner by the supposition that the same part of the earth's surface has been exposed to repeated depressions and elevations. Such alternating elevations and depressions take place even now extensively, and are ascribed to the heaving of the fiery fluid nucleus against the rigid crust. Thus, for example, the coast of Sweden and a portion of the west coast of South America are constantly though slowly rising, while the coast of Holland and a portion of the east coast of South America are gradually sinking. The rising as well as the sinking takes place very slowly, and in the course of a century sometimes only amounts to some few lines, sometimes to a few inches, or at most a few feet. But if this action continues uninterruptedly throughout hundreds of thousands of years, it is capable of forming the highest mountains.

War brings out the devil in man, wakes up the hellish legion within his fallen nature, and binds his better faculties hand and foot. Its natural tendency is to hurl nations back into barbarism and retard the growth of everything good. When undertaken from a dire necessity, as the last resource of an oppressed people, it may become heroic, and its after results may compensate for its immediate evils; but war wantonly undertaken, for self-interest, ambition, or wounded pride, is evil, only evil, and that continually.—Spurgeon.

Radical Romance.

The Darwins.

BY ELMINA D. SLENKER.

"It seems that he had been boarding for a few weeks, while carrying on a revival meeting, at a widow's. The widow had but two children—a son of nineteen and a daughter of twenty-four. The daughter was an imbecile, almost an idiot, as regards mental development. But she was a plump, rosy-cheeked girl—rather pretty, so far as regular features went—and was unusually warm-hearted and affectionate in disposition. She was, like many of this class of unfortunates, unduly fond of the opposite sex, but had always been carefully watched and guarded by her mother and brother from all contact with strangers who might, mayhap, do her harm. The neighbors all treated her with respect, and any one of them who would have wronged her, in word or deed, would have fared ill at the hands of his townsmen.

"Mr. Conway had not been boarding there many days before it was observed that Margaret, this imbecile daughter, was trying to ingratiate herself into his affections. She would run and wait on him, hang around his chair, comb his hair, and in many childish, artless ways court his attention. A little bouquet of fresh flowers was always ready for his button-hole or lying by his plate. But the deacon was so dignified, reticent, and reserved, so pious, holy, and sanctimonious, so full of apt Scripture quotations, and altogether so proper a person, and, besides, old enough to be her father, that no one feared any evil results from her attentions to him, though her mother several times apologized for her and hoped she was not intrusive. 'Oh, no, madam; not at all. Jesus, you know, said, "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not;" and this girl is but a child in mind, and I like to have her about me,' said the deacon, in solemn tones. So she was left to do as she would, the deacon apparently taking no notice of her more than he would of a small child or a frolicsome kitten; but when the two happened for a moment to be alone, he would beckon her to him, take her on his lap, and hug, kiss, and fondle her, till all the little soul or mind she had was glowing with passionate ardor for him. And some sort of instinct taught her to conceal all this in the presence of others, and be to him only as a simple child.

"He used often to go to the spring where we found him, for the medicinal water, as it was called, and Margaret would plead to go along. At last the deacon said, one day, 'Let her go, madam, if she wants to. I'll see that she comes to no harm. She will be as safe with me as if she was my own child.' So she was suffered to go; and after that they went almost daily, but never staid long, and all was supposed to be right; and, indeed, how could they dream of wrong in so good a man! Was not the whole country ringing with the fame of his sermons (those same ones that he preached at your place, as he had many of them by heart), and did not God's own glory rest on his brow? But the brother of the girl several times caught the deacon's eye resting on his sister in a way he did not like, and a sudden movement when he would enter the room where they were alone together would rouse a thought that something was between them; and at last he resolved to watch them one afternoon as they went to the spring, and so followed them at a safe distance, and saw them enter the little dell where we found him dying. The brother quietly drew within hearing distance, and soon saw and heard enough to realize that his poor demented sister was indeed the victim of a lecherous old scoundrel. His young blood was all on fire, and, drawing his pocket-knife, with its long, keen blade he stabbed him in the side, exclaiming, 'Die, thou hoary-headed old sinner! and may all the fiends in hell torment you for this dastardly betrayal of confidence, this foul wrong to one who already suffers under the wrath of a great and just God'—for it seems that when the girl was a mere child she had one day set her little foot on the family Bible and said it was no holier than an almanac, and hardly had the words been uttered when a big snake crawled up from between the hearthstones, and, winding around that blasphemous foot, reared its head till it looked her in the eye; whereat she screamed, fainted, and fell as one dead; and when she recovered, her reason seemed, as it were, dulled and blunted forever.

"As the brother finished his exclamation, he snatched his sister from the bleeding and apparently dying man, and hurried her home. He said nothing to his mother of what had happened, and when asked why Mr. Conway did not return with them, said he preferred staying a while, and it might be that he would not be back for some days, as he spoke of going to a distant town; meanwhile he had charged Margaret to say nothing of what had happened, or he would kill her. And so it was that the man was left alone all those four long days, to suffer, and think, and regret what might have been.

"Margaret's brother came to see me after the funeral, and between us we agreed that silence would be our proper course; so you will use discretion in mentioning what I have written to you. I have given no names or places that would criminate him; still, were it known that I could tell who the murderer was, I might be compelled to do so. It was a hasty act, and only in a case of life or death is any one justified in taking the law in his own hands. Conway was the father of my child, but his after-conduct killed every spark of love for him out of my heart; and if I do not sorrow that he is gone, I can say I pity his long, sorrowful vigil and awful death of horror, fear, and remorse."

As Sue finished reading this chapter of sorrows, she shed a few natural tears of grief; not so much for the father that was gone as at the thought of the bad, wicked, evil life he had lived. As Edith came in, she handed her the letter, saying, "Thank you, dear; I am grieved and sorry that all this should be, but it is past recall, and cannot now be helped; so I will try to forget all, save the fact that henceforth anxiety concerning him is at rest. I have Charlie, and you, and a whole host of good, true friends, and I am daily learning more and more of the world's capabilities for giving us joy, bliss, hope, love, and all other good things. I shall simply send my brothers the paper containing the account of my father's death, supposably at the hands of a tramp, write to them what is proper to the occasion, and then let oblivion's pall cover the whole dark scene from memory, as much as may be."

CHAPTER XV.

August, with its fields of ripening corn, has come, and already many of the leaves upon the trees are showing autumnal tints and dropping silently from the parent limb, to wither, die, and pass away forever. How brief and fleeting is all individual existence! yet how dear and precious life is to us all—how full of bright hopes, sweet anticipations, and glorious aspirations! 'Tis a great thing to have lived and known how much there is to live for; to feel that though for us life's sunny dream will soon be o'er, the world will still be filled with countless millions who will feel as we feel and rejoice as we rejoice; that as the race grows older it will grow wiser and happier, and, though pain and sorrow must come to all, they will grow less and less as the years roll on and man learns how to live rightly and happily.

Not one leaf had yet faded on the grand old tree that stood in the grassy yard at Rose Hill Mansion. Its broad, sheltering arms seemed stretched out as in a sweet benediction over the little group of girls who were once more gathered beneath its shade—Rose, Edith, Jennie, Myra, and Sue. The sunshine gleamed through the interlacing branches and fell upon the bright dresses and still brighter faces of the pleasant family circle—for they all declared themselves of one family, since all had become of one belief and one mind upon the important topics of the day, even the politics and the social question itself. Each member of the little group was busily employed in some feminine needle-work, and the tongues were as busy as the fingers; but finally all seemed talked out, and there was a lull of utter quiet, which was at last broken by Myra, who said, in her usual blunt, outspoken way, "Well, girls, we have had Quaker-meeting long enough, and now I vote we each do something towards filling up the fleeting hours interestingly."

"All right," said Edith; "now suppose you start the ball a-rolling."

"No," said Myra; "I claim the right to be last, since it is my motion."

"I'll begin myself," said Rose, rolling up her sewing and taking from her pocket a letter. "I brought this along on purpose to read to you. It is from my Tennessee friend, who was so unfortunate as to become the victim of a scoundrel's heartlessness. Dear little Minnie! How earnestly she did sympathize with her, and how she longed to go and comfort her! I wish she was here now to rejoice in Emma's joy. Oh, Minnie! Minnie! The thought of my darling is so strong in my mind as I sit here, where we have all met together so often! Excuse me for this involuntary heart-cry, dear friends, for I could not help it. I knew well that lamentation is of no avail, and that we should never nurse our grief; and I do not; but I sometimes feel such an intense longing for my only sister, my sweet, gentle Minnie, that I can't keep back the great rush of tears, sobs, and grievings. And now I've got you all weeping, and our joy is turned to woe. Dear Minnie, we miss thee, but we grieve not as those grieve who have bitter thoughts mingling with their sorrow. All our thoughts of thee are sweet and lovely, as thou thyself wert. I do not remember one act of her young life that I would wish blotted out. Raised in an atmosphere of pure love—ah, yes, girls, she was almost perfect. She seemed to develop into a being of exquisite harmony and beauty. Oh, what a glorious woman she would have made! But she is gone, and only a sweet memory is ours.

The "Dirt" of the Bible.

The Vineland (N. J.) Independent forcibly exposes the attacks on Freethought which have been covertly made under the dangerous Comstock laws, and will continue to be made until those laws are radically reformed: "The Freethinkers' Convention, which closed at Watkins, N. Y., on Tuesday, broke up in the arrest of D. M. Bennett, of the New York TRUTH SEEKER, and several other persons, for selling a book which it is claimed was obscene. The Freethinkers, on the other hand, say it is mainly composed of extracts from the Bible. We have but little sympathy for that Radicalism which will spend days and weeks hunting for some paragraph in the Hebrew scriptures which will be offensive to delicate and refined ears, while they pass by the better things in the Bible. A thousand years of this negative kind of teaching will never convert the world to a tolerant Liberalism; and those who are converted by this method will, in all probability, be tenfold more the child of hellish bigotry after their conversion than they were before. A man who can find nothing better to do than to hunt for crude and obscene passages in the Bible has a good deal of dirt about his own moral constitution which will require but little searching to find out. But, despite all this, the orthodox people of Watkins showed themselves possessed of a considerable amount of the old inquisition spirit, when, in order to vent their spite against the Freethinkers for the radical utterances made in their meetings, they aimed this blow at freedom of speech. The Church people ought to know by this time that the 'blood of the martyrs is the seed of the Church,' and they only help augment the forces which they seek to destroy by this exhibition of intolerance. The Freethinkers have a right to hold meetings and express their radical sentiments, and to attempt to infringe upon that right is a blow at our free institutions which every citizen who is truly an American must loudly condemn. Crawling behind ever so many claims about 'obscene literature' will not hide the fact that the real end aimed at is the liberty of opinion vouchsafed by the Constitution. When the orthodox power seeks the arrest of the numerous parties who are circulating the most vile and obscene literature and pictures, for the express purpose of demoralizing the youth of the land, then we may believe that it is real obscenity they wish to 'destroy,' instead of liberty of conscience. But as long as they confine their arrests to some indiscreet radical who foolishly thinks he is serving his cause by publishing 'picked' paragraphs from the Bible, or some radical scientist who publishes a book that had better be guardedly handled, then the public has the right to presume that it is the opponents of orthodox theology which these intolerant enthusiasts are trying to exterminate, and not obscene literature."—Index.

MR. EDITOR: The above writer displays a great deal more penetration by hindsight than by foresight. He condemns the person who exposes the errors, follies, and obscenities of the Bible as one who "has a good deal of dirt about his own moral constitution." But despite all this, the writer goes on, "The orthodox people of Watkins showed themselves possessed of a considerable amount of the old inquisition spirit, when in order to vent their spite against the Freethinkers for the radical utterances made in their meetings they aimed a blow at freedom of speech." Here is the anomaly of a writer who is on the fence, on both sides of the fence, and nowhere, all at one and the same time. At first he seems to be somewhat orthodox in his spirit and literary taste in referring to the Liberal converts as being "tenfold more the child of hellish bigotry after their conversion than they were before." This Modoc temper, together with his terms "converted" and "conversion," leads us to believe that the writer still enjoys the literature of the Bible.

But, nevertheless, it was not the proper thing for the orthodox of Watkins to arrest the Freethinkers. "The Freethinkers have a right to hold meetings [!] and express their radical sentiments"!!! Here is magnanimity for you. We may "hold meetings" and we may "express radical sentiments." In condemning us as having "a good deal of dirt" about us, he seems to be quite unfriendly; but, on the other hand, in kindly vindicating our right to hold meetings and express radical sentiments, one might mistake him for a friend; but when he charges the Comstockians as aiming a blow at "our free institutions," he seems to be on the fence; and when he prates about the Watkins arrests as caused by the sale of a book "composed of extracts from the Bible," he is nowhere. The writer had no correct information on the affair, and yet he unconsciously sits down to write a homily on it. This might be pardonable did his ignorance and arrogance stop there; but he must condemn the cause of Freethought by misrepresenting it.

"A man who can find nothing better to do than to hunt for crude and obscene passages in the Bible has a good deal of dirt about his own moral constitution." My dear sir, you are mistaken in your man. You are dreaming. The Freethinker brings forward the obscene passages of the Bible not to approve of them, but to disapprove of them. On the other hand, you and your fellow-Christians approve of Bible obscenity by claiming it to be the "Word of God"—that is, a revelation from heaven; that all Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness"! How do the obscene stories of the Hebrews instruct us in righteousness? Was Comstock instructed by this sort of "righteousness" when he visited, not long ago, a house of ill repute in New York and had the females undress before him for a given amount of money? Talk about dirt!—where is there more dirt than in this book called the "Holy Bible"? Its filth would pollute but few if it were not for the essence of cruelty and oppression which it claims to exercise over man. We must accept these obscene stories as a revelation of the will of God, and there is no alternative; we must "believe or be damned." "If any man preach any other gospel unto you than that ye have received, let him be accursed." For centuries the Bible has been the instrument of the greatest credulities, crimes, and cruelties that ever tortured human hearts or drenched the world in blood. And you, sir, call these obscenities the Word of God? If you do not, others do, and you must reject them as we do; but in that case you might have a "good deal of dirt" about your "moral constitution." But, whether you accept or reject the obscene stories of the Bible as the Word of God, there is, nevertheless, a "good deal of dirt about your moral constitution" when you can so freely fling it at us—a sort, too, not of modern character, but the original dirt which your Bible contains, and which you have received from it, and which it commands you to scatter to the ends of the earth. Your fault-finding about it, and your language, "hellish bigotry" (on our part), looks as if you were trying to say to us, "Take our Bible dirt or be damned." Nay, verily, we will be damned if we do.

"When the orthodox power seeks the arrest of the numerous parties who are circulating the most vile and obscene literature and pictures, for the express purpose of demoralizing the youth of the land, then we may believe that it is real obscenity they wish to destroy, instead of liberty of conscience." This sentence is the writer's afterthought, which is greatly superior in wisdom to his forethought. It is his "hindsight" which discovers more penetration than his "foresight." W. S. BELL.

Some Notes on the Volunteer Candidate.

BY T. C. L.

The editor of The Index is a declining man. On December 20th of last year he said: "We deeply regret the issuing of the above petition, should decline to sign it, and must dissuade others from signing it." Well thereupon 70,000 Liberals enrolled their names upon that petition, making the largest that has been sent to Congress in many years. In his late "Card" the candidate editor says he "declines to be a candidate for re-election" if his "platform shall fail to be approved by the National Liberal League at this Congress." What new victory awaits the Liberals of this country, in view of this second "decline?"

If there is any difference of view or tone between Mr. Green's card and pages 614-15 in the last TRUTH SEEKER and his private letter on page 612, all readers will notice the difference of dates. One was written on Sept. 16th, before the appearance of that week's Index. The other was written on Sept. 20th after reading that "conglomerate of Call, Card, Platform, and editorial fulmination in The Index. That altered the whole situation, and no wonder the zealous and efficient worker for the League was "mad." We hear of several other Leaguers, who had not the motive and the cue for passion that Mr. Green has, who were mad too.

We have a dim, faded kind of recollection that the candidate editor, some eight or nine months ago, say about Dec. 20th, warned Liberals, that if they signed a certain petition they "would fall into one of the most cunningly laid traps ever set." Again on May 2d he plumed himself upon his sagacity in having given "timely warning of the trap into which the petitioners have been decoyed." One would suppose such an expert on traps would be trap-wise and trap-proof. But look you now, how so unattractive, unalluring, unwholesome a piece of old cheese as a manifestly absurd "private letter" baits him, and tolls him on right into a trap, just where at least seventy thousand Liberals want him. They don't have to vote against him now. They don't have to ask his friends whose feelings it might hurt to vote against him. They have only to vote for "repeal," then the volunteer candidate declines, and the business is done.

Some maker of proverbs says, "Suspicion is a heavy armor, which impedes more than it protects him who wears it." If Mr. Abbot had been less suspicious, he would have trusted the Liberals of this country more, and himself less, and thus have saved himself from himself, his own worst enemy. He knew himself to be capable of intrigue, plot, conspiracy, or assassination, and so, on the most baseless of rumors, without the slightest effort to prove their accuracy, he falls easily into faith in his private letter-writers, gives credit to his "independent sources," and "makes an ass of himself" before all Liberals, as Green so promptly declined to do. That would have been a good place for Mr. Abbot's "decline" to come in, but he preferred to place it where it would do the most good.

One would suppose that the McKesson & Robbins lesson would have been enough to teach Mr. Abbot that he would do well to be a little cautious about rumors from New York, even if he did get them from "independent sources." In both these cases one little postal card, costing only a cent, addressed to any gentleman on whom he could rely to give him a correct report would have returned him the reply that there was no secret plot to "seize the organization of the Convention," or secret movement of any kind, nor the first sign or symptom of one to "surprise and capture the Congress." Then he would have written a very different Call for that Congress and set forth very different principles, and in a very different spirit. Also he would not have made for himself that ugly and now unescapable cul-de-sac of "submit or resign," as a celebrated President across the water did last year. That President, with a Gambetta at his heels, chose to submit. With a persistent TRUTH SEEKER, a mad Green, an indignant League, and an angry 70,000 after him, what will this President do? The 27th of this month will tell.

There is a mystery about Annual Memberships in the Liberal League. Liberals are hereby advised to look sharp and not be taken in by them. The great trickster who wrote the Call for the coming Annual Congress says: "Delegates will receive Certificates of Membership by forwarding," etc., and "Charter, Life, and Annual Members, who intend to be present, will receive theirs by simply forwarding their names and present addresses." Now, this is put just as if Charter, Life, and Annual Memberships carried the same privileges, and were of equal value. There is a little tract of instructions about Memberships and how to form Leagues printed and circulated by the present able management of the League; but the reader will look in vain through that tract for any information about Annual Memberships. By a persistent search after knowledge under difficulties, however, the reader will find in the tail end of The Index an advertisement, which has stood there so long that it is equivalent to blank paper, stating that "Annual Members shall be entitled to seats but not to votes in the Annual Congress;" while Life and Charter Members are entitled to votes as well as seats. Why cannot this information be given in official documents which purport to tell what Leaguers want to know as well as in an obscure advertisement in an obscure paper? And what is the use of an Annual Membership anyhow? The only other conceivable use for it is to get a dollar contributed to the League under the implication that the holder receives some valuable privilege or consideration for his money—which he does n't.

I have the hollow privilege of holding one of these Certificates of Annual Membership. It reads as follows:

CERTIFICATE OF ANNUAL MEMBERSHIP OF THE
NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE

organized at the Centennial Congress of Liberals, held at Concert Hall, Philadelphia, Pa., from July second to July fourth, 1876.

BOSTON, MASS., Feb. 18, 1878.

Mr. Theron C. Leland, New York, having paid into the Treasury of the National Liberal League the sum of One Dollar, is hereby declared to be an of the same until the final adjournment of the Annual Congress next succeeding the date of this Certificate, with all the rights and privileges pertaining to such membership by the provisions of the Constitution.

Witness our Signatures and the Seal of the [L. S.] National Liberal League hereunto attached.

F. E. ABBOT, President.
WILLIAM H. HAMLEN, Secretary.

Now is n't that most alluringly put—"with all the rights and privileges pertaining to such membership by the provisions of the Constitution"? Then go to the Constitution as quoted in an obscure advertisement and you learn that an Annual Member has no rights and privileges in any Congress—not a right nor a privilege any more than the most indifferent auditor crowded away in a back seat of the gallery.

But to find out whether there might not be some obscure or unknown value in this Annual Membership, I sent for my credentials upon it, and I received a card of which the following is a copy:

EXCHANGE THIS FOR TICKET AT TICKET OFFICE.
NOT TRANSFERABLE.
NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

This certifies that Theron C. Leland, Annual Member N. L. L., is a Member of the Second Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, to be held at Syracuse, N. Y., October 26 and 27, 1878, and will be admitted to the reserved seats on exchanging this Certificate for a regular ticket of admission.

By order of the Directors.
FRANCIS E. ABBOT, President.
WILLIAM H. HAMLEN, Secretary.

Now compare this card with the advertisement at the tail end of The Index and it becomes a lie on the face of it, because an occupant of a seat, reserved or other, is not a member of any Congress unless he has all the rights and privileges of a member, including the right to vote. This card, then, is a fraud and a sell, "by order of the Directors" and "Francis E. Abbot, President."

There is a chance of depriving the Local Leagues of their full right to five Delegates according to another advertisement in the very tail end of The Index, which says:

"ARTICLE XVI.—Every local auxiliary Liberal League organized in accordance with the provisions of this Constitution shall be entitled to send its President and Secretary and three other members as delegates to the Annual Congress."

Now suppose its President and Secretary, or either of them, for any reason, cannot go? Is the Local League to be deprived of the privilege of sending a Delegate in his place?

Again, in this city Mr. Cortlandt Palmer is President of the Third Liberal League and also of the Society of Humanity, which affiliated itself by charter with the National Liberal League. Now is he to be allowed two votes in the Annual Congress by virtue of his Presidency of two Local Leagues? These may become questions of importance where Leagues send full Delegations without including the President and Secretary.

The Liberal League Movement.

A VIEW OF THE SITUATION.

FRIEND BENNETT: I was much surprised to-day to find my PRIVATE LETTER to Mr. Leland in THE TRUTH SEEKER. It was not quite the fair thing, but I will pardon him this time. It truly expressed my indignation at the time it was written, and I do not see much in it I cannot truthfully reiterate after a week's reflection. The injury I fear from its publication is that it may increase the ill-feeling now existing among Liberals—exactly the thing, of all others, I do not desire to do. But Mr. Leland "let the cat out of the bag," and I shall hold him responsible for the consequence. I am conscious he likes a fight better than I do, and may enjoy seeing me pushed into it.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

Until recently no person in America entertained a higher opinion of Francis E. Abbot than I did. But that opinion was shaken when he made the uncalled-for and unjust attack upon you at the time of your first arrest by Comstock. As the head and recognized leader of the National Liberal League, I expected him to be the first to go to your assistance, and when he turned upon you in The Index I was dumbfounded and pained beyond expression. But I was in hopes it was from ill temper caused by indigestion or something of the kind, and would soon pass over, and with an effort I held my peace; but to my regret it has continued to this time, and, I fear, has become chronic.

MR. BENNETT AND HIS FRIENDS.

I said to many of my intimate friends, "I hope Mr. Bennett will show that he is superior to Mr. Abbot by not allowing himself to be drawn into a quarrel;" but, I regret to say, you were not able to rise to that height of sublimity, and many of your "Letters from Friends" gave evidence that their authors were about on the same plane with Christians.

GOOD MAY RESULT.

There is an old saying that it is an "ill wind that blows nobody good," and I hope this "unpleasantness" that has so effectually, for the time being, blocked the wheels of the Liberal League movement will in some way result in good to the cause. And I am pleased to see that one man, who, a year ago, wrote me he did not favor the movement, has already, for the purpose of aiding Mr. Abbot, organized a Local League. This is encouraging, for just now we are thankful for small favors. And as all parties desire to carry their points at the coming Congress at Syracuse, and as it takes delegates to do that, I expect to see Local Liberal Leagues spring up in all quarters, and I desire to urge upon Liberal friends to organize them, not only for the fight at Syracuse, but for a long campaign against the common enemy.

STAND FIRM,

And, Liberal friends, resolve that whatever be the result at Syracuse, you will stand by the Liberal League movement. If it is wrong this year, we will try and make it right next year or the year after. Since the Directors presented themselves as candidates and provided a platform for the coming Congress, a leading Liberal of the West writes to me: "I shall not aid the movement any more in any way. You have seen, as I have, that each man seems to have some axe to grind or hobby to ride, and the whole scheme will fall to the ground of its own weight before it ever accomplishes anthing, unless it is run differently. Of what use is the Congress if the programme is all arranged now, as it seems to be?" I will admit that that good Western friend just now has good reasons for his discouraging remarks, but that is not the course to take to build up a great Liberal party.

THE COMING CONGRESS.

Mr. Abbot is entitled to much credit for organizing this grand party, and last year he gave us a splendid platform; but as he has proved incompetent to longer serve as leader, we have the right to choose another. You have named for President of the National Liberal League that brave reformer,

HON. ELIZUR WRIGHT.

Mr. Wright is a friend of The Index, and is one of its editorial contributors. I hope to see Mr. Abbot second your motion and make his election unanimous.

Then, as many appear to favor the passing of resolutions, and as are about as near correct as any a miscellaneous Liberal body can be expected to agree upon, why not adopt them, leaving out only those that were drafted especially for the occasion at Watkins. Probably by a friendly consultation we might improve them a little. I am sure I could make them suit one better than they now do, but my improvement might damage them for some others. So, as they are about right, it may be as well to adopt them as they are. I am willing to assent to most anything for harmony if you will leave me the grand platform Mr. Abbot gave us last year. But, friends, whatever resolutions may be adopted by the Congress, if they do not go back on the last year's platform, let us stand by the party, I repeat. We shall, I hope, get over this lamentable family contention at some future time, and then we will be glad we all remained together. And, although Mr. Leland has pushed me into the arena of the combat further than I intended to go, and I expect to receive some heavy blows, I here publicly announce that I have no ill-will towards any one that I will not trample under my feet in a moment, when others will do the same, and a little before, if we can all agree to bury the hatchet or, what is better, use it vigorously against superstition, as you, Mr. Bennett, are and have been doing for many years, and as Mr. Abbot did for a long time when he was the pride of the Liberals of America.

ORGANIZE LOCAL LEAGUES.

But, friends, everywhere organize Local Liberal Leagues. Only ten persons, male and female, are required to form a league. Call a meeting at your house, if no hall can be obtained. I shall be pleased to send forms of constitution to those who desire them. Can't we have a hundred new leagues formed before the Congress meets? It will cost something, but what better use can you make of your money and time? Now we are all slaves to the orthodoxy of this land, and it is a shame that we stop to quarrel until we gain our liberty. If Comstock's arrests or this quarrel can destroy the apathy of the mass of Liberals, then good may come from these evils.

Come, friends, wake up, organize, and go to the Syracuse Congress. If you are not a delegate, come in person. If we can't do anything else, I do not know but we had better fight. Anything but this most discouraging inactivity.

H. L. GREEN.

LIBERTY and not theology is the enthusiasm of the nineteenth century. The very men who would once have been conspicuous saints are now conspicuous revolutionists, for while their heroism and their disinterestedness are their own, the direction these qualities take is determined by the pressure of their age.—Lecky.

The Purity and Godliness of Sex.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: Dr. J. M. Peebles, in his "Hammonton Paragraphs," in the Banner of Light of the 27th of July, speaking of animal food and its daily use, says it is stimulating to "the baser passions of human nature," by which I suppose he means the sexual or procreative instinct, for this is the language generally used by old-fashioned moralists when they allude at all to the subject of sex.

Now, after a life of nearly three score years and ten, during which I have studied the intricate problem of human society, I have come to the conclusion that this way of dishonoring the most godlike attribute of human nature is the cause of much misery and degradation. All the passions, or instincts, of the human being are holy. The sinfulness consists in the immoderate indulgence of them. For instance, the property instinct, which leads us to create wealth by labor—what would you give for a man who was entirely destitute of it? He would soon join the loafers and tramps who swarm all over the Northern States like the locusts of Egypt, devouring the food which other men procure by their toil. But this valuable instinct when carried to excess makes a man a greedy curmudgeon or a thief. The passion of anger or indignation at wrong doing—what would you give for a man who could see another man in rage strike a woman on the breast, knock her down to the ground, and trample upon her person, without even evincing the least emotion? Yet anger, when indulged to excess, ceases to be holy indignation, and leads to murder. What is a more indispensable virtue in manhood than self-respect? But if carried to excess it degenerates into pride, self-conceit, and arrogance. What is more glorious in a man than religion—love to God and man? But when it degenerates by excess into bigotry and persecution, what is more loathsome? So, one of the most powerful passions implanted in our nature is love. I mean sexual love, for even platonic love cannot exist in the heart of a eunuch. A man in Ohio was lately sentenced on his own confession to seven years in the penitentiary for having deprived a boy of his virile powers, and placing him in the neuter gender. Wherein consisted the crime worthy of so severe a punishment? According to Mr. Peebles he had only taken away from this boy "the baser passions of his nature," and, of course, put him on a more elevated moral plane as a human being. So far as the good of society and the future is concerned, it would be a good thing if at least one-third of the men now living were consigned by the knife to the same category of incapables. But as to the men themselves, if you take away their sexual instinct you make them, with few exceptions, selfish, suspicious, treacherous, cunning, and menial. A eunuch is incapable of love or friendship. If he suffers the calamity in early life, like the Ohio lad alluded to, he finds his chief pleasure in eating, and sleeping, and singing tenor in some Methodist church choir. During the Middle Ages, when ignorance spread like the darkness of Egypt all over Europe, and when the Church was in her power and glory, thousands of boys were castrated in order to become singers in operas, and especially in the celebration of the mass and other church services. The chastity of the popes, bishops, and priests was so delicate and heavenly that it was shocked by the sensuousness of a woman's voice, and she was banished from the church choirs. For the same reason Cardinal Manning of London now forbids women to sing in the church services because his monkish brethren of the priesthood cannot stand the tones of a woman's voice. And yet these quasi eunuchs, if they were eunuchs indeed, like the Christian Father Origen, of the third century, would be excluded from the priesthood of the Catholic Church because they lacked the essential attribute of a true man. In ancient Rome the castrati were not allowed to testify in the courts of law because of their want of manhood, and their easy virtue in the matter of lying. It is for these reasons that the law considers it so great a personal injury to destroy one's virility that it consigns to the penitentiary the man who commits the offense.

Now, Mr. Editor, if we want to purify the streams which are deluging society with pollution and woe, we must begin at its fountain. In other words, we must quit saying that sexual love is "the baser passion" of our nature. We must undo the terrible work of the Church, which has put contempt and abhorrence upon sexuality, and taught the great lie that celibacy is a greater virtue than marriage, and we must elevate it to a level where it will be considered absolutely holy. If the whole subject of sex were explained to children at a proper age by parents and teachers, physiologically and scientifically; if the wonderful anatomical arrangements for the propagation of human beings were discoursed upon chastely, so that all young people understood not only their own but that of each other's sex, all obscene books and pictures would be regarded with loathing and abhorrence. Ignorance may be, as the Church claims it is, the mother of devotion, but it is also the mother of a family of vices whose name is legion, for they are many. But knowledge is the prolific parent of all the virtues which make human beings refined and happy. It is high time that knowledge should shed her light on this subject of sex, and that it should no longer be considered disgraceful or a calamity that men and women are endowed with the power and disposition to procreate their kind.

Was it "the baser passion of human nature" which produced a Homer or Shakspere among the poets, or a Washington among the patriots? Shall sons or daughters feel ashamed in thinking of the loving act of their parents which molded and stamped them as intelligent and immortal beings? Is it consistent to feel proud of the noble men and women who have adorned their generations in the past and present, and of our relationship with them, and at the same time to speak disrespectfully of the glorious act that called them into existence? The dishonor put upon sexuality and the sexual act, first by the false teachings of the Church, and then by society, in making it a vulgar and forbidden topic, in regard to which people have to steal what little knowledge they have, has been the fruitful source of whoredom in every age. Pagan nations are notoriously more virtuous than Christian, for the pagans seem to think that whatever is natural is right and lawful when the indulgence of it is under the guidance of reason and conscience; while Christian nations attempt to dam up the currents of nature by weak and artificial restraints, so that society has become a seething mass of vice and hypocrisy. Did not God create man in his own image, and did he not endow them, male and female, with the creative passion of sexual love? And shall this divine instinct be denounced as low and base, and to be indulged only as a terrible necessity lest people do worse? It must be the remains or dregs of his old church teachings which lead so good a man as Bro. Peebles to put dishonor upon the passion to which he and all the rest of us are indebted for life and what we are. The correct views which Radicals generally have on the sanctity of sex and woman is one reason why, as a class, and in comparison with the Church, they stand so high on the score of morality. The men who understand sex—who love and revere women as women—are chaste men. They loathe and scorn obscenity because it is an unmanly offense against their own mothers and daughters. There is nothing on earth they deem so holy as the temple of a woman's body, and there is no act in life they consider so reverential and religious as that whereby mutual love, in its creative ecstacy, produces its legitimate offspring. Such teaching as this it is which, if the rising generation only had it, would make them virtuous and happy. But so long as we put disgrace upon sex, and make it an obscene subject; so long as we compel young people to get their knowledge of it by stealth, instead of teaching them all about it physiologically, and as a branch of science, the sexual passion, deprived of the government or reason and conscience, its divine guides, will work abnormally and injuriously. And as the relations between the sexes, including the rights and position of woman in society, is the grand bottom question in civilization now calling loudly for settlement, I consider it the mission of the Radicals, embracing by that term the Spiritualists, to do what the Church by her false and cast-iron creeds cannot do—discuss the subject in all its aspects, and by their example lead in the march of progress and improvement.

PATERFAMILIAS.

Mr. Truelove at Liberty.

The venerable English publisher who was sent to Newgate for four months for publishing Robert Dale Owen's "Moral Physiology," came forth from his prison on the sixth of September to receive a hearty and enthusiastic welcome from thousands of Liberal friends.

For a gentleman of his age, his imprisonment was a very great hardship. For the first five or six weeks he had literally no sleep, resting at night on a board with a wooden pillow, and in a cell which was dark even in daytime. For all that time he never took off his clothes. After six weeks of this treatment he was removed to a better cell and had better food. At the outset of his prison experience, his anxiety brought on spasms across the chest which affected him more or less during his entire confinement. He was even denied the consolation of reading friendly letters which were written to him. The great meeting at St. James Hall protesting against his imprisonment was described to him in a letter from a friend, but he was not allowed to read it himself. It was, however, read to him. While it was being read he cried like a child. Subsequently he was called upon by his attorney, and he was greatly delighted to listen to the recital of the steps which had been taken by Mr. Bradlaugh and others to reverse the sentence and procure his release. For the time, he forgot his sufferings in the pleasure of knowing that his character and conduct were appreciated by his countrymen and that he was recognized as a martyr rather than a criminal. According to the prison rules, all knowledge concerning the condition of his family and friends was excluded for the space of three months. During his imprisonment his fingers grew stiff with picking oakum. Mr. Truelove is sixty-eight years of age, but we trust that he has many happy years before him, and that the sufferings that he has passed through during his imprisonment may soon be remembered only as a troubled dream. With the kindly nature of the late Robert Dale Owen, he doubtless would, had he been living, preferred to have taken Mr. Truelove's place rather than have the old publisher suffer for the productions of his own (Mr. Owen's) able pen.—Dr. Foote's Health Monthly.

Liberal League Convention.

The Liberal League of Cattaraugus county has invited the friends of the Liberal League movement of western New York and western Pennsylvania to meet them in Convention at the Union Church at Randolph, N. Y., Oct. 19th and 20th. The following named speakers are expected: Dr. T. L. Brown, and Prof. T. B. Taylor, of Binghampton; Prof. Giles B. Stebbins, of Detroit; T. C. Leland of New York; Rev. Mr. Thatcher of Columbus, Pa.; Hon. Judge McCormack of Franklin, Pa., and H. L. Green of Salamanca. Delegates to the N. L. L. Congress to meet at Syracuse will be elected at this Convention. Friends in the vicinity of this meeting are requested to get this notice published in their local papers.

BEHAVIOR is a mirror in which every one shows his image.—Goethe.

EVEN the ox and the ass could teach some Christians. For, if the Bible may be compared to a field, it may be said with truth that they begin at Genesis and eat their way clear across to Revelations—stubble and grass, bitter and sweet, useful and useless alike.—W. H. H. Murray.

Voltaire in Exile.

HIS LIFE AND WORK IN FRANCE AND IN FOREIGN LANDS.

BY M. GASTINEAU.

(Translated for THE TRUTH SEEKER.)

Upon landing, the first care of the exile was to perfect himself in the study of the English tongue; and well it was, for had he been ignorant of it, the London population, who hated the French, would have treated him badly.

One day he was followed by a group of furious workingmen, who aimed at nothing less than stoning the Frenchman. Voltaire, in close quarters, did not lack presence of mind. He mounted a stone, and harangued his pursuers: "Worthy Englishmen," said he, "is it not misfortune enough not to have been born among you?" . . .

At the end of his allocution, the populace, flattered, passed from wrath to enthusiasm. But Voltaire, knowing the versatility of the mob, prudently escaped.

Some time after, he was the victim of a much more serious accident. Entering the office of the Jew d'Acosta to cash a cheque of 20,000 francs drawn upon him, and which he wrongly had neglected to present, the son of Abraham informed him that he had declared bankruptcy the day preceding. Happily, King George hearing of this misadventure of Voltaire, spontaneously sent him 100 guineas, which put him out of difficulty. At the same time, his poem, "La Henriade," was made ready for publication by subscription. Heading the list were the names of the royal family and all the court. Bolingbroke having declined the honor of the dedication, the "Henriade" was dedicated to the queen. It had such a success that three editions were taken up at once. The author realized important sums, which, later in France, he placed in fruitful commercial operations. Among other services, the English Positivists developed in him the genius of business. But it is rather curious that the publication of an epic poem was the principium of Voltaire's fortune.

During his three years' sojourn in London Voltaire profoundly studied the institutions, the customs, and the manners of England. He became initiated into the philosophy of Locke, which brought all human knowledge back to the sole source of subjective and objective experience. He studied the works and the system of Newton, who had scattered the famous and fantastic world-mists of Descartes. He was strongly impressed by reading Shakspere in the original. It is true that he did not appreciate the true value of his genius, and that he qualified as barbarous the fiery élans of the English dramatist, which disturbed the classic convenu of the eighteenth century. It was Voltaire, nevertheless, who revealed Shakspere to Europe, which was ignorant of him, and the meditation of his works must certainly have benefited the author of "Brutus," "Zaire," and "Mahomet."

M. Villemain, in his "Tableau de la Littérature au XVIIIe Siecle," estimates as follows English influence upon Voltaire and the French thinkers:

"Bolingbroke was pardoned in 1726, and returned to London. Voltaire, emerging from the Bastille, joined him there. This was the time when the young president of Montesquieu made the same voyage, in the company of Lord Chesterfield. England, from 1723 to 1730, was thus the school of the two first master-minds of that century. Later, Buffon began his great researches of nature through the study and translation of English discoveries. The most active mind after Voltaire, Diderot, borrowed of England his first studies and his first "Essai d'Encyclopédie." Jean Jacques Rousseau drew from the works of Locke a great part of his ideas upon politics and education. Condillac owes to them all his philosophy."

Formed, fashioned, kneaded, as it were, by English science, literature, philosophy, and legislation, Voltaire returned to France very different from what he was when he had left it. The three years of his exile in that great and free country had opened for him new and large horizons, had given him an intellectual vigor, a tempered mind, a moral force, which became apparent when he was at last permitted to return to his fatherland.

The French minister, favorably considering a demand of Voltaire, based upon the imperious necessity of regulating matters of interest, had signed, on the 29th of July, 1727, the following authorization:

"Permission to the sieur de Voltaire to come to Paris to attend to his affairs during three months, to begin with the day of his arrival; and said time being elapsed, it is to him enjoined by his majesty to return to the place of his exile, under penalty of disobedience. (Dated at Versailles, and signed)

"PHILYPEAUX."

As he himself tells us, without giving his motives, Voltaire did not utilize that permit of sojourn in Paris, since he remained in London until the spring of 1729, at which time the new minister, De Maurepas, no longer opposed his return.

III.

New trials awaited Voltaire in France. The 11th of September, 1730, he put upon the stage his "Brutus," written in London and dedicated to Lord Bolingbroke. The piece had some success, although it was found too republican.

Voltaire did not cease to criticise the abuses and the moral and material servitudes of his country, by exalting English liberties. His enthusiasm for Great Britain eloquently betrayed itself in his "Ode à Lecouvreur" (October, 1731), which avenged the memory of the famous comedienne clandestinely interred at La Grenouillère, after a refusal of sepulture from the clergy. We publish in extenso that admirable ode, in which Voltaire praises England so warmly as the great tragic actress of the eighteenth century.

Here let us note a remarkable particularity. This piece was set to music by the Prince Royal of Prussia, Frederick, who was a maestro of the first order, and played the flute to a charm.

ODE TO ADRIENNE LECOUVREUR.

What do I see? Great God! Those lips soft as the lyre,
O God! these heavenly eyes, the source of living fire,
Of death are made to know the livid horrors now.
O muses, graces, loves of whom she was the type,
My gods and hers, O help! for death can she be ripe?
But what is this? 'Tis done! Alas! thou art laid low—
Yes, dead! and all have learnt thou art beyond relief.
All hearts with mine are moved, are filled with mortal grief.
I hear on every side the arts thy fate deplore
And cry, with tearful eyes, "Melpomene is no more!"
What will you say, O future race,
When the insult you know, which naught can e'er efface,
Now offered by vile men to these arts sad distressed?
They have refused a resting-place
To one for whom of old her altars Greece had dressed.
Before she left the world they all for her would sigh;
Their bondage I beheld, on her I saw them fawn.
Did then her crime begin when cruel death came nigh?
Is it for charming you she's punished, now she's gone?
No more for us shall be this an unholy glade,
For therein lies thy form, and this, thy sad, last home,
E'er honored by our strains, and hallowed by thy shade,
A holy temple will become.
Here is my St. Denys; 'tis here that I adore
Thy talent and thy wit, thy charms, thy winning grace.
I loved them when thou wert, I shall honor them more
In spite of death—most foul embrace—
In spite of error, or ingrates
Who could alone thy wrong to share with thee deplore.
Oh! must I ever see my nation, weak and vain,
Uncertain in its vows, disgrace what we admire;
Our deeds upon our laws e'er stand as a satire;
And fickle sons of France beneath the dark empire
Of superstition lain?
Is it upon the English strand
Alone that thought can dare be free?
O Athens' rival, thou, O London, happy land!
Just as thy tyrants fled, thou hast compelled to flee
The shameful herd that warr'd against free thought and thee.
'Tis there men know all things to say and to reward;
No art is there despised; all skill commands regard;
The hero of Tallard, of victory favored son,
And Dryden the sublime, and Addison the wise,
Ophils with charms replete, the immortal Newton,
To Memory's shrine together rise.
In England, Lecouvreur would have been laid to rest
Among her heroes, kings, her greatest and her best.
For talent there insures a place 'neath fame's high dome,
And freedom, with resources hived,
Has, after centuries, on Albion's shore revived
The soul of Greece and Rome.
What! shall we never more upon our fields, grown tame,
Apollo's laurel leaf upspringing hope to see?
Immortal gods! why has my country ceased to be
The home of worth and fame?

The sharp critique made by the poet upon clerical intolerance, on the score of their refusal of inhumation for Lecouvreur, answered perfectly to the public feeling. But it was not without danger when all-powerful priests governed the State and the woman Louis XV.

It is at this period that happened the scandalous case of the Jesuit Girard. The confessor of a young and handsome Tolosian, Catherine Cadière, the reverend father had seduced her by means of a gross mysticism—by persuading her that sister-souls could unite and mingle their bodies; that God had commanded him to blow in her mouth and administer the discipline upon her naked body. The pretty penitent was made to enter a convent, where the relations were continued. La Cadière was soon in an interesting way, gave birth to a precocious monk, and Father Girard was forced to render account of his mystic operations before the parliament.

After his ode to Lecouvreur, Voltaire had prudently sought refuge for a few months in Normandy.

In the month of October, 1732, the first representation of Zaïre—that enchanting drama, has said a critic—proved a sparkling triumph, and consecrated his fame as a dramatic author. But the laurels of Voltaire were ever interwoven with thorns. The publication of his letter to Uranie, written ten years earlier, raised the indignation of the godly party. The archbishop of Paris, M. de Vintemille, addressed a complaint to the lieutenant of police upon the scandal of the Voltairian epistle. Chancellor d'Aguesseau consulted on this subject his secretary, Langlois, who answered him:

"My lord, Voltaire should be shut up in a place where he could never have either pen, ink, or paper. By the turn of his mind that man can ruin a State."

Voltaire called at the ministerial bar, having found an escape-flue. He repudiated the paternity of the ode, which he attributed to the late Abbé de Chaulieu. Without taking him at his word, they rested content with the excuse.

But, some time later, more ado. Not a production of Voltaire's could appear without creating a tempest. His "Temple du Goût," a witty and amusing poem, half verse, half prose, alienated against him all the lettered and courtier tribe. It was a vigorous satire upon false taste and the absurd infatuations of the period, filled with allusions, waggery, and keen darts launched at his enemies, upon the ephemeral idols of the public, and a few popular authors, who, rendered furious, answered him by insulting letters, epigrams, pamphlets, and parodies.

Under the Pines.—The Etna (Me.) Camp-Meeting.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I promised the friends "way down in Maine" that I would forward you a report of the Etna Camp-meeting at my earliest opportunity after my return home. Weeks have come and gone, and up to this time I have had my head and hands so full of other things that my pen has been kept in close quarters. Remembering the old adage, "Better late then never," I will attempt to fulfill my promise.

Knowing, Mr. Editor, that your columns are crowded, that valuable matter is waiting to be put in type, I will endeavor to boil it down as much as possible.

The ground on which the meeting has been held for two years is one of the loveliest places to be found in the old Pine Tree State. It is owned by Daniel Busnell, of Etna, a professed Spiritualist and a thoroughly Liberal man. Perhaps it will not be amiss to tell you that when it became known that a majority of the committee were desirous that your humble correspondent and her "yoke-fellow" should attend as regular speakers, the minor portion withdrew; also one of Maine's prominent speakers (with whom we had broken bread and exchanged good wishes) retreated from the field, nor did she put in an appearance during the meeting. This action on the part of these people, instead of discouraging the remainder of the committee, only stimulated them to work with greater zeal: and as a result, the meeting exceeded in numbers and interest the most sanguine hopes of all who had enlisted in the enterprise.

The first session convened on Wednesday afternoon, August 28th, with Mr. McFadden, of Fairfield, as Chairman. The opening address was made by Dr. H. P. Fairfield. The evening was devoted to a social meeting. On Thursday, Friday, and Saturday there were three sessions; lectures by Dr. Fairfield, Moses Hull, Dr. Demerritt, and the writer. On Saturday, Moses Hull made a speech in regard to the Comstock law, and offered the petition for E. H. Heywood's release—I will not call it pardon—for signatures. It would have done your soul good, had you been there, Mr. Editor, to witness the readiness with which the call met with responses. Of course there were some who had never been informed on the subject, who refused to put their names down until they had investigated the matter. There were a few who were on the side with Comstock, and yet, on being interrogated, knew no more about him or "Cupid's Yokes" than they did about the "man in the moon," only that he was a Christian. Within five minutes after the petition was presented we received news of the arrest of the trio at the Watkins Convention. It was a hard matter to suppress the spirit of indignation sufficiently to go on with the regular exercises; but the Chairman had a happy faculty of managing things, and order was restored. The petitions were circulated through the remainder of the meetings, and we have a goodly roll of names to send. I believe Comstock has never carried his foul work into Maine, but there are earnest, brave, and true souls there who are watching his movements in other places, and who are sworn to defend the right as far as it is in their power to do so.

On Saturday afternoon the grove was thronged. Moses Hull spoke at considerable length on "Bible Spiritualism." Never had he the pleasure of addressing a more attentive audience. In the evening Mrs. Clara Field and others addressed the multitude.

Notwithstanding the rain of Sunday morning, a vast audience convened under the pavilion to listen to the living gospel. Mrs. Field and Dr. Fairfield delivered the regular addresses. About noon the clouds parted and Old Sol put out his smiling face; the audience was called to the open air church, and before it was time for the services to open, the seats were full and every available tent within hearing distance was occupied. Short speeches were made by Dr. Demerritt and your correspondent. The closing lecture was delivered by Moses Hull on the subject of "Angel Ministry." During a greater part of the afternoon the clouds threatened rain, but the audience remained quiet throughout the long session; and when the meeting broke up it was with a general good feeling and a hope that we might have a happy re-union another year.

During the meeting an organization was born; it was christened the "Spiritualists' and Liberalists' Camp-meeting Association." Judging from the names annexed to the Constitution the first time it was presented for signers, it will be liberally supported.

I cannot give details as I would like, nor have I dared to trespass on your space enough to give a synopsis of one lecture even; but I want your readers to know that there are Liberals in Maine awake to the issues of the hour.

I cannot forbear the mention of an incident that was remarkably pleasant to your correspondent and her companion. When we reached the camp-ground we were shown into a neat little cottage, carpeted and furnished with all the comforts of an ordinary home. We were told that it was built expressly for us; and I assure you it seemed like a haven of rest, although in the midst of a multitude.

We are hoping to meet friends from New York on the Etna camp-ground another year.

The last TRUTH SEEKER is just here, full of interesting reading. Put my name down under the heading of the "Declaration of Rights."

I am ready to enter the Liberal field wherever and whenever there is an opening. May THE TRUTH SEEKER live long for Humanity's sake.

I am, with my soul in the work, MATTIE SAWYER.

A Challenge to Mott, Jenkins, & Co.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I propose to put an end to the controversy in THE TRUTH SEEKER in regard to materialization if Mr. Mott will accede to my proposal.

I will give $100.00—a check for the same being placed in the hands of some responsible party—if he will permit me to disrobe any alleged spirit after it walks out of the cabinet, providing I do not find that alleged spirit to be a living human being or something made to simulate a spirit, and if this alleged spirit will dematerialize in my hands.

I must have my time to thoroughly examine this so-called spirit, with sufficient light to enable me to distinguish the features of the face and the constituency of the apparel worn, and in the presence of twelve reliable witnesses, two of whom shall stand by my side, see all I see, and know all I know. One of these persons shall be an unbeliever and selected by myself, the other selected by Mr. Mott; and so of the other ten remaining, five shall be of my selection and five of his selection.

I do not wish to search the room, the cabinet, nor the medium. I wish to search the spirit. This seems to me a very reasonable requirement, and I should think any spirit would endeavor to make spiritual conditions so perfect that they could materialize without a failure, and so put the matter forever at rest. For if that which is claimed to be a spirit actually dematerializes or disappears, apparel also, in the presence of twelve people, it appears to me Mr. Mott will be vindicated from all dishonesty, "Anti-Fraud" condemned, and that this trial would be a proof of materialization.

If Mr. Mott does not choose to accept this challenge, it stands open to any other well known materializing medium in the world. They must come where I am, at their own expense, for my health will not permit me to go to them.

I am tired over this wrangle about materialization. It seems to me, if true, it can be very easily demonstrated, and that a powerful congress of spirits would be very foolish not to do so, now that an opportunity is offered them for establishing their power and veracity beyond a doubt. So come on, spirits, and influence Mr. Mott or some other medium to accept the challenge, prove the fact, and receive the check or $100.00. It is offered in good faith and from the best of motives, as you will be convinced if you will make the trial. Who will add $100.00 and be one of the twelve to test materialization?

Spiritualistic papers and all others please copy.

Dream of the Future.

BY RAY CHAPMAN.

I looked, and was amazed, for such a sight had never greeted my vision before. In whatever direction I allowed my eyes to roam, they were met by nature in her most sublime state. Where had once been swamps, deserts, and rude forests, now it was one very beautiful garden, filled with most exquisite dwellings, grand drives, pretty walks, fragrant groves, and murmuring brooks traversing through vast fields of yellow grain, creating a scene which had never fallen under the stroke of the artist's brush.

This garden was very large; it extended everywhere, in fact, it covered a whole world. Where many nations had once existed, and were continually hostile to each other, carrying on terrible wars, the strong destroying the weak, saturating the earth with their blood, now all were one colossal fraternity, peace and harmony wafted through every place, and blood was too precious to be spilled. Where fortresses had once stood, now attractive homes were there; their guns, which had once called people upon the battle fields, had been transformed into agricultural implements, bringing forth subsistance, which in the past had hurled forth the bitter pangs of death. The man-of-war, which had stained the billows with human blood, had metamorphosed into a beautiful pleasure-boat, carrying smiling faces, faces not distracted from the excruciating pains received while combating with deadly foes. Churches and nunneries which had once filled the world with superstition, prostitution, and persecution, could not be found anywhere; they had all fallen victims to forgetfulness.

That old Jew book had become obsolete, for this beautiful garden was not made by a God in six days, but by men who had worked many centuries improving it little by little until nearly perfected. They sought after no future paradise because they knew of none to seek, but changed this world into one. They loved no gods, because they knew of none to love, but loved each other. They had no gods nor angel Gabriels to prey upon the virgins, and consequently they had no Christs to crucify. Men and women were all on an equilibrium; each did his share of the work, and each received the product of his labor. Such principles as competition, ostentation, dissolution, pauperism, and chicanery, had all passed away, and discriminations in men had ceased to exist. Woman was no longer a slave to man, nor woman a serf to woman. There were no prostitutes nor illegitimate children among them; they were all children of Nature, and she has made no distinction in mankind. With her all are equal. Woman had been rescued from priestcraft's dying power in which she had been most shamefully abused. It had claimed to be her creator; it had claimed the right to debauch both her intellect and body; it had heaped upon her all the misery and suffering the world had contained. But as I gazed upon her in that beautiful garden, roaming among the flowers of science, inhaling their precious odors, and searching within their leaves and branches for knowledge that might be secreted there, then I knew human kind had advanced and was still progressing.

Mankind had learned that to be free, we must all be brethren, and that love for one another created happiness. Each individual was allowed free access to that portion of the earth required to support him. Tobacco, tea, coffee, whiskey, and cattle for food were no longer products of the earth; science had taught man that they were his deadliest enemies. Man was the only animal that could be seen at labor; the horse and ox were things of the past; labor was performed by other power. Here science again had lent its mighty hand, giving man a new implement for the old, therefore lightening his labors and shortening the hours of toil. Man had left the narrow path and was traveling through the broad fields of science where knowledge budded forth so abundantly that ignorance had withered and died. The sun of Freethought had poured its powerful rays of intelligence upon the lake of superstition, slowly evaporating its poisons until it had become completely dry, and the bones of the superstitious frogs who had once croaked so vehemently, could still be seen basking in its rays; but they will soon disappear, and the beautiful garden with all its grandeur shall take their place. The clouds of love had shed their tears of affection upon the rocks of persecution, gradually wearing them away, leaving no trace to show where they once stood. Bigotry had fallen in love with Freethought, proposed, was rejected, and then committed suicide. Sophistry bewailed over the death of Bigotry until he became so thin that Logic could look entirely through him, and one day a hurricane of Reason carried him away. The smoke of Atheism had gathered around Priestcraft, confusing his mind, and parching his tongue, until he could neither think nor speak, and he was very soon forgotten, for the thunders of science rolled everywhere.

The laws of nature were the only ones there; man's had long ago become extinct. Kings, emperors, lords, dukes, presidents, senators, judges, and juries had all passed away. Standing armies had disappeared from the earth, and the policeman's whistle had ceased to shriek; prisons had transmuted into beautiful cottages; places of exile had transubstantiated into homes of mirth and glee. It was man's love for man that had transhaped all these terrible racking tortures into happiness. There all men were greater than George Washington; they could tell a lie but would not. They never gave to others what they did not wish to receive in return. No individual intruded upon another's natural rights. Laws and persons to enforce them were not needed, for humanity and love flowed everywhere, and cleanliness took the highest ranks among social virtues.

The sexual relations were no longer governed by the price of gold nor the unjust regulations of society. The sexes were not joined together by priests and magistrates, because there were none. Reciprocated affection drew them into union. Platonic love prevailed over carnal. Self-destroying habits were not known among them. They had not been taught to secrete one part of their person under clothing through shame, but looked upon each other's natural beauties with the deepest and purest admiration. They wore clothing because the climate required it, which they arranged in a neat manner so as to beautify themselves.

The fear of death had gone. Men looked upon it as one of nature's great laws, and when the sands of life had nearly run out, they peacefully withdrew to death's chamber, accepted her bed, and sank into their infinite sleep. And as I still gazed around me in amazement, lo! there came a shock, shaking the cot from under me, and I awoke to find that the beautiful garden, with all its grandeur, had only been a dream. How many millennials must pass away before this world will be converted into a beautiful garden filled with love and felicity?

Jenkins and His Ghosts.

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of Sept. 7th my friend D. Jenkins, the dark defender, comes to the rescue of his motley throng of Mott & Co. It is astonishing that people will make such a defense of the foolish clap-trap of dark circleism. Notwithstanding Mr. J. H. Pattee, of Monmouth, Ill., gives details of how the "wonderful" manifestations of Mott are made, yet Mr. Jenkins remains clinging to the dark. Over and over have the dark circle performers been exposed in their low, contemptible, dirty doings, and still there are people who rush to the rescue of the self-convicted cheats. Mr. Jenkins "challenges" me to do what Mr. Mott does, and if I succeed he will acknowledge I am as "great a fraud as Mott." Thus, by the words of his own mouth, does he condemn himself. If a man does precisely what Mott does, it would only prove the man a fraud! Simple Simon Jenkins (of course, that is not his name any more than mine is "Col."). Says this member of the Jenkins family, "If Mr. Jamieson will take his [Mott's] place, and do all that I have seen done there, in the presence of the same parties, I will agree to be satisfied with that amount of labor in that inclosure, these hot evenings, without inquiring what he has done, even if he is not in a trance." You are very gullible, Mr. Jenkins. We did not need this fresh proof of the fact of your credulity. Your articles already published show you to be a person with an immense maw, capable of swallowing, without winking, all the humpbacked Spiritualistic camels that Mott can make. If you think the "conditions" require it, you are fully prepared to stand with your hands tied behind you, your eyes shut, your mouth open, and gulp. You are so easily "satisfied" that you are quite content "without inquiring." That is your weakness. If you inquired more you would believe less. Nor would you in a printed article speak as you have of the things you "have seen done" in a totally dark room, except what few rays of light sneak out from beneath a turned-down light under a transparency, in an adjoining room! What have you seen in that little dark room? Ghosts born of your own credulity.

Mr. Jenkins intimates throughout his article that it is "suspicion" only upon which I base my opposition to dark circles. Therein is he mistaken. It is by actual investigation and experiment that I am forced to the conclusion that dark circles afford no proof of anything else than deception practiced in the name of spirits. I have seen the Mott performance. It is a "Captain Jenks of the Horse Marines" side-show of the Fraud business of modern Spiritualism. I am heartily disgusted with the whole wonder-working, charlatan brood. There is much in the Spiritualistic philosophy that is, I believe, beautiful and true. It was the first form of Liberalism with which I ever became acquainted. But I have lived to see it beslimed by wholesale imposition, and defended by the Jenkins genus, who are ready to do as the spirits direct. Says Mr. Jenkins, "All this suggests the main question, whether we should do as the spirits [which Mr. J. believes to exist] direct, or they do as we direct." 1. I am open to positive proof that they exist; 2. The more "spiritual" manifestations I have witnessed during the past fourteen years, the more skeptical I have become; 3. I accept scientific Materialism as containing far more truth than phenomenal Spiritualism; 4. I am in favor of a union of all the Liberalists of the country under one broad banner.

But suppose we were all sure that spirits exist and communicate, why should we do as they direct? Too much like obeying the Jewish Jehovah. Mr. Jenkins thinks it is audacious in me to "dictate to the inhabitants of two worlds how they may hold intercourse." That is the old Christian superstition about obedience revamped. We hear a great deal about the wonderfully wise spirits that come back. Nearly all the intelligence that purports to come from the other world would disgrace a school-boy of twelve years. There are some noble sentiments taught and literary compositions given that do honor to their alleged authors; but the mass of Spiritualistic literature is as full of ignorance as the ordinary Sunday-school book. Spiritualists themselves are capable of criticising such drivel, but thousands of them are awed into silence by the assurance that it is from spirits—must not "dictate" to them, say the Jenkinses in chorus; the heavenly creatures might get offended, and leave our sandy shores in a huff, to bathe in the blessed sunshine of the Summer Land. The spirits are very touchy. The dear celestials cannot bear the rude blasts of this mundane sphere. Nothing so much hurts their feelings as "suspicion." They do not like to be "suspected," it is so cruel, you see. If you question their "identity," you may be forgiven, but, oh, gross materialistic thought! do not doubt the existence of spirits. If you believe that legions of them are evil, that is better, according to the Jenkinses, than to discredit their existence altogether.

That old stereotyped cry is still made to do duty. The aurora borealis and photography require darkness; ergo, Spiritualism needs it. Logical rules and correct reasoning are nothing to people who can be influenced by such wretched attempts in defiance of the plainest rules of reasoning. To make the cases parallel there should be no light for the production of the photograph and the aurora. This bad illustration of the photographer needing dark, has been employed to bolster every trickster engaged in conducting dark circles. It has been passed around and repeated, parrot-like, all over this land. Scarcely one who employs it has stopped to analyze it. It is like the thousand and one catch words in orthodoxy, all sound and no sense. Put dark circles through a similar process with the aurora and photograph, let the light shine, without which you get neither picture nor aurora. The photo and northern light are unfortunate for the knights of darkness. If they but carry out their own favorite analogies to a logical sequence, they stab their theory to death, and practically abolish the dark circle. The photographer must use light to develop his picture, and every time I have used light to discover the "true inwardness" of a dark circle, I have developed a cheat in the "medium." Light is needed to bring out the picture. Use it, and you will bring out the dark circle.

I am glad to see that hosts of Spiritualists themselves are sick of dark circles. And those who still defend them are driven to support fraud itself in order to sustain them. One of this class (Frederick Francis Cook) in the Banner of Light, Aug. 31, 1878, says, "So long as the upper world deals with imperfect human nature, real or seeming, 'fraud' will ever be a concomitant of spiritual phenomena. To my mind, 'fraud' has the deepest significance. In connection with Spiritualism—its present status—I regard it as essential." "Take 'fraud' out of Spiritualism, and it would dash to pieces in a twelve month." It is to this that the dark circle apostles are come at last!

For a quarter of a century I have been investigating Spiritualism, commencing with a firm belief in immortality. The more closely I have searched for knowledge of an unending existence, the deeper in doubt I have waded. Talk about belief in spirits! What do we know? That is the question. I stand before the public not pledged to the advocacy of any mere ism. That is too broad a platform for many Spiritualists. Following my own reason as the best guide I have, I endeavor to present to mankind the true and useful.

The Freeman's Birthright.

Free thought, free speech, free discussion, a free press, free men and women, and free mails are especially the birthright of the citizens of America. These are prized as among the greatest blessings a government can impart, and they can not be too carefully and jealously guarded. These are what our fathers fought for and laid down their lives for in the days of the Revolution, and these are what their faithful sons will fight for and lay down their lives for now if necessary. Whoever would deprive American citizens of these glorious rights may properly be counted among their greatest enemies, whether it be the pious trickster and spy who, by fraudulent means, procures the passage of unconstitutional laws, which, in a greater or less degree, take away these rights, or whether it is the bigoted and unjust judge, who, swerved by sectarianism, relentlessly carries out the obnoxious laws, and by his partisan rulings and instructions perverts justice instead of executing it; or whether it be the cultured editor who, in the interest of the intolerant privileged classes, and in the name of respectability and exquisite morality, not only defends and apologizes for the procurer of those laws and the laws themselves, but strenuously objects to any one even asking for their repeal.

Yes, whoever opposes the free exercise of the fundamental rights of freemen above-named, or any one of them, and from whatever motive, is an enemy, not only to the Liberal cause, but to the best interests of the country. He who opposes the true principles of American liberty now, or any special feature of it, is really a Tory and an aristocrat as much as were those who shouted for George the Third and the Red-coats in the days of '76. "Loyalty to the King," was their cry then, and "Up with respectability and down with obscenity," is their slogan now. Under the pretense of loyalty to George the Third, great wrongs were done to the poor, struggling Colonists, who went at times almost without clothing, shoes, and food, and risked their lives, and boldly laid them down in the cause of liberty. The supplies of the struggling Colonists were cut off; the Tories acted as spies, watched their every movement, and reported the same to the enemy; and a Benedict Arnold basely endeavored to sell out to the aristocrats of Britain, who were forcing the yoke of bondage on the necks of the poor people of this country. Now enemies equally as great are acting as spies and enemies towards the equally oppressed classes. They would deprive them of their hard-earned property; they would take away their liberties, under the most frivolous pretexts; they would deprive them of the freedom of speech, of the freedom of the press, freedom of discussion, and the freedom of the mails. Anthony Comstock, in the service of the Young Men's Christian Association, the professed Society for the Suppression of Vice, has succeded in procuring the passage of such national and state laws as to absolutely cripple and destroy the dearest rights of the citizen. In the name of religion and morality and decency innocent people have been thrown into prison, their property taken from them, and their names covered with odium, for simply expressing their convictions, and committing no offense whatever.

The power to commit this great wrong has been exercised under the pretense that the people's morals were being looked after and the protection of school children carefully secured; but these claims are as false as the claims of despots usually are, when the liberties of the people are infringed upon and destroyed. The tyrant always frames an excuse for his oppressive conduct. In the matter of injury claimed to be done to school children the greatest falsehoods have been used. The danger to scholars has been vastly overstated; and a large premium could safely be offered for the first case where a school has been submerged by improper literature, as has been claimed by the howlers about decency. And if such a danger should arise, how easy to obviate it by prudential regulations regarding the delivery of second and third class mail matter to children until it has been examined by the teacher or guardian. It is wholly unnecesary to break down the liberties of the people and obstruct the freedom of the mails under the frivolous pretense of protecting school children. If schools are so flooded with improper mail matter, why are not the cases indicated and the offender named and exposed? We pronounce these claims falsehoods that have no foundation in fact—mere bugaboos—invented to aid in depriving the people of their dearest rights. And to further this nefarious business, good and respectable people lend themselves, and are doubtless deceived into believing in that which has no real existence, and the conviction is engendered that somebody has been very vile aud ought to be severely punished. This is a part of the machinery by which the great wrongs done the people are brought about.

The means by which these objectionable and unconstitutional laws have been placed upon our statue books have been culpable design and falsehood, and it is greatly to be regretted to see intelligent, well-disposed people advocate those laws, defend them, apologize for them and for their procurer. There is even a certain class of Liberals who are so much enamored with those oppressive laws as to denounce the right and propriety of citizens asking for their repeal. Their fear seems to be that the making of so laudable a request compromises them as being the defenders of indecency and impurity. Nothing could well be more untrue. Those who ask for the repeal of unjust and unconstitutional laws are not the enemies to purity and decency and the persistent effort to represent them to be so is among the greatest wrongs connected with the entire business. The cry of "mad dog" raised against an innocent canine often brings upon him the violent attacks of misguided men, and his life his unscrupulously taken. This is hard upon the dog. As the fighters for individual freedom and national freedom in the infancy of this nation were not necessarily enemies to George the Third nor guilty of the crime of disloyalty to a foreign sovereign, so the strugglers for liberty to-day are not the enemies of truth, virtue, morality and decency. The effort to make it appear that they are is almost a crime equal to the taking away of their liberties. There are probably no greater friends to truth, virtue, and morality than those who are contending for liberty.

Those cannot be true friends to Liberalism who wish to curtail and embarrass the rights and liberties of the people and oppose the right of asking for the repeal of an obnoxious law. Some ten months ago instances occurred where men who had committed no wrong were stricken down under these laws and by a false charge and by the strong arm of government were arrested and subjected to great expense and inconvenience, and prison doors were ready to open and receive them. One good man is even now suffering most unjust imprisonment from the vile power given by these laws. When the unconstitutionality and oppressive character of these laws were realized an effort was made to present petitions, asking for their repeal or material modification. Blank petitions were sent to various parts of the country and they were numerously signed. It is claimed that seventy thousand names were placed to those petitions. While this was in progress a certain stickler for "decency" opposed to his utmost this move of the Liberal masses. He denounced the petition, declared he would not sign it, and advised others not to sign it. This opposition was kept up during the time the petition was being signed and after it was laid before Congress. It is believed that this opposition prevented large numbers from signing the petition and that it killed the effort before Congress. The object of that petition, of its projectors and signers, was in the interest of the rights and liberties of American citizens, and the warfare so meanly begun and so persistently kept up was a direct blow at those very rights and liberties. The instigator of those laws and the mover of that opposition are not the defenders of the liberties of the people. They are not friends to the principles of Liberalism, or American liberty. Manipulate it as you will, in this opposition lies deeply imbedded enmity to free speech, free discussion, a free press, and free mails.

This malign opposition Liberals are compelled to meet and contend with. The contest between the principles of liberty and conservatism and pseudo-respectability has got to be maintained; the battle has to be fought, and there is no way to avoid it. No lover of freedom, no admirer of the very foundation principles of American liberty, will try to escape it. The freedom of thought, the freedom of speech, the freedom of discussion, the freedom of the press, and the equal freedom of the mails to all must be maintained at all hazards. If we yield this struggle, if we bend the knee in cringing subserviency or cowardice, if we sacrifice our inherent rights upon the altar of "respectability," conservatism, or semi-orthodoxy, we are unworthy of the name of freemen, and should henceforth be denominated slaves, and should wear the collar, with the names of our masters, Sectarianism and Intolerance, engraved thereon. But no! not this! Let us rather be free men and women, and while the life-blood courses through our veins let us battle for the highest principles of American liberty.

What About the Constitution?

If the clause in our national Constitution giving to Congress the power "to establish post-offices and post roads" confers upon the enemies of liberty the right to fine and imprison Dr. E. B. Foote and Dr. E. C. Abbey for imparting strictly physiological and scientific information to the people, and to send to prison for eighteen and twenty-four months at hard labor John A. Lant and Ezra H. Heywood for sending their polemic discussions through the mails, does it not also confer upon the same enemies the power to imprison F. E. Abbot, B. F. Underwood, and R. G. Ingersoll for uttering and sending by mail their anti-theological and heretical utterances? If the Church party, under pretense of law and the Constitution, can arrest and imprison the first, why not the second, as well? If the enemies of liberty and mental freedom shall be allowed to arrest, fine, and imprison the first named four men, can any reason be shown why they should not also be allowed to arrest, fine, and imprison the last three named? Does not the Constitution provide for the punishment of the latter for their phase of heterodoxy precisely as much as for the former? Is there a word in the Constitution in favor of punishing that which may be construed to be indecent or immoral? And is there not just as much warrant in the Constitution for punishing one kind of immorality and heterodoxy as another? Do not our Christian opponents consider the teachings of Ingersoll, Underwood, and Abbot as false, as demoralizing to the religion of Jesus, as destructive to what they consider the true faith, and as much opposed to morality as the teachings of Foote, Abbey, Lant, and Heywood? If they shall be sustained in oppressing and disgracing one class, can there be shown any good reason why they should not be allowed to equally oppress, disgrace, and imprison the other?

Is it not true that the society which did most towards obtaining the passage of those obnoxious laws, and its principal agent pretends to be working in the cause of morality, which they identify with the Christian religion? And did not its President and its Secretary denounce the doctrines of Freethought equally with those of Freelovers, hoping that both would soon be "stamped out?" We should not lose sight of the fact that it is not for the purpose of suppressing obscenity that Drs. Foote and Abbey, and Messrs. Lant and Heywood were arrested, but their Radicalism, or heterodoxy, was the real offense. Obscenity is merely a subterfuge or pretense under which Freeth ought and Liberalists are to be punished and suppressed.

There is really no reason why Liberals should be adjudged more favorable to obscenity than any other class of people—say the Presbyterians, Congregationalists, or Methodists. As freeloveism and adultery exist to a larger extent in the churches than in the Liberal ranks, so it is with obscenity. Liberals are as free from it as any class of people in the world. There is no more occasion for them to be thin-skinned upon the subject, to make haste to announce to the world that they are not in favor of obscenity, than there is to show an anxious haste to assure the world that they are not in favor of robbing hen-roosts, sheep-stealing, larceny of all kinds, burglary, forgery, perjury, manslaughter, and murder. Liberals are as moral, they lead as good lives, they live as happily in their families, they are as pure and as unsensual as are their Christian opponents, and there is no need of their proclaiming that they are opposed to impurity, or obscenity, or any other class of sins or shortcomings. All they have to do is to go straight forward about their business, turning neither to the right nor to the left, taking no special pains to sell the world that they are not wedded to this sin nor that one. A good and a straight line of conduct are vastly superior to all the professions and protestations that can be indulged in.

It has been a mistake with some Liberals to exhibit a morbidness sometimes on the subject of obscenity, seeming to be troubled with a dread incubus like a nightmare, lest somebody may possibly think they are not sufficiently respectable, or are, to the extent of a shade or two, lenient towards indecency. There is a position beyond this, when a man, assured of his rectitude and the uprightness of his own intentions, will not lose sleep nor peace of mind lest Mrs. Grundy or some of her friends may imagine that he is not as pure as the driven snow. A man fully conscious of his integrity need not be troubled by such fears. The knowledge of it will be sufficient to sustain him.

Is it Fair? Is it Honest?

The fairness and information of The Index is displayed in a quotation it makes from the Vineland, (N. J.) Independent in which a statement is made that we were arrested at Watkins for selling a book made up of indecent quotations from the Bible, whereupon it reads a doleful homily upon the impropriety of hunting over the Bible for the purpose of finding passages unfit to have attention called to. Now the astute editor of the Independent ought to know, and the still more astute editor of The Index ought to know, that we were not arrested for selling a book made up of quotations from the Bible or that had the remotest connection with that ancient Jewish book. Not the slightest allusion was made to the Bible in the charge upon which we were arrested and in the indictment of Grand Jury it was the same. Not a word was uttered, not a hint given, that our offense consisted in printing or selling anything from the Bible. It will be well for the editors of the Independent and The Index to be apprised of this fact if they are not so already and not thus unnecessarily mislead their readers.

We have published for a friend a volume containing indecent extracts from the Bible, the express purpose of which is to show precisely what the old book contains. If the abridged volume is deserving of condemnation, the entire work is no less so, for not a word is added to the original. The object of the publication must be obvious to any reasonable person, and no one need fly off about the indecency of the thing. If there is dirt in the Bible, the abridged volume makes it apparent, and the Bible should be considered far dirtier than he who simply makes quotations from it.

Spelling Reform.

Among the many reforms which are pressing forward for recognition, there are probably none more rational than that of the spelling reform. The orthography of the English language is most awkward and defective. The same letters are made to represent three and four different sounds, and a large number of letters are used which are silent and unnecessary. The following is in the Atlantic Monthly for the current month, from the pen of a contributor:

"During the last summer the spelling reform made evident progress, and it has now reached a stage where the public can co-operate with more definiteness than has heretofore been possible. The reform was started by the American Philological Association, and that body at its meeting held at Saratoga in July recommended the immediate adoption of the following new forms, which, it should be said, are in the same line that have given us frolic and music for the frolicke and musicke of our fathers. The new spellings are: 'Tho, thru, catalog, wisht, gard, hav, infinit, definit, liv, giv, ar.' The Spelling Reform Association met with the American Institute of Instruction at the White Mountains, and adopted the following rules for immediate observance: 1. Use e for ea when equivalent to short e; as helth, welth; 2. Omit silent e after a short vowel; as hav, giv, liv. 3. Use f for ph; as filosofer, fantom. 4. Omit one letter of a final double; as wil, shal. 5. Use t instead of ed when it represents the sound; as wisht, slasht. These simple suggestions are not difficult of adoption, and there is reason to believe they will come into immediate use in the public journals."

What is needed is for some journals to take the initiative and drop some of the useless and silent letters which are thus arbitrarily and senselessly employed. We have concluded to be one to do this. After this issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER we shall endeavor to drop the final e in the words have, live, and give, using only the letters that are sounded and needed, except in such articles as go into books. Perhaps it is premature to carry the change that far yet. In time, some of the other needed reforms may follow. If all redundant and useless letters were dropped, about two pages in each issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER could be saved, and the orthography would be far more rational. Deacon Skidmore will doubtless approve of the change.

Declaration of Rights.

A CASE FOR THE COURTS.

To the Editor of The Transcript: Quoting from my remarks in Faneuil Hall, as reported in full in the Globe of yesterday, you kindly commend my motives, but condemn my logic. Bad logic is dangerous. It brings men to beggary and nations to the dust. Yours seems to assume that courts never make mistakes, and, therefore, the Comstock law is constitutional and "Cupid's Yokes" an obscene book. Let that be true, and what follows? By chapter 165, section 15, of the General Statutes, the possession of an obscene book is an offense, punishable by imprisonment and fine. I possess "Cupid's Yokes," and mean to do so, whatever the courts have decided or other people think. If the District Attorney of Middlesex, knowing all these facts, does not prosecute me as soon as possible, he will violate his oath of office. Will you show your readers where the flaw is in this logic and oblige,

Medford, Mass., Aug. 3, 1878. ELIZUR WRIGHT.

We, the undersigned, free and independent citizens of the United States, recognize the above words of the Hon. Elizur Wright as the utterance of a brave, honest, and independent American. They were published more than a month ago, and he still has his liberty. It is to be inferred that the District Attorney of Middlesex does not regard "Cupid's Yokes" as an obscene book; otherwise he is derelict in the performance of his duty. We wish also to place our names on record that we do not regard "Cupid's Yokes" as an obscene publication. Many of us have read it, have it in our possession, and propose to so retain it so long as we choose. While we do not indorse every sentence in it, and think some portions of it are in bad taste, we regard it as the expression of an honest, earnest man, who had a legal and undoubted right to so express himself, and that every American possesses the right to read it, to own it, to buy and to sell it, to exhibit it, and to send it from point to point by any public mode of conveyance.

We furthermore recognize the attempt on the part of any one to deprive us of the right to own, buy, sell, or transport this or other similar books, including works on medicine, hygiene, physiology, sociology, social ethics, relations of the sexes, etc., as subversive of the very highest principles of American liberty; and while we are opposed to obscene and vile literature, that really is so, we hereby pledge ourselves to forever uphold freedom of thought, freedom of speech, freedom of the press, and freedom of the mails. These are the fundamental principles of American liberty, the birthright of every American citizen, and we never wish to see them infringed or subverted. To maintain and perpetuate these rights "we pledge our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor."

Comstock's Last Case.

In our last we gave some account of the trial of the three girls whom Comstock arrested for allowing him, and five other persons equally as pure-minded as himself, on the payment of $14.50, to see their persons in a state of nudity. Probably a case more utterly disgraceful has not been brought to the notice of the American people than the despicable conduct of this pet of the clergy, of the Young Men's Christian Association, and over-officious Agent for the Society for the Suppression of Vice. It is enough to carry his name down to posterity in utter disgrace.

We give room to the report of A. L. Rawson of the remarks of the judge, the prosecuting attorney, and the attorney for the defense. The Professor was present and took notes of what transpired. When a prosecuting attorney "goes back" upon the man who acts as informer and principal witness, it may safely be inferred he considers the case unfit to be prosecuted:

Those persons who read my account of Anthony Comstock's arrest of three girls in Greene street, this city, in my speech at the Heywood Indignation Meeting in Faneuil Hall, Boston, may have reflected that some corroboration was needed for such damaging statements, Such further proof has been derived from Mr. Comstock himself and the witnesses whom he summoned to assist in convicting the girls of unlawful conduct, which acts were the direct result of his request and the bribe in money paid by him.

I was mistaken in one point, in that I said he deceived the court in obtaining a warrant before the acts were committed. The fact is, he made the arrests without a warrant, as he himself testified.

The case was tried before Judge H. A. Gildersleeve and a jury, in the General Sessions, Part 2, Tuesday and Wednesday mornings, Sept. 24th and 25th.

In opening the case, Assistant District Attorney Herring said, among other things, that the Agent of the Society for the Suppression of Vice has deemed it his duty on several occasions to pass to other matters than that of preventing the spread of obscene literature, and that this case was one under that new head. He mentioned the many persons Mr. Comstock had caused to be sent to prison, and among others the notorious Madame Restell, who escaped justice by suicide. (I have been informed by one who has seen her in Europe that the "Madame" is alive and well in a comfortable retreat across the ocean.) He also said that it was his duty to call attention to the fact that it is claimed that the crime charged was organized by Mr. Comstock, and that for vindictive purposes, and he desired the jury to weigh the evidence carefully, and if they find that the prisoners originated the criminal acts to bring in their verdict accordingly. But if they found that they were unduly and improperly persuaded by offers of reward in money, and, being so urged, consented to do the acts requested of them, the jury is to determine who are the guilty parties.

Anthony Comstock was the first witness called. After the usual preliminary items, he gave, in substance, the following (I omit the details of the case which have already appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER): He became acquainted with the house and its character about an hour before entering it, on the evening of June 14th last, and went in with three officers and two friends. Mrs. De Forest was not in the house at the time (9 o'clock), and he was shown into the back parlor. He inquired about the performance that he expected to see, having made arrangements for something of the kind through a man called at one time Chapman and at another Gurney. He, with the others, was introduced to Mrs. De Forest, when she came in, as "the gentlemen from the country of whom mention had been made to her before by Gurney (Chapman), and the money was paid by Mr. Comstock to the woman. (The officer who was with Mr. Comstock at the time thinks $20.00 was the sum paid; Comstock said $14.50.) Mr. Comstock then detailed the incidents of the exhibition in such rude and plain language that the Judge ordered the officer to clear the court of all ladies who were not witnesses in the case. The language and style of Mr. Comstock, as given in this particular case, does him large credit for having become very familiar with forbidden things. However, he said, by way of saving appearances, that he could barely remain in the room, as witness of the offensive exhibition, fifteen or twenty minutes. Officer Sheldon, who was in the same room, says Mr. Comstock was in there one hour and a quarter or one hour and twenty minutes, as near as he can recollect. Mr. Comstock's memory might possibly have become affected by the peculiarities of the occasion, and hence the apparent contradiction between his and the officer's statement.

Mr. Britton was called, and said he is also employed by the same society that pays Mr. Comstock ($80.00 a week). He knew of the business on hand for that evening, for he had been busy with Mr. Comstock and Mr. Chapman (Gurney) for a week or two in "working up the case." Mr. Britton was anxious to sustain his chief, Comstock, and said that they went there to see "a regular exhibition." (They both repeated the word "regular" many times, as John Brougham does in the case of the officer in the "regular army," but not with the same happy effect.) Mr. Britton confirmed the statement of Officer Sheldon as to Comstock's presence for an hour and a quarter or more in the exhibition room.

Officer Sheldon thought that Comstock ordered the wine for the party. Somebody brought the wine, and the party drank. He says he made the arrests by order of Comstock, and that he was acting under the orders of his superior, who had directed him to obey Mr. Comstock on that occasion.

That was about all the evidence for the prosecution, and the Judge discharged the three girls, holding Mrs. De Forest only on the charge of keeping a disorderly house. The case was adjourned to the next day. Mr. Chapman was subpœnaed, but was not found.

The defense did not call a witness. None were needed. On opening the case Mr. John Mott, counsel for the accused, moved the Court to direct the jury to acquit on the ground that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the charge, and said, beside other things, that there had been no evidence offered that any criminal conduct was ever witnessed in that house before this instance, and that the law was not designed to protect rogues in their unlawful intercourse with each other. In this case one rogue, (Chapman-Gurney) had "put up a job," and he and the complainant, Comstock, set on foot the very unlawful acts of which he complained.

In reply to the argument for this motion the Assistant District Attorney, Mr. Herring, said that he felt it to be his duty to shield Mr. Comstock from certain apparent facts which seemed to have been devised to bring disgrace and odium on the Captain of the precinct in which this raid had been made. He said that Gurney (known also as Chapman) is a notorious criminal, who has served several terms in State prisons, and that the Captain would not allow him to carry on business in his precinct, and he (Gurney) had sought out this Comstock, and they together had tried this means of bringing disgrace on the Captain's head. It may be that Mr. Comstock was innocently trapped at the first, and this might have been shown if Gurney could have been brought into court. But the man cannot be found. Mr. Comstock whispered in the ear of the Attorney that Chapman and Gurney were different persons, Chapman an honest man and Gurney the rascal. It was "too thin."

Then the Judge, in closing the case, said, besides many other things, that, in the absence of the statement just made by the District Attorney, he should have felt bound to submit the case to the jury.

(Just then Mr. Comstock rose to make an explanation to the judge, saying that he had been imposed on by Chapman, when his honor quietly but firmly repulsed him.) His honor said that his court would not be used to fasten a stigma on the name of a worthy man, a captain of the police, for the purpose of carrying out any man's schemes of private vengeance. The judge criticised the manner in which the prosecution had been conducted. He said that the roundsman of the precinct is not here, the police are not here, no one of the neighborhood is here to tell us of the character of the house, although it would have been very easy to have had any one or all of them here to testify to their knowledge of its reputation.

It is too bad that justice should be cheated in this affair, for his Honor said he had no doubt of the guilt of Mrs. DeForest in keeping a disorderly house, although the evidence is circumstantial. But the vilest have rights, and if guilty are entitled to be tried in a legtimate and fair manner, without being the victims of fraud and deceit, and he would have punished the guilty if he could have done so without reflecting on the character of a worthy man and public officer. He then directed the jury to find a verdict of acquittal, which they did

For the sake of common humanity we may be glad that this conspiracy failed, and that the captain on one hand and the poor women on the other were protected by the court from the unscrupulous attacks of a hardened criminal who was thirsting for vengeance, and the agent of the Society for the Suppression of Vice, who, in this case at least, seemed quite ready to lend the dignity of his office for unworthy and almost inhuman purposes.

In view of this righteous termination of the conspiracy, I am still of opinion that it would be well to amend the title of Anthony's society so that it shall read "The New York Society for the Manufacture and Suppression of Vice."

A SYSTEM of loading heavy guns by means of compressed air has been invented by R. C. Smith, of Edinburgh, Scotland. The rammer consists of a series of telescopic tubes, into which the air is admitted so that the tubes are extended one after the other, and when the charge is thus thrust home, communication is established between the rearmost tube and a series of internal tubes (which are extended along with the others) permitting the air to escape. Sponging is effected in the same way. The whole process is said to be very expeditious.

BY W. S. BELL.

Science has come to our relief. It does not clear away all the clouds of mystery, but it has already done so much to bless and ennoble man, that we cannot but cherish the sweetest hope that ever filled human heart. The choicest hope is the love of humanity; it is a hope which yet may be realized in the coming age of science. Other hopes are fading. The hope of heaven is weakening. The New Jerusalem was built out of the wrong material; it was a golden city; its streets were paved with gold, its inhabitants played upon golden harps and wore golden crowns. Everything was golden. But in time it has come to pass that this childish notion has been relegated to the limbo of mythology. The preacher now informs us that the "golden city" was only a "figurative" expression. But the people are beginning to inquire after those things which are not "figurative," but real.

The palms of victory which millions of dying saints saw, or thought they saw, waving in the golden streets of the Jerusalem above, are now no longer visible. Faith, which was once so far-sighted as to see into the realms of the kingdom come, has lost her keen vision; her eyes are now dim, and she is not positive about the literal facts, but is quite confident respecting the "figurative" truths.

Science is undoing the Gordian knot by supplying a new method of inquiry. When we speak of science we have reference generally to its achievements, but it is quite as important that we retain in our thought its method. In the past, philosophers busied themselves about mysteries, myths, miracles, and things unknowable. They toiled over problems which were insoluble. The consequence was, they made no progress, no discoveries, no inventions, no improvements. Science is a new method of investigation. It undertakes to investigate phenomena and verify its observations and experiments at every step. Theologians, metaphysicians, and philosophers failed to appreciate the importance of verification. They constructed systems without regard to the foundations upon which they reared their superstructures. Hence the great number of philosophers and their deaply antagonism to one another.

Philosophy failed, it could not control the ascent of the inquiring mind, because it could not produce the necessary proof.

In the last century there arose in Europe a class of thinkers, known as skeptics, who rejected the Bible as a supernatural revelation, and pointed out the unreasonableness and improbabilities exhibited in the so-called sacred Scriptures. They declared that it is irrational to believe that this earth was made in six days of twenty-four hours each. But this sort of argument did not go far towards overthrowing the account given in Genesis. The priest could explain what otherwise seemed dark, if not improbable. But when science came forward with its evidence in the rocks of processes which must have taken millions of years before the earth was evolved to its present form, here were positive and irrefutable facts. The Church made a mighty effort to reconcile geology with Genesis, but the task was hopeless.

Astronomy corroborated geology in regard to the age of our planet. It also dissipated many other legends. Just think of the sun standing still upon Mt. Gibeon to give General Joshua more time to slaughter his enemies! Another childish notion is that of the firmament above, as a floor in which the stars of heaven are set as nails, and from which they might at any time fall out. Again, the ancients held that some of the stars were living creatures (gods), and moved about according to their wishes. After a time this notion was modified; the stars themselves were not living creatures but were the abodes of certain intelligent beings who ruled over and guided them in their courses as a pilot guides a ship.

This superstition faded away in course of time, to give place to the idea that the stars were created by a creator, who sent them on in their courses and still guides them by his omnipotent power. But astronomy has retired the creation story to give place to the evolution hypothesis.

The science of botany teaches that plants cannot grow without sunlight. The Bible says they did.

Zoology makes it certain that snakes do not walk on the tip end of their tails or talk, but the Bible says if it isn't "figurative," there was one snake, when Adam was a boy, which could and did perform both of these feats. Then, too, zoology has punctured the story of the big show of wild animals which Noah cooped up in the ark. Barnum required several hundred men to assist him in taking care of his Hippodrome show, but Noah and two or three sons could manage a show ten times as large.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

IT IS NOT unusual for the world to reject the voice of truth, because its tones are strange; to declare doctrines unsound only because they are new; and even to charge obliquity or derangement on the man who brings forward principles which the selfish repudiate.—Geo. Bancroft.

Paul Flourished Before the Christian Era.

BY SCHOLASTICUS.

In Voltaire's "Philosophical Dictionary," article "Messiah," reference is made to "Sepher Toldoth Jeschu," brought to light by Wagenseil in 1681. Voltaire characterizes it as "a monstrous history of the life of our Savior, forged with the utmost disingenuousness," and after giving a brief outline of the story, he says:

"This detestable book was known in the second century. Celsus confidently cites it, and Origen refutes it."

We would like to be able to reaffirm the statement that Celsus cited our "Toldoth Jeschu," but it is certain that he referred to a story which differed from it in some particulars, as well as from our Gospels. Origen himself says (i, 62): "Celsus does not appear even to have read the Gospel narratives." Quite likely; indeed, if Celsus wrote as early as Tischendorf, Lardner, and other orthodox scholars claim, to wit, between A. D. 150 and 176, it is more than likely he did not read them, because there is no trace of their existence before A. D. 180. But, on the other hand, Celsus did cite a story similar to our "Toldoth Jeschu."

It is enough, therefore, for our purpose that such a story was current and, no doubt, in writing as early, if not earlier than A. D. 180, when our four Gospels first appeared. But as to "Sepher Toldoth Jeschu" being a "detestable forgery," if Voltaire were living now, he might have said the same about the four Gospels, and have appealed to the most learned Christian scholars in support of the affirmation.

If any Freethinker thinks it a rash assertion that the Gospels and Acts are forgeries of the second century, let him consult "Introduction to the Study of the New Testament," by Samuel Davidson, D.D., of the University of Halle, and then, if he is not satisfied, let him read the third volume of "Supernatural Religion."

The suspicion that Paul flourished a century before the time assigned to him in the book of Acts has never, I believe, been entertained by any one but myself; nor did I even dream of it until about three months ago, while translating "Sepher Toldoth Jeschu," where I found a Simon Kepha (Greek, Kephas; English, Cephas) dying on a tower about 39 B. C. I had long rejected as pure fiction the story about Peter and Paul in the Acts, but without suspecting that Paul and Kepha (not Petros, which is a Greek translation of the Syriac Kepha,) might have lived long before the time indicated in Acts. But finding a Simon Kepha in the century before the Christian era, I turned to Paul's epistles to see if I could there discover any clue to dates, when lo! I found, in 2 Corinthians, xi, 32, this:

"In Damascus the governor under Aretas the king kept the city of the Damascene with a garrison, desirous to apprehend me."

Now, we know from Josephus and other sources that Aretus, king of Arabia Petrea, held Damascus for many years prior to 63 B. C., when all Syria, Damascus included, became a part of the Roman Empire. And though there were other later kings of Arabia Petrea named Aretas—one even as late as A. D. 37, who fought and defeated his son-in-law Herod, tetrarch of Galilee and Perea (Jos. Ant. vol. xviii, 5)—yet it does not apppear that the last-named Aretas ever acquired any part of the Roman territory. Nor, indeed, was it possible for such a petty king to have marched an army two hundred and fifty miles and taken the strong city of Damascus out of the hands of the Romans. The idea is simply preposterous.

Therefore, the book of Acts being impeached, and admitted even by rational Christian scholars to be from beginning to end a forgery and a fiction, we fall back on the only other evidence, namely, Paul's own writings, not only for the facts of his life, but for the chronology; and there we find one single passage which points to the reign of King Aretas in Damascus, and makes Paul contemporary with the Simon Kepha of the "Toldoth Jeschu," who died thirty-six years after the stoning and hanging of Jeschu, or about 39 B. C. That probably was the same Kepha to whom Paul so often refers, a rival and elder apostle of the same Jesus, afterwards called the Mashiach, the Christos, the anointed.

On this question of the antiquity of Paul, Kepha, and Jeschu, I feel that we stand upon a rock—a Kepha, a Petros, and the gates of Rome cannot prevail against us.

The "Seymour Times'" Universal Prayer.

O Man, creator of god and devil, and great author and dispenser of misery and pain upon the earth, we humbly approach thy arbitrary tribunal and implore thee to be considerate and kind in the treatment of all living creatures.

Almighty Man, when thou sittest upon the judgment seat, be merciful to the erring culprit before they unjust and tyrannical throne. If he hath stolen that which his natural wants called loudly for, and which he had no means but theft to procure, O self-sufficient and cruel Man, deal gently with him. But, O Man, if the culprit hath killed his neighbor to acquire his goods, or for vengeance, or to gratify his blood-thirsty spirit; or if he hath put his property into his wife's hands, that he may securely wield and enjoy it while his creditors and he that hath stood surety for him are stripped of their goods and impoverished to pay his debts, then, O Almighty Man, smite the d——d villain that he die.

O Man, when thou sittest in judgment, deal gently with the small boys yanked up for stealing apples or watermelons. Reprove them gently and let them go the first few times; for although of such is not the kingdom of heaven, yet they become warriors, members of congress, and presidents.

And, O Man, wilt thou be kind to the frail woman that hides her face and cowers before thy august tribunal? Wilt thou remember that man, the infernal scoundrel, hath deceived, debauched, and ruined her, and that he moves in good society while there is no way open to her but the path that is strewn with skeletons and death's heads? Wilt thou remember that she is a "woman," a tender woman, and that her transgression is the fault of man, the tobacco-chewing animal? Wilt thou remember that she hath many wants, and that man leaves but one lucrative pursuit open to her whereby she may gain a living? Wilt thou remember that the pursuit he restricts her to is one that administers to his pleasure and to her pain and wretchedness? Wilt thou remember that her sin is many times not of her own choosing? O Almighty Man, speak gently to her. Don't fine, and cost, and calaboose her, but hunt up the rascal or rascals that have debauched and deceived her, and cut their backs with stripes from the avenging rawhide.

O Man, when the law dooms a poor fellow to the penitentiary five years for stealing a sack of flour and a side of meat, we beseech thee to knock off four years and add them to the sentence of the bank president or cashier that stole his thousands.

O Man and Woman, be gentle with your little children. Remember their little wants and pains. Observe how their poor little hearts palpitate when you rudely chide them, or cruelly and brutally beat them, you incarnate devils you! Listen attentively to their little petitions. Pet them tenderly. Let them know you love them. Try to make them happy. If you have to deny them anything, try to make them understand that the denial is for their good. O mother and father, never strike your little child. O, never let it go sobbing to bed. Don't teach it to be afraid of you. The child never lies till it observes that others lie, or till, by false accusation, or through fear, it is forced to lie in self-defense.

O Man, wherever thou art in authority, be just and merciful to those under thy yoke. Consider the hard condition of those who have no homes. Consider the hard condition of those who have to sweat and toil at day labor to procure the bare necessaries of life, and who are denied its luxuries and comforts.

O Man, be kind to the worn out tramp. O, vouchsafe to give him a cup of coffee, and don't turn him away hungry. And, O Man, dost thou know of a poor suffering family? Then we beseech thee to supply them with food and fuel, and with such other help as thou canst command and their needs require.

And we would further implore thee, O Man, to bless thy cattle, and thy horses, and thy hogs, and thy sheep. Bless thy cats and thy dogs—bless all of them with shelter and sufficient food, and with kind and gentle treatment. And if thou findest little birds robbed of the liberty which is theirs by natural acquirement, and imprisoned in cages, O Man, we beseech thee to take up a hatchet and smash the cages and let the birds go, unless thou findest that they belong to another clime, and thou knowest they will perish if liberated. In that case, O Man, see that they are returned to their own country and there restored to that liberty which is theirs by natural right.

O Man, we beseech thee not to lie to us nor to cheat us. Deprive us not of the right to speak and to print our honest thoughts. O, do not proscribe us and slander and revile us because we cannot believe that which hath neither reason nor sense nor evidence to sustain it.

O Man, we beseech thee to earn thy daily bread by some honest employment. We pray thee not to be a drone in society, but to produce what thou consumest, or to make thyself useful and necessary to him that doth produce what thou consumest.

O Man, be honest with thy fellow-man. We pray that thou wilt always be considerate of the rights and feelings of others.

And we supplicate thee, Almighty Man, not to put thy strength and money into the politics of the day. Don't become excited by partisan clamor. We implore thee to keep cool, and to kick the man that seeketh office every time he addresseth thee.

And, O credulous man, we pray thee to withdraw thy treasure from heaven, and to invest it in United States bonds, that moths cannot destroy, and that only a Black Republican or a Mexicanized Democratic congress can annul or make void.

And we further beseech thee, O deluded Man, to tax the edifices devoted to the worship of the saviors and saints thou hast created. Or, what is better yet, O most unreasoning Man, we beg of thee to sell those edifices and pay off the national debt, or appropriate the money to the purchase of inalienable homes for poor worthy families, so far as it will go.

O Man, in conclusion, we beseech thee to do some good charitable act every day. O, try to make thy life of to-day an improvement on thy life of yesterday. O, we pray thee to set a resolution to drop one fault or infirmity every day of thy life till thou hast left them all off and become as perfect as a creature of thy make-up and surroundings can be.—Seymour Times.

THAT CHURCH MEETING.

ZION HIL, N. J., Sept. 30, 1878.

MR. EDITUR: That kalld meeting ov the adult members ov Zion Hil Baptist Church to overhall yure humbel servant for the enormus krime ov reeding the wiked paper kalld THE TRUTH SEEKER kame off, akording to notis, last Frida afternoon, at thre o'klok. Thoze interested in having me brawt to punishment for daring to be so ungodly had taken panes to se that evry grone member ov the church reseeved a notis ov this meeting; and az it waz a kase so unusual for Deeken Skidmore to be halld over the koles, thare waz a pritty good turnout. Thare wer at least 10 farmers thare hoo left thare work and drest up in thare Sunda-go-to-meeting klothes, and thare wer more than 40 wimmen, with thare best fikisngs on; and yu wood suppoze, had yu seen us all, that it waz sum gala-da affare. The children and yung fokes under aje ware left at home. The meeting, ov kourse, took plase in the church.

Sally and Suzan and I started in good sezon, and got thare before haf a duzen had arrived. We went rite to our pu, which iz up klose to the pulpit, and I had an interesting time az I sat kind o' sidewize and notisd the brethren and sisters as tha kame in. Sum looked az solum az tho tha wer going to a funeral, and others had a rogish smirk on thare kountenanses, az tho tha wer going to a wedding. Az many az haf a dozen kast a sly wink at me when they kame up forward, az much az to sa, "Keep a stiff upper lip, Joel; don't be skart at what Mrs. Jones and her krowd kan do."

Wel, that was just the wa I felt. Tho it waz the furst time I waz ever komplaned ov in the church, and the furst time I had ever ben kalld to an akkount for enything I had sed or dun, I didn't feel a bit more unezy than I do this minit, or when I go to bed at nite.

At 3, presisely, Elder Goodly kame in with hiz most solum vizaj on. He lookt for all the wurld az tho hiz neerest frend waz condemd to be shot and the our ov exekushun had kum. Az he past my pu he halted a minit and took me by the hand, and whisperd, "Brother Skidmore, I hope yu ar wel." To which I whisperd bak, "Thank yu, Elder Goodly, I never felt better in my life." A fu ov the others spoke az tha kum up neer to our pu, sum looking cheerful and others looking awful grave. I kood not help smiling internally to notis all this, and to think yu waz the innosent kauz ov all this big adoo about nothing. If it had not ben for THE TRUTH SEEKER, this meeting never wood hav taken plase.

At 10 minits past 3 Elder Goodly roze and made a solum prare. I never saw a more sad expreshun on hiz kountenanse. He lookt az tho 20 tuns wate waz baring down upon his sole. He prade thus:

"O hevenly Father, we humbly implore the to draw neer unto us on this speshal okkashun and watch over the deliberashuns for which we ar kalld together. Ma charity and wizdom guvern our akshuns; and oh, ma we be kontroled in whot we do here to-da by the blessed Golden Rule which thou tautest when here on the erth—to do unto others az we wood tha shood do unto us. Ma we exersize the same charity and forbarans that we wood be pleezd to hav extended unto us under similer surkumstanses. Ma we be slo to kondem and kwik to forgiv. Ma we not, most mersiful Father, be influensd by a spirit ov self-richusnes or unforgivnes. Ma we all feel the spirit ov kindness towards the good brother hooze kondukt we hav met here this da to examin and konsider. He haz for meny yeers ben a piller in this thy church, and we hav evry konfidense to beleev that he iz a man ov onesty and integrity hoo duz not wish to kommit eny offense aganst thy holy kauz nor aganst the welfare ov eny human being. If, most mersiful Father, he haz ben to sum degre drawn aside by the wiles ov the evil wun; if he, unkonshusly to himself, haz ben indused to follo in eny by and forbidden paths, do, O Lord, tuch hiz hart with the rod ov thy spirit, and do, deer Father, bring him bak to thy holy fold agen. Do not suffer him to wander in the blind mazes ov unbeleef. Ma he not lissen to the delusiv song, skeptisizm; ma he not stumbel over the obstrukshuns ov dout; but O, may he hav lite from thy holy kountenanse that wil leed him in the wa ov truth and richusnes, az he haz heretofore wawkd. If the evil influense ov the devil, in the form ov an ungodly paper, which iz undoutedly printed to draw soles astra and to drag them down to the rejuns of darkness and damnashun, az sum ov the good sisters and brothers ov this church do verily beleev, then, O God, we pra thee, ma the arm and the hand that weeld the pen that rites that paper be paralized by a tuch ov thy power so that it kannot agen be brawt into the servis ov the Adversary of soles. Let hiz days be not lengthend in this fare land, but ma he be kut off from among men, and ma he find hiz just dezerts in that lake ov sulfurus fier whare damd viktims ov evil kry out kontinually in the terribul torture, which tha kannot eskape, and which wil never end. O Father, we realize whot a fearful thing it iz to be the meens ov draging soles down to destrukshun, and we feel asshured that in thy retributiv justis thou wilt meet out such a venjful rekompense ov damnashun and agony az no man kan endure by hiz own power for the term ov a singul our, and that but for the power imparted expressly by thee, not a being, in the body or out, kood endure the burning agony for a singul minit. Lord, we no thy kindness and mersy iz grate. Thou dost giv life and enduranse to all thy kreetyures, sum to partake ov everlasting bliss, but far more to suffer such akute angwish and agony az no human being iz kapable of konseeving ov, and this bekauz tha wil not harken to thy voise, and wil disoba thy law and beleev that which rezon sez iz tru. Thus, mersiful God, hast thou shone us how delusiv and danjerus iz human reezon, and how soledestruktiv it iz to lisen to it for even the shortest spase ov time. Suffer us not to harken, then, to this siren song, this begiling chant which destroys the sole forever. If eny ov thy littel wuns in this thy preshus fold hath harkened or ar inklind to thus besto thare eers unto this korrupting and damning muzik, we pra thee to stretch forth thy all-powerful arm and draw them awa from the danjer that awates them, and to hide them in sum sekluded retreet where the whispers ov the fel destroyer kan reech them no more. O Lord, az thou valuest the soles ov thy kreetyurs, and az thou woodst save them from the fires ov torment which burneth forever, let thy grase abound, and let thy protekshun be shed around all thy littel wuns, so that nun kan wander awa from thy keeping. Gide us in our labers this afternoon; keep us at all times from danjer, and infidelity, and deth, and at last save us, for thy Son's sake. Amen."

The Elder's prare waz very impressiv, and when he had konkluded a solum expreshun waz on evry wun's fase, and several wer sheding teers. I took it all to be on my akkount and in my behaf, and I wunderd how so meny kood feel such an interest in an old man like me, hoo had never intended to do vary much harm sinse he waz big enuf to go to meeting barefoot on Sunda, and rob burd's nests and watermelon patches at other times.

After the prare the Elder spoke, in the same solum tones, about the objekt ov our coming together; ov the komplantes that had kum to hiz eers damajing to the Kristyan karakter ov wun ov the mane pillers ov this church—wun hoo had dun more, perhaps, than eny other singul individual toward baring the pekuniary burdens kontinjent upon all institushuns ov the kind. He sed that for several weeks hints had ben dropt and komplantes had ben made about our good brother Deeken Skidmore, and that for sum time he waz dispozed to pa but little attenshun to whot waz thus sed to him, but the komplants gru louder and louder, and more and more ernest, until he kood disregard them no longer. When a kommitty ov 6 ov the leeding sisters of the church, with sister Jones at thare hed, kame to him, and with all the ernestness ov injured innosense and holy zeel, demanding an investigation into the kondukt ov a hitherto respekted and valude brother, he kood no longer disregard their importunitys, and felt kompelld, az a sentinel on the walls ov Zion, to lisen to thare kry and grant thare demands. He sed he must konfess that he had approched this matter with the gratest reluktanse and misgiving, inazmuch as thare waz no person living, aside from hiz own bozum kompanyun, for hoom he had entertaned a profounder respekt than he had held for Deeken Skidmore. But, az hyly az he respekted and esteemd that wurthy brother, he kood not silense the voise ov duty, and konsekwently this meeting had ben kalld. He hoped, in the remarks that brethren and sisters ma feel impelld to make, tha wil not be bitter nor vindiktiv. "We shood remember, while we think our brother, Deeken Skidmore, haz gone far astra, that we all go astra more or less. Not wun ov us iz perfekt; not wun but what, every our in the da, kommits sum akt or duz sum deed that iz les perfekt than it mite be. We shood all remember that we ar all fallibul kreetyures; that we all need the exsellent gift ov charity to attend us on all okkashuns, and espeshally the prezent. Let me rekwest that evry wun hoo feels kalld upon to kritisize the kondukt ov bruther Skidmore wil be kareful and not unnesessarily wound hiz feelings. Whatever he haz dun and whatever hiz vuze ma be on serten points, we must all admit that he iz a good man; that he haz dun a grate deel ov good in this church and in this naberhood; that he had borne the burden in the heet ov the da; that he haz not only razed hiz voise in the servis ov hiz master, but he haz led a good life az wel; what iz, perhaps, more important than all the rest, he haz put hiz hand in hiz poket frely and kontributed with a liberal hand. I no not what we wood hav dun on meny okkashuns had it not been for the jenerosity ov our good bruther. When this bilding needed painting so badly, 2 yeers ago, and it seemed that the munny kood not be razed to do the job, how wood it hav been akkomplished but for the hand ov our good bruther hoom we hav met here to-da to juj and perhaps to kondem? When the storms ov heven blu down our steeple a yeer ago last April, and we thawt we wer to poor to put it up agen, how wood it hav ben dun had not this good bruther taken the leed in the matter and sed we must hav anuther steeple up inside ov 30 days? How did he do it? Why, my frends, he put hiz hands in hiz pokets and took out hiz munny and used it. He bawt the timbers and the lumber and pade the karpenters for putting up the steeple that now points to heven from the hous ov God in which we worship; and to this da we hav not reseeved from the members ov this church haf ov the munny he pade out for the church from hiz own poket.

"And so it haz ben on meny okkashuns; he haz uniformly ben generus to the kauz. When we needed a nu stove last winter he went all the wa to Trenton and bawt the stove and brawt it heer in hiz own wagon, and put it up, and on more than wun Sunda we shood hav sat heer in the kold had not his munny pade for the kole; and haf ov the munny that the stove kost, and the kole kost haz not been pade bak to him. And in my own kase, I kan speek from aktual experience.

"I preech to yu 52 Sundas in a yeer. I tend to yure prare meetings evry Frida nite, I kondukt the funeral servises when eny ov the member's ov the familys of the kongregashun di. I marry the yung peepel when tha wish to enter into the important state ov matrimony (sumtimes tha giv me a doller or 2, and sumtimes nuthing), and I perform these servises for less than wun tenth part what sum ov the shepards ov sum folds reseev in sum ov the large sitys, and I am sorry to sa, my frends, that it sumtimes happens that yure kwarterly paments ar not az prompt as kood be desired, and to tel yu the truth, I sumtimes get very short and hav not a doller on hand. On such okkashuns, and when menny ov yu hav ben in areers in yure paments to yure humble servant, I hav menny times found a good frend in Brother Skidmore. He haz never faled to respond to my rekwest for ade. He haz never refuzd me when I hav gone to him in this wa, and hiz share ov my salary is most alwaze pade in advanse. I wish I kood sa az much for all other members ov this church.

"Now, my brethren and sisters, this iz a matter ov no little importance. Even in matters ov relijun and in running a church, munny iz a prime nesessity. Fathe in the blud ov Kriste, partaking ov the sakrament, and regular attendanse at the hous ov God ar vary important and kannot be dizpenst with; but what kan we do without munny? I tel yu, it iz a pozitiv nesessity. Without it we wood hav to diskontinu biznes; without it I kood not preech to yu, and without it even soles kood not be saved. Now, my pius frends, I menshun theze things bekauz tha ar ov the gratest importans, and bekauz the virchews of Bro. Skidmore in this line must not be lost site ov. If he iz not perfekt in evrything, the verchews he duz pozess go vary far to make atonement for the mistakes he may hav made. It iz a tru passej ov skripcher that sez, "Charity kuvereth a multitude ov sins;" and I want to ad, So duz munny. A man hoo iz jenerus to giv to the kauz ov Kriste shood be kredited larjly, and it wipes out meny little fawlts and imperfekshuns. Let me impres on yure minds that Bro. Skidmore iz a vary important piller in this church, and that we shood menshun hiz fansid delinkwensys with grate moderashun and charity.

"Now, my frends, yu ar all given the opportunity to sa whot iz in yure hart tuching the kase ov our good deeken, and we wil lissen to whot yu hav to sa. Sister Jones, we wil heer from yu furst."

Thus did the good Elder open the meeting. He waz evidently imprest with the importans ov the subjekt; thus he prazed my good kwalitys, and thus he seemed ankshus not to hurt my feelings. But, Mr. Editur, I kannot, in this letter, giv all the proseedings ov that meeting, and I wil just az wel stop rite heer. I want to giv yu pritty ful detales ov it, bekauz yu ar deeply interested in the affare, and yure paper iz stoutly kondemd by thoze hoo kondem me. I wil rezoom the subjekt in my nekst, and I am not shoor I wil be abel to tel yu all about it even in that. But in the meen time let me asshoor yu that throo it all, and afterward, I am stil yure pius frend,

The races of trees, like the races of men, have come down to us through a prehistoric or prenaturalhistoric period, and the explanation of the present condition of the geography of forests is to be sought in the past, and traced in vestiges and remains and survivals.

Letters from Friends.

THE ISSUE.

BY E C. WALKER.

The hour has come. The enemies of a free mail have flung their banner to the breeze, and boldly challenged battle upon the obscenity question. "Reform!" is their slogan, and right heroically they shout it forth and give notice that they want a "square deal." That is well. I am glad to see them thus swing into line; and now let us meet them squarely upon the issue, with the battle-cry of "Repeal!—Repeal! first, last, and forever." Let there be no shrinking from the fight, no parley with the enemy, no thought of compromise or surrender. The Liberals of this country might as well understand first as last that we have got to make a Bradlaugh and Besant fight in this mail question; that every concession is a step backward and will but prolong the struggle; and that the only safe and logical position is that indicated above, the immediate and total repeal of all laws interfering with the United States mails, or regulating the contents of the mail sacks, upon any other ground than that of weight, bulk, and molecular constitution.

A word upon one or two other matters in connection with the Call for the Second Annual Congress of the N. L. L. "Shall we nominate candidates for President and Vice-President of the United States at the present time?" I would say, No. The financial question is now before the people, and the Liberals of America cannot afford to let that question incur the risk of going by default for lack of their work and votes. Our country trembles upon the brink of bankruptcy and ruin, and every lover of his race must contribute his mite toward the establishment of an American monetary system—a system which shall render it possible for each honest working man and woman of this country to live as becomes a freeborn citizen, rather than as the starving serf of a heartless goldocracy.

Another thing, Why was Syracuse chosen as the place of meeting? Would it not have been better to have given Western Liberals an opportunity to attend a Congress of the League? A majority of the Local Leagues are located west of Cincinnati, and the League should meet either in that city or Chicago. We are very poor out here, and but few Liberals from west of the Mississippi will be able to attend the Congress. Florence, for instance, cannot be represented at all.

To return to our subject, The Call says: "Shall it [the League] now demand the total repeal of the existing laws on this subject, and thereby practically protect and foster the circulation of obscene literature? Or shall it continue to demand the radical reform of those laws in such manner as shall protect freedom of thought to the uttermost without protecting obscenity in the least?"

Because Mr. Abbot does not favor the enactment of a law prohibiting the transmission of samples and advertisements of tobacco, wine, and whiskey through the mails, is he by such refusal sanctioning and fostering dissipation? How would it have sounded to have told the Abolitionists that they must not agitate the "total repeal" of all laws permitting slavery, but that they might properly work for a "radical modification" or a "reform" of such laws? We want no reform of an iniquitous law; it must be extirpated, removed, torn out, root and branch. Who is to judge what is "obscene"—Comstock, Mr. Abbot, or some one from the slums of New York or Boston? Mr. Abbot and others of his school say, Make the law so plain that there can be no mistake. That only should be defined as obscene which is intended to corrupt and debauch. Well, who is to judge as to the intentions of another? Would it not be just as easy for a bigoted court and jury to declare that Mrs. Besant intended to debauch the public mind when she wrote her "Law of Population" as it was for a similar judge and jury to decide that Mr. Heywood's pamphlet is obscene? Some fallible has to decide in each case, and what warrant have you for assuming that that decision will always or ever be a just one?

Mr. Abbot can see very clearly that there can be no logical stopping-place between Romanism and a purely secular state, and yet he fails to see that until we cease to meddle with our neighbor's private reading, and no longer presume so tell him what his mental food shall be and with what kind of pictures he shall regale his artistic sense, we are yet lingering within the pale of that same ecclesiasticism, and are denying to others what we claim for ourselves. As there is no logical halting-place between the Romanish conception of the relations of Church and State and that of the Secularist, so, logically is there no tenable ground between the camp of those despots who favor an absolute consorship of men's thoughts and that of those who demand a free mail. The failure to perceive this explains why Mr. Underwood, usually so formidable an opponent, is so easily worsted by "Old-school Moralist." Mr. Abbot demands a frank avowal of their position by those who oppose the action and views of himself and friends. I trust that he will be gratified. Let that avowal be frank, clear, and explicit, and let it be, "Repeal of all laws interfering with the absolute inviolability of the United States mails." Let the fight be waged upon the issue, not upon the personal character of the combatants. Mr. Abbot has some very bitter words for the "Freelove folly," and seems to have but a poor opinion of "those who are deluded by its feeble sophistries," but we can well afford to take no notice of such opposition, for we know that the ultimate triumph of our principles is sure. But the question before the Liberals of America is not free love, but a free press and inviolable mail. Mr. Abbot seems to fear that the League will tumble into ruin if his ideas do not prevail in its management. Time will show whether or not he is in the right, but he must not think to frighten us by a decision of the Supreme Court. It may not be wise to knock our heads against "fixed facts," but while a decision of the Supreme Court may be such a fact, it certainly is not an immovable one. We have not forgotten the Dred Scott decision and its reverse by the American people, and we shall continue steadily in our way, fearing neither that unjust tribunal nor the threatened dissolution of the League. We are prepared to stand by the Declaration of Rights so nobly headed by Elizur Wright, and I have no doubt but that the great men of American Liberals will prefer that as a platform, rather than the "Card" of the Board of Directors. Sorry to see Mr. Wilcox in that position. On with the battle! Repeal! repeal!

ANN ARBOR, MICH., Sept. 22, 1878.

BROTHER BENNETT: As I have received neither the "Yokes" nor any acknowledgment of the receipt of my money, I am inclined to suspect that my letter never reached you. Will you please inform me? I am glad that Christian intolerance has not yet put you to the necessity of looking through iron bars; but I am sorry that jealousy (for it is nothing else) urges so many so-called Infidels, both editors and others, to continually misrepresent your motives, your actions, and your words. Is the battle not fierce enough without a few men—men, too, who pretend to be leaders and exponents of our cause—promoting internal dissension? Down, I say, down with those men who are willing to scatter discord all through the Liberal ranks to satisfy their petty jealousies, and let others, who are willing to live for the cause and die in it, take their place.

I am yours respectfully, W. A. CRANDALL.

AUBURN, N. Y., Sept. 18, 1878.

BRO. BENNETT: Inclosed find twenty-six cents in stamps, for which please send me a copy of "Anthony Comstock." I want the book to lend to some of my former brethren in the Universalist church. By the way, have you seen the action recently taken in regard to Comstock by the Universalist State Convention at its session held in Syracuse, N. Y.? In the fourth resolution it is stated: . . . "Inasmuch as Anthony Comstock is being denounced in some directions for his unrelenting warfare against obscene and immoral literature, we express our approval of his course, and extend to him our sympathy and encouragement." You had better cease your opposition to St. Anthony, inasmuch as the Universalist State Convention has come to his defense and support.

The convention that passed the above resolution contained in its number some who are guilty of indiscretions. The pastor of the church in which the convention met, less than four years ago, made the following confession, viz.: "I frankly confess to the fearful sin of which I am charged, and will not be cowardly enough to lie or seek a palliation of my weakness and guilt. I can only crave the pity and compassion of the world I have offended, and the forgiveness which my sincere and profound repentance before God and man calls for. I have returned my letter of fellowship to the denomination I have so grievously stricken, and abandoned the profession which I have so deplorably shamed. May God and man pity and forgive me, and aid me to do some humble work in life yet for the good of society. I am not a coward or a sneak, to make Adam's plea that 'a woman did it.' It was my own weak and unguarded soul that, in a moment of frenzy, wrought my downfall."

The Star in the West, a Universalist paper published in Cincinnati, O., had an article in reference to the above, under the heading "Rev. R. Fisk, Jr., D.D.," in which it says: . . . "He has brought upon himself and the denomination an overwhelming shame. . . . Nothing could be more sudden and unexpected than his fall from the high position with which the denomination honored him beyond his years and experience; and we could pen a report of his death with less of sorrow than we make this announcement. We make no effort to cover up or disguise the fact of his disgrace. . . . His usefulness is ended and his career closed in our church."

Notwithstanding all that has been said and done, the above-named "Rev. R. Fisk, Jr., D.D.," is the acting pastor of the Universalist church at Syracuse, N. Y., where the State Convention came to the rescue of St. Anthony Comstock. You will observe that they passed no resolutions against perjury, adultery, or against going into other States to obtain divorces which in this State could not and would not be granted; reasons obvious.

Yours truly, J. H. HARTER.

SNOWVILLE, VA., Sept. 20, 1878.

DEAR BRO. BENNETT: Though we have but just escaped "by the skin of our teeth" from the most disastrous consequences of the greatest flood that ever devastated this portion of the country, and are heavily in debt besides, yet what are personal losses and privations when taken in consideration with the demands of Liberalism; of liberty to think, speak, and act according to the highest dictates of humanity? The whole Liberal cause is jeopardized when its leaders are fined, hampered, and imprisoned, and it is the urgent duty of every lover of truth, justice, and right to do something, be it ever so little. We all feel a personal pride in our gallant speakers and publishers, and enjoy the fruits of their labors, and shall we hold back when called upon to help them in the hour of need? It is your fight and my fight, dear readers of our pet paper, and we should feel a pride in enrolling our names upon the glorious list of the defenders of liberty—liberty to think, talk, argue, or print whatsoever we please, whatsoever the demands of the time call for. There is no danger that public sentiment will ever retrograde if it be left free to choose for itself what it shall buy, read, or send through the mails. Progress is the law of humanity and without perfect freedom there can be no real progress. I send twenty-five cents—less than the widow's mite; but it is every cent I have, and that was a gift from a far-off, unknown friend—a gift to the cause; and where can I better invest it than in helping its noblest, bravest, boldest, and greatest champion? I hope every woman in the land will do as much. Few are less able pecuniarily. Many a washerwoman who earns her bread at the tub handles dollars where I do cents But no one can give with a more free heart and open hand where liberty calls and the good of the world demands it. It is not charity. It is only paying our debt to him who has jeopardized liberty and means for us all.

Only twenty-five cents, dear readers, and you will be one of the glorious band, and your name shall go down to posterity as that of a brave woman who dared to speak for right when it was martyrdom to do so.

Earnestly, hopefully, and truly thine,
ELMINA D. SLENKER.

MORRILL, KAN., Sept. 25, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT: The Holy Inquisition is after you again, this time for selling "Cupid's Yokes." I must have a copy, for if Rev. Mr. Waldo and Judge Hurd can read it without being contaminated, I think I can; at all events, I'll go one eye on it. It is singular that such men can read those books without being harmed which would utterly ruin the morals of any other person. I supposed, by what I had read concerning the law, that it was just as strict on the buyer as the seller, and also on any one possessing obscene books. What right, then, has Judge Hurd's brother to buy, or Rev. Waldo or Judge Hurd to possess, those books? If you are punished, why are not they? Or are they licensed and our laws tampered and our Government made to bow the knee to the Inquisition of the Y. M. C. A.? It may be so for a short time. Christianity must remember that she has not the Dark Ages to deal with, when the nations were buried in ignorance, bigotry, and superstition. Then she could reign supreme; but now, by the press, education is diffused among the masses; the arts and sciences have robbed her of her main support, and to-day the best thoughts of the world are uttered by men and women whom she calls Infidels. Such nostrums as suppressing thought may revive her for a while, but it is like every other stimulant—it soon dies, and leaves the patient more debilitated than before. Every Mrs. Besant, Miss Tilton, Heywood, Bradlaugh, Bennett, or Bell she sends to her bastile but adds a blow with the axe laid at the root of the old hollow trunk formed of ignorance, superstition, frauds, bigotry, and crimes of every description. Let her pound. The throes at dissolution always produce the hardest kicks, and she, in her last agonies, when inflammation sets in, will show her strength to the utmost. Her doom is sealed; her race is nearly run. Freethought has given her a mortal wound neither her defunct Christ nor any other power can heal. Go on, friend Bennett, in the good work; tear down the old shell of superstition, and let in the truth that science is revealing every day, that the world may see the fallacies of old theology. My heart is with you, and when your trial comes I will do what I can towards helping you through. I see you are getting up a list of those who believe in and are willing to uphold freedom of thought, speech, press, and the mails, and are opposed to what is really obscene. You can add my name to the list, as I fully indorse those sentiments. Yours for the right, J. W. SCOTT.

CHEYENNE, WYOMING, Sept. 19, 1878.

MY DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: You will please send to my address the following: "The Holy Bible Abridged," cloth, "The Trinity," and "Cupid's Yokes," "Speeches of the Watkins Convention," bound. I also wish to take the advantage of your liberal offer and pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER in advance for 1879, with "The Champions of the Church." I am ordering "Cupid's Yokes" to read, and if I like it I shall get just as many others to read it as I can, District-Attorneys, Comstocks, or any others to the contrary notwithstanding. Inclosed you will find $7.10 to pay for all. I indeed sympathize with you in this, your second trouble with the persecutors of freedom. I supposed I was living in a free country; but alas! in many respects it is only so in name. Respectfully yours,

T. CREIGHTON.

LOGANSPORT, IND., Sept. 20, 1878.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT. I see by your last three papers that the Christian bloodhounds are after you again and have succeeded in putting you to a great deal of trouble and some expense. But never flinch, brave friend, and the victory will be yours. Anthony Comstock and his informers are murderers of justice, and their days will soon be numbered, for they can't always reign supreme in this land of the free. I will pledge one dollar to the Defense Fund, and would gladly make it one hundred if I were able, but it is the hardest times out here we have as yet witnessed. But I hope every Liberal that can help you will do so, and we will make those bigoted skunks hunt their holes in a hurry. Col. R. G. Ingersoll is to lecture here on the 24th of November, and he can bet that our Opera House will be crowded from pit to dome. Everybody here, except these hell-bent Christians, loves that noble Freethinker and mighty slayer of the man-made creeds. What a grand woman Elmina D. Slenker is! All honor to her. What a grand and noble thing it is to have one's mind purged of all the silly and untrue sayings there are in that historical humbug called the Bible! I went to hear a preacher a few evenings ago, and he made the following remarks: That he felt like dropping on his knees in the public streets and asking God to smite down the persons that would go to Sunday excursions or would not observe the Sabbath day. Good sentiments, ain't they? Yours for justice, J. C. BEATTY.

CENTRAL, S. C., Sept. 22, 1878.

DEAR BENNETT: It appears to me that you have more quill fighting to do than any man I have ever read of, and really I don't know who gives you the most trouble, the Society for the Suppression of Vice, or the cultured Society for the Suppression of THE TRUTH SEEKER. There seems to be a rivalry between the parties as to which shall gobble you up first. I was in hopes that after disposing of The Index and its editor you would have a little rest, and have time at least to attend to the enemy in front, but not so. Another gladiator enters the arena, and wants to measure steel. Down with him. Give him fits. Do it quick, and let us have something besides quarreling. In the name of all that is sacred, are we never going to have peace? Is this war of words and fight of quills to continue forever? I think it is about time to stop taking any notice of these galvanised, whitewashed Infidels. If you will cease to notice them, they will perhaps join the Church, and come at you direct, and not by a flank movement. Please send me two copies of "Cupid's Yokes." I have heard so much infernal fuss about it, I want to see for myself. Don't give me up because I am in arrears. I will send you some money before long, as times are getting a little better. Fraternally thine,

R. M. CASEY.

WESTERLY, R. I., Sept. 28, 1878.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: Please add my name to the "Declaration of Rights" recently published in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I read "Cupid's Yokes" twice, and, unlike some of your readers, I do not hesitate to give it my unqualified approval; and I only wish that the doctrines therein enunciated could be carried into immediate practice. But whether true or false, there can be no question that the author had not only the right to publish his views to the world, but also to send his pamphlet through the U. S. mail to all who requested him to do so. No one is bound to agree with him if he is in error. I regret exceedingly that my own financial condition is such that I am unable to contribute anything to the Defense Fund, but I cannot believe that any intelligent jury will convict you of the crime for which you are to be tried. Your friend,

JAMES W. STILLMAN.

ADRIAN, MICH., Sept. 14, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Friend: Since the Christian Church, through its minions at the Watkins Convention, has advertised the "Cupid's Yokes" so extensively, several of my neighbors and friends have spoken to me on the subject, and asked me if I had ever seen the work. I told them I had not, but that I had thought of getting one if I could. They said they also would like to have a copy. And now, since you have kindly offered to supply us, I will send you the change, to begin with, for one dozen, as there is that number spoken for at least. I am what is known as a Liberal Friend, or Quaker, having had a birthright membership in the Society of Friends in the spring of 1812, and having been brought up, in my early life, after the strictest order of the sect away down in the land of steady habits. When I read the account of the doings of those ignoramuses and bigots at the Watkins Convention I felt that it was an outrage on our rights. The work may be one that you or I might not want to indorse to the full, yet will that justify us in setting ourselves up as censors over our brother, who may feel that he is discharging his duty on the subject he writes on? Mr. Editor, if the founders of this Government had been actuated by such an intolerant spirit as those ignoramuses at Watkins were, we never could have had such a liberal declaration of sentiment to fall back upon.

J. D. MOORE.

BARABOA, WIS., Sept. 26, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of Aug. 31, is a letter from Mrs. Slenker, calling upon all earnest Liberals and thinkers to open a correspondence with some pious Christian. Good, splendid, just the thing, I ejaculated, after reading her "Open letter to Liberals," and I do hope that all Liberals will read and heed her letter.

I have for several years past held regular correspondence with quite a number of Christians, seldom less than fifteen or twenty. I generally prefer those who are the most radical in their faith; for when I convert one of these they usually bring along a number of the conservative members with them.

You see our Christian friends are much like a flock of sheep; where their leader goes the rest are bound to follow. So if we can get the old buck (parson) we are very sure of the whole flock. Respectfully yours,

J. HASELTINE.

FARMINGTON, UTAH, Sept. 22, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: It is Sunday evening and having a little leisure I thought I would put up the accompanying bill of remittance and order for books, etc. I have just made my yearly excursion to Cache valley and while there sold my "Champions of the Church," so I want another copy, also "Cupid's Yokes." I am very anxious to see what it is that is causing such a flutter and getting you into trouble again. I am as much opposed to anything obscene as any person can well be, but I am satisfied this is not the object of those who are after you, like bloodhounds, so closely; it is not that they are so much concerned about putting down obscenity as they are anxious to use the law on obscenity to put down and crush all discussion and exchange of opinions on subjects anti-orthodox, whether it be on questions religious or otherwise. They want to smother Freethought or Infidelity as they are pleased to term it; they are afraid of its light, it endangers their craft, but they may as well try to put out the light of the sun with a mantle, it is too late; it has got too much of a start. It is very pleasant to push some one before you into danger or trouble instead of facing it yourself, still I feel like saying, go on Bro. Bennett; the prize is yours, and you will get it. I mean to do something for the Defense Fund by the time it will be needed. I want to see "Cupid's Yokes" as I am anxious to indorse (if I can consistently), and add my name to the list of signers of the declaration of rights.

I am yours in earnest for free thought, free speech, free press, and free mail, WALTER WALKER.

PARKERVILLE, N. J., Aug. 14, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: The "Humphrey-Bennett Discussion," was received in good order, and I perused it with great care and find it far more interesting than I really anticipated. It contains a storehouse of logical comparisons and minute researches. Just the book for the inquiring mind, and every person should have one and obtain a vast amount of useful information for the low price of $1.00. It is agreeably surprising to learn that Mr. Humphrey has suffered such a crushing defeat at the hands of our never failing supporter of Liberal truth. Hitherto I have occasionally doubted the sincerity of Infidels in respect for society, but I will no longer be persuaded to suppress my honest convictions but will stand up for THE TRUTH SEEKER and its bold and fearless editor. Yours truly,

T. M. WHITE.

GREENCASTLE, IND., Sept. 8, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: What is the matter with you? are you determined to make a martyr of yourself? It looks to me like you think you will have to go up this time, and you might as well "go for a big hog as a little one." I think, better not violate even a bad law. I don't intend to sacrifice myself for the heathenish, ignorant world. My experience with the world has taught me that nearly all act from their prejudices, and that the world's judgment of a given man's actions are nearly always wrong. They nearly always make him out better or worse than really is right. Well do I know that when one dares to dispute popular beliefs, he is compelled to bear the slurs, the jeers, the misrepresentations and slander of the common herd.

I have worked along until I can send you the amount I owe you. I would like to have a copy of "Cupid's Yokes" also the "Bible Abridged."

I trust that you may come off as well in your present persecution as you did before, though I can scarcely hope for it. I shall be very sorry indeed, to hear of your being sent to prison. With best wishes I subscribe myself your friend for truth and liberty, H. H. MORRISON.

REMARKS.—We would say to Brother Morrison that we have violated no law of the land, but have simply exercised the rights of an American citizen, and what any man in the country ought to exercise.—ED. T. S.

LA HARPE, ILL., Sept. 11, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: We have decided to hold our convention Nov. 8th, 9th, and 10th. Have secured for two of our speakers B. F. Underwood and W. F. Jamieson. Will have our circulars out in a few days. Please give notice of our meeting in THE TRUTH SEEKER for we desire to extend the notice far and wide. I have worked hard to get up the convention and would be sorry to see it a failure. I am receiving, however, some very encouraging letters, so much so that I feel confident it will be a success. By the way I am pleased with the suggestion of Mr. D. Tuttle (one of your correspondents,) and hope some one will invent some little emblem to be worn, and hope every Liberal will wear it. Yours fraternally, S. PALMER.

COLFAX, IND., Sept. 10, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT Dear Sir: About six months ago I was converted from the faith of Christians at a Methodist revival near my residence. Previous to that time, I had never read THE TRUTH SEEKER or any other Liberal paper or Infidel work of any kind. I had heard of Tom Paine and Voltaire, but had never read them. I had been a regular attendant at church where this revival was held for some two years, about that time having moved to this county from near Cincinnati. That revival converted me. There were many more converted at that time, but it was claimed that all but me were converted to the faith of Christianity. These new recruits prayed most earnestly for me to join in with them and come to their Jesus. The old members prayed for me; the backslidden goats who had returned to the fold prayed for me; the women prayed for me. They got hold of me, and shook me from top to bottom. I almost felt tempted to go when the women got hold of me. I then wished that that so-called spirit of Jesus that was in me would let me go along, but superstition would not take hold of me. That heart that God put within me would not let me go, and finally they gave me up as lost. When they found they could not pray me into the church, they prayed for God to take me from their midst, and that aloud and in my presence, but their prayers did not get me in the church, neither did they get me out from their midst. I then began to realize that their prayers were vain words. I think so yet. Many who were then converted to their faith have quit shedding tears for their Jesus. They are not as earnest as they were, but soon again when the hot season is over, they will get up another revival to mend their broken pot of these years. FRED. G. HOLLOWELL.

CHICAGO, ILL., Sept. 11, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Your of 7th inst. at hand. We regret to learn of your indictment, etc., and with Burns (slighty varied) believe that,

> While hell-fire burns for the sake of Jesus,
> Fanatics howl and Comstock squeezes,
> "The sympathy of friends will ease us."

And the sympathy most necessary in a case like yours should be something material.

Comstock and his law have but few friends in Chicago outside the Y. M. C. A. He has met with poor success in his prosecution in the West. Some of the P. O. officials keep a copy of your paper containing a history of Comstock and his doings lying in a conspicuous place when he is here; he is decidedly in bad odor about the Chicago P. O. Chicago would subscribe liberally to a fund for the defense of whoever would effectually dispose of him, get him in prison or otherwise, more for the otherwise.

With our best wishes for a triumphant victory for the right we remain yours, A. COULTER.

NELSON, IND., Sept. 18, 1878.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Friend: Inclosed please find order for $1.50. The dollar please place to my credit for THE TRUTH SEEKER, for the balance send me a copy of "Cupid's Yokes."

I have been a subscriber for your paper ever since you began it in the town of Paris, a few miles from this place, except during the past six or eight weeks, when you took my name from your list because of delinquency. Since that time I have had to borrow it. Now I don't propose to borrow it any longer. Credit me with the dollar, and in a short time I will remit the balance I am due you. Times have been hard and money scarce, and having other debts to pay is my excuse for falling so far behind.

I expect to be a subscriber as long as I live to the glorious TRUTH SEEKER. It grows better as it grows older, and I hope you may be liberally patronized. Now that the sleuth-hounds of the Church are after you again, every Liberal and every friend to your paper ought to exert themselves to double your circulation. I promise you to do all I can. I have been talking to some Liberals in this vicinity who have not been subscribers, and I have the promise of two names in a short time. Yours respectfully,

JOHN POINDEXTER, M.D.

P. S. I have concluded to send thirty-five cents more, for which please send me Lord Amberley's "Life of Jesus," etc., etc. (in paper).

MAUSTON, WIS, Sept. 25, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I am sorry to read the account of your second arrest, but I glory in your spunk, and just so long as the Church and its bigots persecute you, you may depend on my mite, as Mrs. E. D. Slenker says, if it's only 25 cents. This time I send you post office order for $2.50. I want the likeness of Mrs. E. D. Slenker, or "my God ain't she ugly." I have wanted one of her pictures ever since I saw that expression in THE TRUTH SEEKER. Now sir, I want the Trinity, or Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, and six copies of "Cupid's Yokes," as every one I converse with wants to see that obscene book, and so do I. As I can't get a new subscriber so far, I will take the paper for three months to give away to different parties so as to get it into circulation. As I can't quite come up to Deacon Skidmore I'll do the best I can. My wife is not like Deacon Skidmore's spit-fire, but sends her best respects to D. M. Bennett and all the champions of Freethought. My next will contain something for the law fund. I will beg all I can, and give all I can afford to at this time in the fond hope that the Trinity may come out triumphant. I remain your well wisher,

WM. HOLGAT.

BYERS, COL., Oct. 12, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: A few days ago I had the fortune to get hold of a TRUTH SEEKER; am so well pleased, in fact made happy, that at last I found a way to get through this infernal mist of doubt which has bothered me more or less all my life. Please find inclosed $1.00, and forward your paper at once to my address.

I remain very respectfully, C. E. WILDENOW.

CEDAR RAPIDS, IOWA, Sept. 24, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Though you and your human-rights paper, THE TRUTH SEEKER, are comparatively strangers to me, I am glad to state that, after the perusal of one number of your paper, I am convinced that you have but one aim in life, and that is to unshackle the human mind from superstition and mental slavery, and elevate it on the throne of reason that God and nature have destined it to occupy. And though I may differ with many of your Materialistic readers and admirers, I can cheerfully lay all petty differences aside when unwarranted persecutions assail human liberty, and imprisonment for expressing honest thoughts from honest convictions. I think it is high time for liberal minds of all grades or beliefs to come boldly to the front, and unite for action, and have but one aim in view, and that is, freedom of the press, freedom of speech, and an unsectarian government, in fact as in letter. All true humanitarians and lovers of truth and freedom will extend their sympathy and aid to you and your co-workers, who are now passing under the rod of persecution of the Church of the nineteenth century that can be traced through its past history, by the huge cross, the stake, with its green wood and hot fire, and portentious gallows, all as so many headstones pointing to the tombs where the Christian Church has buried the progressive minds of past ages.

Inclosed find $1.00 for TRUTH SEEKER. Send it for three months, with Paine's "Age of Reason," as per your proposition in your last issue. For balance send single photographs of yourself, Mr. Bell, and Miss Tilton. Also please accept my name with $2.00 pledged for the National Defense Fund. You are also at liberty to add my name to the "Declaration of Rights," as it has the right kind of ring in it. I trust that you will keep up good cheer and noble courage; for let me assure you that there are thousands of Spiritualists and liberal minds all over these broad prairies that are unacquainted with you and your noble paper, and need only to be reached to gain their full sympathy and financial aid to carry you through all the dark and foul persecutions that bigots are heaping upon your aged head. I extend to you my most sincere sympathy and best wishes, and trust that truth and right will conquer.

Yours, very truly, A. B. DAVIS.

TOLEDO, OHIO, Sept. 18, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Inclosed find money order for $8.00. Please send me, when convenient, a copy of "The Champions of the Church" and "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers" (for $5.00); also a copy of "Cupid's Yokes" and the "Holy Bible Abridged," and a photograph of the "Holy Trinity of Watkins." Credit me with the balance on subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER.

In your new distress you have my deepest sympathy; but go on with your fearless, outspoken truth; the time is not far distant when every Liberal in the United States will speak your name with pride for the work you have done to deliver humanity from priestcraft and superstition, and in case of distress and persecution the Liberal public will rally en masse to your support. Place my name on the second Roll of Honor for $5.00, which is really more than I can afford. With my best wishes for your future success, I remain, Sincerely yours, F. HILLENKAMP.

DR. H. B. MARTIN AGAIN.

WILKESBARRE, Sept. 28, 1878.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: I notice in your paper for Sept. 14th an article, headed, "If you take away my religion," etc., reported to have been delivered before the "Newark Liberal League," on the 2d of June, by the above named Dr. Martin, a full column of which I see is taken verbatim from an article in the Boston Investigator, vol. 47, No. 49, March 27, 1878, addressed to the Rev. W. R. Jones, Wis., signed "Anxious." Had the Dr. made the usual acknowledgment in such cases, viz., quotation marks, his action might be looked upon with a degree of honor, but as it is it must be pronounced a piece of downright plagiarism.

DETECTIVE.

ROYAL CENTER, IND., Sept. 22, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT: They have you in the harness again, and you may not slip the halter so easily this time as you did when Comstock had his rig on you. They think they have the same hold on you they had on Heywood. I like your grit. Go ahead, and if the Liberals do not back you, I shall be much mistaken in them. Put me down for five dollars on the Defense list, and more, if necessary. Please send me "Cupid's Yokes," "The Holy Bible Abridged," also "The Trinity," or the three last pictures, "The Greenback Labor Songster," also your "Open Letter to Jesus Christ," "Underwood's Prayer," and fifty cents' worth of tracts, and oblige yours for a clear fight for the principles of truth and right. GEO. HENDEE.

KELLOGGSVILLE, O., Sept. 23, 1878.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER:

The Presbyterian Banner discusses the subject of feeble churches, and says that many of them are in such a hopelessly starving condition that they ought to be disbanded. The list of churches shows 260 having on their rolls from 1 to 10 members each; 500 having from 11 to 20; nearly 550 reporting from 21 to 30, and about 400 from 31 to 40—or over 1,700 churches, ranging in membership from 1 to 40.

The recent total eclipse of the sun was regarded by the Pueblo Indians at Taos, New Mexico, as the beginning of some awful disaster. The chief commanded the priests to make the fires on the altars burn brighter, and compelled all the women in the village to run naked through the streets. These measures, he says, were happily effective, for the sun was soon restored to its usual condition.—Clipping.

The benighted old Governor of Ohio has recently followed suit on the Indian plan, and appointed a day of prayer for the yellow fever sufferers—just as the frost was coming. The Governors of Indiana and Kentucky followed suit, and the thing is did; the cool weather followed, and all are convalescing in the stricken districts. This old imbecile Governor-Bishop of Ohio says the greatest honor of his life consists of his having been made President of the Disciples' Sunday-school Institution of the State at large. While Parker Pillsbury in a speech to the workingmen of Cincinnati about a year ago, warned them to keep clear of Sunday-school, i. e., to keep their children out of them, and to keep themselves free from the old political parties, as the Sunday-schools are the nurseries of the churches, while the churches play into the hands of wealth, power, superstition, and tyranny. His speech was a noble one, and has resulted in good.

The new National Greenback party proposes to tax the churches and to effect very many excellent reforms. It is becoming a young giant.

Sunday-schools were first instituted in England by a few benevolent persons who associated themselves together, and each agreed to give a few hours of their time on Sundays to teach the poor children who were not able to attend the established schools, the rudiments of education. But the churches have long since gobbled it and perverted the good intention into a hot-bed of superstition. I am fully in sympathy with you and the cause in all the new developments at Watkins, etc. I am renewing my efforts to help double the subscription list of the good old TRUTH SEEKER, and will do what I can in every way. As ever, etc,

DR. ANDREWS.

CARTHAGE, MO., Sept. 11, 1877.

D. M. BENNETT, ESQ., Dear Brother: Place my name on the National Defense Fund list for $4.00, being $1.00 for each Liberal martyr. I will send this in a short time, and will contribute at least $1.00 for every Liberal arrested. Go on, Brother B. in your brave Freethought utterances and writings. Long live THE TRUTH SEEKER and its noble and brave editor. Yours truly and sincerely,

EBER BUDLONG.

ADRIAN, MICH., Sept. 16, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I have carefully read the "Champions of the Church," and am more than delighted with it. I have lent it to a minister in our city to read. I need not say I sympathize with you; all Liberals do. I hereby pledge you $5.00 for your assistance to fight the fiend Comstock and others. I will double it if necessary. Please send me two "Holy Bible Abridged," one "Sepher Toldoth Jeschu," one "Trinity," and "Cupid's Yokes." Please find one dollar inclosed. Yours in hope of victory,

L. VANDERBURG.

UNLESS in court, you need not tell all the truth; but be sure and let all you tell be truth.

The Question and its Answer.

(Suggested by an old hymn.)

Inscribed to all reformers assailed by despot persecutors, and more especially to the three "indicted" at Watkins, N. Y., August, 1878, by the American Inquisition, alias "Society for the Suppression of Vice," for selling "Cupid's Yokes," an argumentative pamphlet treatise on love, marriage, and propagation; and first of all to Ezra H. Heywood, a cultured gentleman and earnest, honest reformer already "convicted," (1878) in Massachusetts by that institution using the United States Courts; fined, and imprisoned for two years on pretense of obscenity, for writing and sending that work through the U. S. Mails to the chief inquisitor and decoy-spy Anthony Comstock; "convicted," really not for the errors nor "supposed impurities" of the work, but for giving some light to help cure obscenity, expose its experts and check their governmental tyranny and legal robbery; the inquisitor and pure-rake protector Comstock chiefly sustained by the "legal" rakes and robbers whom Heywood had exposed but who dared not show the real cause of their hatred.

Shall I in fear of despots' ban
My spirit's love of truth restrain?
Or spurn each Pharisaic "lord"
And boldly utter freedom's Word?

Awed by the bigots' senseless cry,
Or by their pandering pimps, shall I,
Though prison walls repay my care,
To teach our nature's laws forbear?

Shall I assist th' unholy throng
Whose lies obscene befoul the tongue—
In virtue's name teach youth to see
A shame their origin to be?

When minds thus clogged at knowledge aim
Till passion's fever and inflame,
Shall I increase the dire disease?
Or yield the light which cures and frees?

Let despot forces all enrage,
And falsehood's every art engage.
The manly soul who sees the right
Must o'er his fellows shed his light.

Before our dawning manhood's day
The despots' powers fast melt away,
The open persecution fails,
And false pretense alone prevails.

CALEB S. WEEKS.

Thy Duty.

BY HORACE M. RICHARDS.

If thou canst speak one little word
To cheer thy brother on his way,
Then fearless let thy voice be heard
Perchance 'twill change his night to day.

If thou canst lend a helping hand
To aid his footsteps up the steep,
Then fail thou not, thy angel-band
Will give thee strength, and nearer keep.

If thou canst give one ray of hope,
To him, when sinking in despair,
Perchance 'twill prove a saving rope;
Fail not to do thy duty there.

If thou canst do a kindly deed,
Fail not to act the helper's part,
No matter what thy brother's creed,
He'll feel thy kindness in his heart.

If thou canst lift a fallen one,
Who journey's on in paths of sin,
Be sure in this thy duty's done,
Though thou no earthly crown may win.

If thou thyself grow faint and weak,
And long for rest, and earthly love,
List thou to words the angels speak,
"Thy rest shall be with us above,"

The Two Ports.

BY GRACE L. PARKHURST.

On life's great ocean I am tossed,
No citied lands in view;
All former scenes behind are passed,
Before await the new.

I ask the helmsman to descry
The vistas looming far;
Two varying ports the glass reveals,
Nor walls appear to bar,
Or rocky cliffs with threatening base,
Preclude the entrance fair.

Yet not alike the ports appear,
The one with age is hoar,
And cloistered halls gleam up the way;
Within sits calm the seer,
Serene of look, with radiant eye,
He bids us welcome near.

The other port, less ancient grown,
Is rife with buoyant life;
The vistas bright and fair appear,
Inviting youthful life
To games, to sports, to dance, and song,
Which end in human strife.

The helmsman paused with downcast eye,
Then turned in earnest gaze;
Quoth he, "We near the buoys that lead
To cities here—hard by.
Your choice, me ill becomes to urge,
Yet oft I hear your sighs,
As from great ocean's bosom breaks,
Convulsive, moaning cries."

Then came a voice in dulcet tones,
Sweet as if angel-tongued,
"It matters not where tread the feet,
Or fold the wearied hands,
If in the heart perpetual beat
Love-throbs for human clans.

"Oh, bear not gifts to unknown gods,
But open wide the heart;
Let all the soul in sunshine glow,
Its warmth, its love impart;
Not in the lofty pillared halls,
Nor in the festive throng
Is found the all of joy and peace
Which puts a chant in song.

"But in the quiet walks of life,
Dispensing blessings free,
Is found the truest happiness
Which man below shall see.
Earth's towering peaks in time decay,
Her rocky base gives way;
But love, eternal as the soul,
Will never know decay."

Gen. Butler Writes to the N. Y. Sun.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE SUN, Sir: I cut the following from your paper of this morning:

"He (Butler) is reported as having said at Indianapolis that an irredeemable currency is more easily kept at par than a redeemable currency, and that the old Continental money in this country 'wiped itself out of existence without anybody being loser.'"

Why make me responsible for what I am "reported to have said"? That is not what I did say. I did say substantially as follows:

That Continental money did in its time a good service to the country. It fought the battles of the Revolution, for without it they never could have been fought. It won for us our liberties, for without some such device they could not have been won. Being promises to pay Spanish milled dollars when everybody knew there was not five per cent enough of them in the country, and could not be got here, to pay it, it went down by degrees, and out; but in so doing it distributed the loss over the country. That is to say, the first taker took it for his provisions furnished the army. It fell a portion on his hands. The next taker received it for something else. It fell so much on his hands, and so on till it became valueless, thus distributing the cost of the war as nearly equal as might be among all who handled money, and then went out.

Is there any doubt about these historical facts? I might have added what I will add now, that, having done its work and distributed the expense of the war among the people, it was no loss to anybody, but a gain to all. It differed from our greenback in this, that when that had gone down in the hands of its various holders to thirty cents, we funded it into a gold-bearing bond at par, which made it a loss to all, and a gain only to a few.

I will give you an invariable rule by which you may always know when I am reported correctly: If the report seems to be good sense, that's Butler. If it is "arrant nonsense," that's reporter; although it must be confessed that a reporter trying to compress a two hours' speech, spoken at the rate of one hundred and ten words a minute, into five hundred words, may be well excused if he makes nonsense of some of it.

Respectfully yours, BENJ. F. BUTLER.

[From The Index.]

Letter From Mrs. Denton.

WELLESLEY, MASS., July 26, 1878.

Editor of The Index: The question, as I understand it, is not whether Congress has a right to "regulate the entire postal system of the country," but whether Congress has a right so to regulate that system that, while you may be permitted the use of the mails for sending certain documents safely to their destination, I may be refused their use for sending the same documents, or may be subjected to fine and imprisonment for having sent them. No one will complain when the so-called obscenity-law shall have been made sufficiently definite and impartial, and shall be impartially administered. But it is time to speak (and we have a right to be heard) whenever we find on the statute-books any law that discriminates in favor of theories, or that may be used for silencing discussion of any of the more important questions before the attention of this thoughtful age.

The necessity for the utmost care in the use of the language employed in this discussion I very freely admit, and believe it should be most strenuously insisted upon. I nevertheless see the necessity (and I think you will admit it) for calling things by their right names, whenever this is essential to their proper characterization, or to a correct understanding of the author's idea. That Mr. Heywood would be as ready to avow these sentiments as either you or I, I have not a shadow of a doubt. That it was his purpose to trespass upon the rights of good taste, or of a cultivated sense of propriety, I do not for a moment believe. What I do believe is that, seeing the apathy, the inexcusable indifference of the community, radical as well as conservative, to a subject which must be regarded as of the very first importance in any effort for the regeneration of the race, he attempted to arouse attention to that subject by showing us a measure of the degradation in which we are involved. It may be easy to criticise his choice of language in the attempt to do this. It is not easy to answer his arguments. And with the terrible facts to which he refers everywhere staring us in the face, it is difficult to understand by what method any thinking person can maintain his or her integrity and still ignore the pressing need for this discussion.

Whatever may be said of the remedy proposed by Mr. Heywood, it is sufficiently evident that where the monogamic system of marriage prevails, there exists a class of evils that for thousands of years has defied the wisest legislative efforts of the nations adopting it. And it still defies them. Shall we then be forbidden all inquiry as to the why and wherefore of its existence? It is also evident that in our own time, and in its present form, marriage as a system fails of the high purposes for which it is ostensibly perpetuated. Shall we also be forbidden all inquiry as to the cause or causes of such failure? And can we hope to make such inquiry successful without studying the natural relations of the sexes, their needs, and the conditions of their mutual dependence?

Whether it be true, as intimated in "Cupid's Yokes," that the marriage system, in its present form and with its existing methods, is neither more nor less than a system of gambling supported by law, and as such demoralizing in its immediate tendencies, and ruinous in its prospective results—it is true that so long as it may compel one unloving pair to live a lie, its morality should be questioned and its tendencies discussed as fearlessly as we would question the morality and discuss the tendencies of any other system that may subject us to wrong and outrage. Humanity is above all its institutions, and the rights of society are secondary to those of the individual.

Truly yours,
ELIZABETH M. F. DENTON.

[From The Winsted Press.]

The Champions of the Church.

Editor Winsted Press: I see that thee has advertised D. M. Bennett's "Champions of the Church," and I wish to say to thee and thy readers that I have the book, and have just finished its perusal; and when I have a good thing I always have a desire that all the world shall enjoy it with me. This truly valuable book is certainly all it claims to be, and more too. It takes the old historical champions and portrays their characters so vividly that you feel as if you had seen and known them. You seem to be walking along through the ages when the iron rule of the dreadful Inquisition cursed the world, and fanatical priests, cowled monks, and pompous popes had everything their own way, and, under the cloak and sanction of religion, committed the greatest crimes and enormities the world has ever known. It is not pleasant to read of such heartless, cruel fiends, or to dwell upon the agonies and tortures they inflicted upon poor, helpless, innocent human beings. Nor was it at all agreeable for D. M. Bennett to mentally wade through seas of guilt, crime, and other horrible iniquities, and chronicle them for our benefit. But he did it, and did it well, too, from motives of love, charity, and humanity to his kind. He saw this same terrible spirit of tyranny, bigotry, and oppression still pervading every part of the governmental and social system—fining, imprisoning, blackmailing, and ostracising the purest, noblest, and best citizens of the land—sparing neither age nor sex when they presumed to act, speak, or even think contrary to the old cut-and-dried theological myths and absurdities; and so he endeavored to stem the tide and turn the current of public opinion towards reason, fact, and common sense, by showing up to the world these "Champions of the Church" as they actually were; these three hundred sinful shepherds who were ravenous wolves devouring their own flocks, and liars, thieves, murderers, and Beechers; and, last but not least, Anthony Comstock, dealer in and collector of all manner of obscenity and meanness.

I think any one who carefully reads the book will own he has gotten twice his three dollars' worth from its interesting and instructive pages. The introductory chapter is full of solid meat. It shows the dawn, rise, and progress of all religions, from fetich worship on to Christ worship; compares gods, saviors, and creeds, and shows that a great chain links them all together in one; that if one is revealed all are, and vice versa. The concluding remarks which wind up this highly entertaining and instructive volume of 1,119 pages are a perfect string of sparkling and brilliant gems.

To get up such a book as this requires time, brains, and money, and the man who does a work so truly grand should be aided and encouraged in his efforts to elevate, refine, and purify humanity. The book is a companion piece to "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers." "The Champions" shows us how degrading and debasing is the influence of a bigoted, blind belief in old creeds, fables, and myths, while "The World's Sages" gives us vivid life-sketches of good, true, noble, whole-souled men and women who have labored to elevate, purify, and refine the world, and make it a fit temple for man, its crown and masterpiece.

All honor, then, to D. M. Bennett, whose noble, generous, mild, benevolent countenance beams upon us from the frontispiece of the book. May his shadow never be less, and may he live a long, happy, and useful life—a blessing to himself and to the world.

"Our voices in triumphant song
His merits to proclaim,
And speed to all the world around
The honors of his name."

CHRONIC DISEASES,

Embracing those of the Blood and Nerves, the Diseases of Men, the Diseases of Women, and the various causes, physical and social, leading to them, are plainly treated by that plainest of books, PLAIN HOME TALK, EMBRACING MEDICAL COMMON SENSE—nearly 1,000 pages, 200 illustrations—by DR. E. B. FOOTE, of 120 LEXINGTON AVE., NEW YORK, to whom all letters from the sick should be addressed. In its issue for January 19, 1878, Mr. Bennett's TRUTH SEEKER thus speaks of DR. FOOTE and his medical publications: "We know him (Dr. Foote) personally and intimately, and we say, with all the assurance that knowledge imparts, that he is a man of the highest incentives and motives, whose life has been spent in instructing and improving his fellow-beings by giving such information as is well calculated to enable them to be more healthy, more happy, and to be better and more useful men and women. His medical works possess the highest value, and have been introduced and thoroughly read in hundreds of thousands of families, who, to-day, stand ready to bear willing testimony to the great benefit they have derived from the physiological, hygienic, and moral lessons which he has so ably imparted."

Creed of Christendom;

Its Foundation Contrasted with its Superstructure.

BY W. R. GREG,

Author of "Enigmas of Life," "Literary and Social Judgments," &c.

One vol. Crown, 8vo., with Complete Index. Cloth, $1.50.

"Some twelve years ago, in a London drawing-room, one of our most eminent men of science said: 'Why do not the bishops answer Mr. Greg's Creed of Christendom? They are bound to answer it—if they can.' In the lifetime of the present generation the earliest work at all similar was that of Mr. Charles Hennell, which, in various respects, had great merit; but Mr. Greg, coming later, had the advantage of access to many able German researches, and his work continues the most complete on all sides; to it one may most confidently appeal when assailed by eager Christians with the current commonplaces of their warfare. Since bishops, deans, learned canons, and academic divines do not reply formally to so thorough, clear, and learned a treatise, which has been so long before the public, we have the best of proof attainable that this historical argument—occupying precisely the ground which English academicians have chosen as their own—is unanswerable" (F. W. Newman, on "The New Christology," in Fortnightly Review).

THE BOOK OF THE GENERATION OF JESUS.

WITH PREFACE AND NOTES BY SCHOLASTICUS.

First English Translation

Of the ancient Jewish story of Jesus, who was born at Bethlehem about 106 B. C., being the son of a betrothed maiden named Miriam (Mary) by Joseph Pandera. By the power of a charm stolen from the Holy of Holies he cured lepers, raised the dead, and wrought other miracles. Wherefore he was arrested by the elders of Jerusalem, scourged, crowned with thorns, and by order of the Sanhedrin stoned to death and hanged on the day before the Passover and the Sabbath, in the reign of Queen Alexandra, about the year 75 B. C.

Abstract of the

OF

JEAN MESLIER,

A Roman Catholic priest, who, after a pastoral service of thirty years at Etrepigny and But, in Champagne, France, wholly abjured the Christian dogmas.

EDITED BY VOLTAIRE.

This little work contains very sound reasoning. Its utterances are among the most powerful and convincing. The clergyman gives most excellent reasons why the old dogmas of superstition and error should be discarded.

KIDDER'S SECRETS OF BEE KEEPING.

This book should be in the hands of every bee-keeper in our land, whether he has one swarm of bees or a hundred.

It is a guide to the bee-master, in every branch of the business.

No more losing bees in winter; nor in their flight to the forests in swarming time; nor in their being destroyed by moth millers, or by being robbed by other bees. No more stinging by bees when we go to the hive for honey or for any other purpose.

In fact the book shows how all losses and trouble with our bees can be successfully overcome and remedied.

And on the other hand it will instruct any one how they can keep bees with great profit, and with but a small investment.

This book contains more matter than any other book that sells for one dollar and fifty cents.

But in order to have a rapid sale and place the book within the reach of all, the publisher proposes to sell the book at the very low price of 75 cents bound, paper covers 50 cents.

Christianity and Infidelity

A JOINT DISCUSSION BETWEEN

REV. G. H. HUMPHREY, Presb't'n Clergyman

OF NEW YORK, AND

D. M. BENNETT, Editor of The Truth Seeker

It was conducted in the columns of The Truth Seeker, a letter alternately from each contestant appearing each week, beginning April 1, 1877, and closing Sept. 29, 1877, thus continuing just six months, giving thirteen letters from Humphrey and thirteen replies by Bennett.

The subjects discussed were as follows:

PART I.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to American Liberty.

PART II.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to Learning and Science.

PART III.—Is there a stronger probability that the Bible is divine than that Infidelity is true?

The discussion has excited a large share of interest, both among believers and unbelievers: and as both sides are fairly presented, it is suited to readers of all shades of opinion.

The New York Advocate, a paper having a very extensive circulation, in speaking of the volume, says, "Perhaps a more able and exhaustive presentation of both sides of the great questions which have agitated the civilized world for centuries has never been made. At any rate, in this volume will be found a perfect magazine or storehouse of arguments, pro and con, which every intelligent man and woman should peruse with candor and with an earnest desire to arrive at sound conclusions on themes of the highest importance to all mankind. . . Light is what we need. Let the controversies proceed. Let the blows descend upon the error-dispelling anvil. Let the sparks fly in all directions from the heated steel. The truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, is what the people demand on all the great questions of the day, whether of Finance, Science, Politics, or Religion, and discussion will elicit it." Let every person who feels the slightest interest in theological questions, whether on one side or the other, read the Humphrey-Bennett Discussion."

DR. LYON'S Hygeian Home is at Springfield, Mo. See adv. in May Nos. TRUTH SEEKER. 13!25 Resp'y. J. S. LYON.

The distinguished physician for all PRIVATE CHRONIC and SEXUAL DISEASES, is without any exception the greatest living practitioner of the age. The thousands of cures he is performing annually substantiate this fact. He has patients in every State of the Union and in the British Provinces. Every reader of this who has any affection of the Head, Throat, Lungs, Heart, Stomach, Liver, Kidneys, Bladder Bowels, Womb, Genital Organs, Rheumatic or Neuralgic Difficulties, or Eruptions of the Skin, Blood Impurities, Tumors, Cancers, or any Nervous Affections or Diseases of the Eye or Ear, are invited to write to Dr. Fellows, whose charges are extremely low, so that those in most humble circumstances in life can avail themselves of his valuable services. The Doctor's crowning medical achievement has been in the discovery of an EXTERNAL or OUTSIDE APPLICATION for the permanent cure of SPERMATORRHŒA and IMPOTENCY, as the result of self-abuse in youth and sexual excesses in mature years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Powers, etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy. Dr. Fellows has prescribed his EXTERNAL REMEDY for 1,100 cases without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the Insane Asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others on the verge of Consumption, while others again had become Foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

Address, with stamp, Vineland, New Jersey, where Dr. R. P. Fellows is permanently located, and obtain his PRIVATE and other CIRCULARS, with cures SWORN TO, which is irrefutable testimony to the Doctor's unprecedented success in treating all the diseases here named. TERMS EXTREMELY LOW IN ALL CASES. WRITE YOUR ADDRESS PLAINLY.

(From the Rock Mountain Herald.)

Gems of Thought.

To see what is right and not do it is want of courage.

The future destiny of the child is always the work of the mother.

The true friend restrains you from vice and encourages you in virtue.

These are some who never would have loved if they never had heard it spoken of.

The test of extraordinary merit is to see those who envy it, the most obliged to praise it.

To establish ourselves in the world, we do everything to appear as if we were established.

Few are sufficiently wise to prefer censure which is useful to praise which is treacherous.

The duration of our passions is no more dependent upon us than the duration of our life.

As a solid rock is not shaken by the wind, wise people falter not amidst blame and praise. —Anon.

In reflecting, in life, in conversation, in study, I never forget the supreme end, Reason.—Buddha.

The flatterer may be known though professing friendship; he approves your virtues and he approves your vices.

Whoever is in a hurry shows that the thing he is about is too big for him. Haste and hurry are two different things.

Though he be in poverty, though of lowly birth and uncouth form, kings shall bend before the wise thinker.—Anon.

Applause waits on success. The fickle multitude, like the light straw that floats along the stream, glide with the current still, and follow fortune.

There is nothing too difficult to be obtained by those who, before they act, reflect well themselves, and thoroughly consult with chosen friends.—Anon.

Better the desert brake for a home, herbs for food, foliage for raiment, grass for a couch, and wild creatures for companions, than to herd with the base and mean.

If you neglect the education of your daughters, you are preparing shame for your own family and unhappiness for the houses into which they may enter.—Anon.

Hold faithfulness and sincerity as first principles. The commander of the forces of a large state may be carried off, but the will of even a common man cannot be taken from him.

Good words do more than hard speeches; as the sunbeams without any noise will make the traveler take off his cloak, which all the blustering winds could not do, but only make him bind it closer to him.

Some eyes threaten like a loaded and leveled pistol, and others are as insulting as hissing or kicking; some have no more expression than blueberries, while others are as deep as a well which you can fall into.

Vishnu spake, "O Bal! take thy choice: with five wise men shalt thou enter hell, or with five fools pass into paradise." Gladly answered Bal, "Give me, O Lord, hell with the wise; for that is heaven where the wise dwell, and folly would make of heaven itself a hell."—A Fable.

How rich in love and charity are the deeds of those who never let the left hand know what the right hand doeth; like him whose central thought is in harmony with the great universal Heart, extending sympathy to all and withholding naught that can be of possible benefit to even a single soul.—Lessie N. Goodell.

Whoso seeketh wisdom shall have no great travail; for he shall find her sitting at his door. She goeth about seeking such as are worthy of her, showeth herself favorably to them in the highways, and meeteth them in every thought. Love is the keeping of her laws. The multitude of the wise is the welfare of the world.—Anon.

Jesus came and abolished the law of Moses; Mohammed followed him and introduced his five prayers a day. The followers of both of these say that after their prophet no other is to be expected, and they occupy themselves talking thus idly from morning to evening. But meanwhile tell me, since you are living under one of these dispensations, do you enjoy more than others, or less, the sun and moon?—Sacred Anthology.

It is just as necessary to clothe the mind with good and useful education as it is to clothe the body with good, warm, comfortable clothing. Compulsory education is just as much, if not more, a subject that should be made controllable by law as compulsory clothing. The day will come when a naked mind will be far more abhorrent to all right-thinking people than a naked body. The mind is the real man, and to clothe it well, with good thoughts and pure truth and wisdom, should be the aim of all social, moral, and civil law.—Mrs. E. D. Slenker.

Animal form is a necessary result of the constitution of the universe, and animal strength, or "brute force," is a necessary result of animal form. The one is as inevitable as the other, and both are manifestations of the eternal force of the eternal universe. If that force be "God," then God is in all and through all. If it be "law," then law is omnipresent. If it be "intelligence," then intelligence must be universal. Take it how we will or by whatsoever name we may, either all is God or there is none. There is no "brute" force in the world, but all manifestations, good and bad, high and low, vulgar and virtuous, alike are traceable to the Eternal Necessity under which all things are as they are, we know not why or how.—Charles Ellis.

How often do we find that a man's better half gives him no quarter!

Now spiet watermelon-seeds at your girl and try to put her eyes out.

Judging by the crops, nature doesn't think over-production an evil.

"What ails your eyes, Bob?" "Nothing—only I told a fellow he lied."

Paradoxical.—"High words" only means, in most cases, "low language."

"All gone to the dogs!" he explained, when asked how his sheep turned out.

The mountain's brow is usually close to the mountain snows on mountain high.

Detroit has an "Applepie street," and the upper crust doesn't live on it, either.

Most people are like eggs—too phull of themselves to hold ennything else.—Josh Billings.

A Baltimore man has invented a new paper collar, which he calls the Worm, because it will turn.

A man may get mad and strike at a flea with a crowbar, but he's always sorry for it afterwards.

First irate female—"I'd hate to be in your shoes!" Second ditto—"You could not get into them."

Irish advertisement: "Purse lost by a poor woman who has a sick child containing 13s. and a letter."

"Tom, what in the world put matrimony into your head?" "Well, the fact is, Joe, I was getting short of shirts."

A barefoot Syracuse girl kicked a burglar out of a house, and an observing mule went behind the barn and wept.

Athletic sports for ladies: Jumping at conclusions; walking around a subject; running through a novel; skipping full descriptions.

A boarding-house mistress, like the rest of us, has her weak and strong points—the weak being her coffee, and her strong point the butter.

What kind of letters does a grocer deal in? Well, he deals in Ts, Y Ns, crack Rs, match Ss, sometimes S Ns and Ps, and grocer Es of all kinds.

He was from the country, and he came to town for the first time. As he looked at the telegraph wires he said, "Why do you make your wire fence so high?"

A Michigan widow recently hid her cow away under the hay to save it from the tax collector. This may be called a genuine case of "cow-hiding by a female."

Mississippi judge was just saying that no one but a coward would carry a pistol, when his own fell from his pocket, was discharged, and the bullet hit a lawyer in the leg.

"Mariah! Mariah! please let me in," said a man to his wife, who was looking out of the window watching him trying to open the door with a toothpick; "I'sh tread on my key and it's all flattened out."

"You will observe," said the host, as he showed a visitor through the house—"you will observe that we have two halls." "Yes," said the guest—he was a book-keeper—"I am glad to see you live on the double-entry plan."

"Can that horse run fast?" asked a boy of a milkman the other morning. "No, sonny," replied the purveyor of aqueous lacteal fluid. "He can't run very fast, but he can stand the fastest of any horse ever you saw."

Two men jostle each other on the street, exchange words, and take to pummeling each other lustily. "Gentlemen, gentlemen," cried a third, rushing between them, "why do you pound each other thus? Have you no wives at home?"

Sunday at Home.—Wife: "Good-by, Dick; I'm going to church. Now, promise me you won't play the flute."

Anti-Sabbatarian husband: "Pooh! why not?"

Wife: "Well, Dick, the new cook has come, and she might be shocked, you know."

No Monopoly.—She (bewitchingly): "Oh, I'm so glad you're going to see me to my carriage, Mr. Brown." He (flattered): "Indeed! and may I ask why?" She: "Oh, because the girls are so jealous, and I want to prove that I do not monopolize all the good-looking men." Brown satisfied; but not so happy as he expected to be.

"I don't care much for a quiet baby, but I dote on a squalling one," said an old bachelor. "Why, how strange!" admiringly chorused all the mothers present. "Not at all," responded the bachelor; "because, you see, as soon as a child begins to squall it's always taken from the room."

When a Woman Will, etc.—A tall, slim-waisted woman, aged forty, called at the Brighton House, Detroit, and demanded to be registered as a voter. When politely informed that she didn't belong to the voting sex, she struck the table with her fist, upset a bottle of ink, and said, "I'll vote if it takes me a thousand years!" And she'll keep her word.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

DEVOTED TO SCIENCE, MORALS, FREETHOUGHT AND HUMAN HAPPINESS

Vol. 5. No. 41. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT.} New York, Saturday, October 12, 1878. {SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY.} $3 per Year.

Notes and Clippings.

LANGUAGE came into the world during Adam and Eve's first quarrel, when one word brought on another.

THE township of Ortali, Italy, has sunk twelve to fifteen feet below the ordinary level, and the inhabitants hav deserted the toppling houses.

MEMPHIS is now the Niobe of Southern cities; its population of 40,000 only two months ago has been reduced to 2,500 whites, and 6,000 Africans.

COL. INGERSOLL lectured in this city on the 7th to a crowded house. Subject, "Robert Burns." Though very radical, his lecture was warmly received.

BROTHER KIMBALL had hard luck trying to raise an $8,000 debt of the Swampscott (Mass.) Baptist Church; he raised $400 after working beyond midnight.

THE grand prize of 2,500 francs, offered by the Orientalist Congress for the best essay on the different phases of Aryan civilization in India, has been awarded to Dr. Immer of Germany.

THE Ohio Methodist Conference is considering the conduct of the Rev. Mr. Spencer of Athens, who frankly confesses that seeing Miss Mamie Welsh asleep, he kissed her until she awoke and screamed.

THE dying request of Col. J. Lawrence Smith, a Kentucky lawyer of considerable eminence, was that no funeral sermon be preached over his remains and no resolutions passed by the bar.

THE talk in St. Louis, Mich., is about Stephen Dodge, an exhorter, and one of the pioneers of Gratiot County, who has abandoned his wife and children, and has eloped with an inmate of the poorhouse.

A CHURCH in Philadelphia announces "The Lord's Supper" for Sunday morning, and "An Oyster Supper" for Wednesday evening. No irreverence is intended, yet the juxtaposition of these two suppers has a curious appearance in the advertisement.

THE last car festival at Juggernaut was a miserable failure. There were no large contributions by devotees, and the Rani, mother of the banished Rajah of Puri, had to bear all the expenses. Thus the gods are losing their influence in this little world.

A HORSE that had for years been kept by a gentleman of Manchester, N. H., was at length sold to a farmer who lived thirty miles away. The horse did not seem satisfied with its new quarters, and after a few months was missing. It was homesick, and it made its way back into the stable it had so long occupied.

BRO. NATHAN KANE attended a revival meeting near Culpepper, Va., and was singing songs and hymns and spiritual songs out of a hymn-book which Deacon Lewis Tyman wanted. Deacon Tyman drew his trusty razor, and the pastor, who had been unable to prevent the discussion, will conduct Bro. Kane's funeral.

DAVID WHITMER is in possession of the original manuscript of the "Book of Mormon," and Elders Pratt and Smith of the Mormon Church have just been to his home, in Richmond, Mo., to secure the book. They urged that it ought to be deposited for safe keeping in Salt Lake City, and offered to buy it; but Whitmer, who has kept it for nearly half a century, refuses to give it up.

THE people who attended a recent Welsh Baptist Association held among the mountains of Pennsylvania, showed a most extraordinary capacity for listening to sermons. Though the session lasted only three days, twenty-two sermons were preached. At some of the services three sermons were preached without intermission, and the majority of the people stayed awake during the whole course.

THE frequent mysterious burning of haystacks and farmers' buildings has led to the discovery that they are set on fire by wasps nests, and that the nests are ignited by spontaneous combustion. This is produced by the chemical action of the wax in contact with the paper-like substance of which the nest is composed, a comparatively small access of oxygen being sufficient to make it burst forth in a blaze.

PROF. BRIGHAM BISHOP'S spiritualistic exhibition in San Francisco was awkwardly interrupted. He professed to discern the thoughts of a man through a wire; but a skeptic arose and offered him $100 if he would succeed with anybody not possibly a confederate. Next, a materialized spirit was shown; but an energetic member of the committee exposed it as the Professor's wife. Bishop made about $600 by the show.

ONLY ONE OF A FAMILY LEFT.—A boy came up in the Picayune office to insert a death notice last night. He said to the gentleman having charge of the advertising department: "Another one gone; that makes eight." "What do you mean?" asked the gentleman. The boy answered: "I mean that is the eighth one of my family that has died—five brothers and three sisters. I wonder who will come next?" "How many are left?" "Only me."—N. O. Picayune.

METHODIST clergymen in Chicago are much concerned about those of their brethren who run for office. At a spirited discussion of the question of ministerial officeholding, it was unanimously decided that the vows of the ministry disqualified a man from holding political office. The assertion was freely made that politicians take hold of ministers only to make fools of them, and run them for office only to defeat them.

HUMAN SYMPATHY FOUND.—A lady going to see a sick friend heard her name called. Turning, she saw a slender girl in mourning advancing towards her. As the child came nearer the lady recognized in her the daughter of a man who died the day before near the city. The little girl threw her arms about the lady, and, sobbing, said: "You aren't afraid of me, are you?" "No, my dear," was the soothing reply. "Everybody else is," said the poor child. "They won't come near me because papa died of the fever, and we were with him, I and mamma."—Memphis Avalanche.

A MEMPHIS MAGDALEN.—Annie Cook, who kept the noted demi-monde establishment, the Mansion House, has discharged all her female inmates, and is taking yellow fever patients in her elegantly furnished rooms. Being herself an expert in the management of the disease, she is personally superintending the nursing of all the patients. One, we learn, has already convalesced in that establishment. Later.—Annie Cook, the woman who, after a long life of shame, ventured all she had of life and property for the sick, died yesterday morning at 7 o'clock of yellow fever, which she contracted while nursing her patients.—Memphis Appeal.

THE Spiritualistic Eddys have not been a happy family since their performances in Spirit Vale, Vt., brought them into notoriety. Barns belonging to different members have been mysteriously burned, and about a year ago Horatio Eddy and Stephen Baird, his brother-in-law, quarreled with and gave Mary Eddy Huntoon and her husband a serious beating. The Huntoons sued their assailants for $5,000 damages, and the trial has just been held. All the Eddys but William, who is keeping out of the state to escape prosecution on the charge of bigamy, were present, and the reputations of the contending parties were vigorously assailed. The jury gave Mr. and Mrs. Huntoon a verdict of $32.

PRESIDENT WHITE of Cornell College, on returning from the Paris Exhibition, says that we excelled in the most diverse departments. Our art workmanship, agricultural implements, common school system, and beer commanded praise and prizes. In advanced and technical education, he thinks, we hav something to learn of the French. A new school of high instruction in Paris is that of political science where history and governmental science are taught. Mr. White was struck with the advance in all the European universities in teaching natural science, and is convinced that the old English universities, as reformed, are destined to outstrip the German.

A PIOUS FABRICATION.—The following story was recently written by the Rev. Matthew Hale Smith: "One of our pastors sat in his parlor one afternoon. A lady was introduced. She came to talk, she said, on the subject of religion. A friend was anxious about her soul. She had difficulties, and the visitor stated what they were. The pastor gave her advice, and said in return: 'To what church do you belong?' 'I belong to no church,' was the response. 'I am an actress, and I do not suppose that any church would receive me.' 'Why, then, do you take so much interest in your friend?' 'My friend is anxious about her soul, and I am desirious to lead her to Jesus, if I can, though I may not be worthy myself.'" Mr. Smith added that the actress was Miss Clara Morris, but Miss Morris writes to the Dramatic News: "The whole thing is an unmitigated lie. I never had such an interview. I cannot rest under such an outrage."

VARIOUS FACTS OF INTEREST.—The latest census shows the population of Japan to be 34,338,404, a steady and large increase since 1875. The fifth publication of Behm and Wagner's well-known "Population of the Earth" makes the number of the earth's human inhabitants for the current year 1,439,145,300, an increase of 15,000,000 over the estimate of last year. The increase is attributed partly to natural growth, partly to exact knowledge due to recent censuses. The distribution of the population among the grand geographical divisions is as follows: Europe, 312,398,480; Asia, 831,000,000; Africa, 205,219,500; Australia and Polynesia, 4,411,300; America, 86,116,000. The annual production of the sugar of the world has been approximately calculated as follows: Bengal, China, and Siam, 300,000,000 lbs.; British Colonies, 440,000,000 lbs.; Spanish Colonies, 470,000,000 lbs.; Dutch Colonies, 160,000,000 lbs.; Swedish and Danish Colonies, 20,000,000 lbs.; French Colonies, 160,000,000 lbs.; France (beet), 360,000,000 lbs.; Brazil, 150,000,000 lbs.; Zollverein (beet), 550,000,000 lbs.; Austria (beet), 178,000,000 lbs.; Russia (beet), 100,000,000 lbs.; Italy and Belgium (beet), 200,000,000 lbs.; all other sources, including the United States, 400,000,000 lbs.; total 3,420,000,000 lbs. The annual consumption of sugar per head by different nations varies very considerably, as may be seen by the following figures, based on official data: In the United States, 33 lbs. per head; England, 30; Scotland, 30; Holland, 16; Ireland, 5; Belgium, 6; France, 6.66; Spain, 6.24; Switzerland, 5; Portugal, 5; Denmark, 5; Poland, 5; Prussia (Zollverein), 10; Norway and Sweden, 9; Italy, 2; Austria, 2; Russia, 1. Surely there must be something wrong in the statistics that make the average Englishman eat more than four times more sugar than a Frenchman.

STRANGE NEWS FROM WESTERN MASSACHUSETTS.—As the traveler journeys through the four western counties of Massachusetts, his eye is caught at every turn by the white church steeple, glistening in the sunlight. It is a constant and characteristic feature of the landscape. We forget how many of these steeples can be seen from the top of Mount Holyoke on a clear afternoon; but the count has been made, and the total is an impressive figure. As a rule they are not models of architecture, but their quaint homeliness is not without a charm of its own. Beholding them, the visitor from abroad feels that he is indeed among the "steepled hills" of which all good Yankees sing on Thanksgiving and Fast Day. The steeples are still there, but where is the ancient piety that reared them? Here in a well-known New England newspaper we find a letter from West Cummington. The writer reports that one of the two village churches is now rarely opened, save when a stray Spiritualist lecturer comes along, and then goes on to say what follows: "There is one thing which strikes an observer with force—the deadness of religious enterprise in the midst of an abounding population. It is safe to say that not one farmer in three attends church in this valley. The great majority of them spend their Sundays on their farms. As a consequence, one of the churches is virtually dead, the others live a languid, feeble existence; while common, and no doubt well-founded, report exhibits a sad state of domestic morals. Several couples are living together in the village or its neighborhood in defiance of our marriage laws and of decent public opinion. There is plenty of work to be done here by a church or churches that dare to deal with living moral questions." It is of a western Massachusetts town that these things are written; a town which, no doubt, has heard Jonathan Edwards preach, and in time past has sent out missionaries from Williams College and missionaries' wives from Mt. Holyoke Seminary to convert the heathen. Now it is itself relapsing into heathenism, or more properly into an era of good common sense.

SPAIN has been visited by the yellow fever.

A SLIGHT shock of earthquake was felt along the Hudson on the 4th.

OLE BULL, the celebrated violinist has arrived in this country.

THE business part of Palestine, Texas, was burned on the 3d. Loss, $150,000.

THE Maybury Flouring Mills, of New Orleans, were destroyed by fire on the 6th.

PRESIDENT HAYES visited the Government buildings in this city last week.

THE Government has issued 40,000 rations to the starving poor of New Orleans.

THE Grand Jury has declared the Metropolitan Elevated Railroad of this city a nuisance.

CYRILLE DION, the celebrated billiard champion, is dead; as is also the King of Burmah.

THE last wire of the main strands of the East River Suspension Bridge has been run across.

THE Passaic Rolling Mills, of Paterson, N. J. were burned on Saturday night last. Loss, $75,000.

ABOUT fifty Cuban refugees and their families sailed from this port for Havana on last Saturday.

EIGHT prisoners broke from the Camden, N. J. jail, a short time ago, and made good their escape.

AN express train ran into a freight train on Grand Trunk Railway of Canada on the 3d. One man killed.

A WOMAN in Brooklyn has sued a church in that city for $10 000 for damages caused by a fall in front of the church.

DR. PETERMAN, of Germany, the foremost geographer of the age, committed suicide, a few days ago, by hanging.

THE Vanderbilt will case still drags through The courts. It has been discovered that the Commodore was a Spiritualist.

DEAN STANLEY, the celebrated Church of England dignitary, who is now on a visit to this country, favored the New Yorkers with a sermon on Sunday last.

JOSEPH PARTELLO, a Washington marksman, has performed the wonderful feat of making fifteen consecutive bull's-eye shots at 1,000 yards. In forty-five shots he scored 124 out of a possible 125.

ONE good Christian shot another good Christian while attending church service in Franklinville, Md., a few days ago. Cause, one good Christian ruined and deserted the sister of the other good Christian.

THE City of Glasgow Bank, of Glasgow, Scotland, has failed for $50,000,000, dragging down many business firms and smaller banks with it. Also an East India banking firm, of London, has failed for several million dollars.

THE yellow fever is still making fearful ravages in the South. It is said that in New Orleans not a house can be found that has not been visited by the fever. The weather in the afflicted districts is growing cooler, and a change for the better is expected.

A STOWAWAY was discovered, unconscious and almost dead, under the main hatch of an English steamer on her arrival at this port a few days ago. He had secreted himself in the vessel in Liverpool, and had been twelve days without food or water, and almost without air.

THE Cheyennes are committing terrible outrages in Decatur Co., Kansas. Every resident for twelve miles along the Larpa Creek has been plundered, and many of the settlers killed. Several bands of Sioux hav left their reservations in Dakota, and it is feared they will join the Cheyennes and make a descent on the Black Hills.

THE negroes on the island of Santa Cruz, West Indies, are in a state of insurrection. They hav burned the town of Frederickstadt, destroyed many plantations, and murdered several of the leading planters. The insurrection originated through labor troubles. English, French, and American men-of-war are on the way to the island to protect the resident foreigners.

The Darwins.

BY ELMINA D. SLENKER.

CHAPTER XV.—CONTINUED.

"But here is the letter I was going to read," continued Rose, brushing away her tears and bravely subduing her grief, that she might help to make bright the passing hours to her companions, and in the act becoming herself interested, and for the time forgetful of her sorrows.

She unfolded the letter, and read as follows:

"JONESBORO, TENN.

"MY DEAR ROSE: I have turned over another leaf in the book of my life, and love, hope, and joy flash out from its pages. You will be surprised to hear that I am to be married. Yes, I, who had expected to be an outcast, as it were, all my life, am beloved by a good, true, and noble man—aye, and respected and honored, too. He tells me that he does not think an iota less of me for what I have done and suffered. He says a Rose is no less sweet to him because another has inhaled its fragrance; that my beauty is no less precious to him because another once praised it, or my caresses less charming and sweet because I once gave them to another; that so long as I love and respect him and do my duty in life henceforth, it matters not who has shared the past with me. That he loves me is certain; that I worship him I am no less sure. He says he has seen enough of me to know that my soul is pure, and all my impulses are for good; that even the trial I have passed through has but refined, purified, and ennobled me, and I really think it has. I feel as if I had come through fire, and all the dross of evil passion and sinful selfishness had fallen off from me forever. I feel that I am even worthy of him, though it surprises me that he thinks so; for most men are so scrupulous concerning a woman's virtue, as they call it—just as if an honest, pure soul could ever tarnish any woman's real goodness! Oh! I am glad, so glad, for my little Rose that she has a father; for he has legally adopted her, and she, as well as myself, will bear his name—Franklin; yes, that honored name, the name of the good old philosopher, will soon be mine, as it is already little Rose Darwin's—your namesake, yours by special request. Oh! darling Rose, precious friend! you can never know how I wept for joy when I read your kind, sensible, practical, loving, tender letter in reply to the one announcing to you my misfortune. 'Name her Rose—I ask it as a special favor—Rose Darwin.' I read the words over and over, till they sank in a sweet soothing way down into my soul; and oh! how I blessed you, darling, for that gentle imperativeness that told me you still felt that I was worthy to be your friend! Rose Darwin Franklin: may she be an honor to the name that honors her.

"But I haven't told you how or where we met—Horace Franklin and I. When Rose was six weeks old, I received a letter from my Aunt Celia in Jonesboro asking me to spend some months with her, as she was a lone woman and wanted to take some boarders, and thought it proper to have the company of some woman, and more pleasant, too. I might have passed there as a young widow, but I scorned to be anything but my real self, and so I let Aunt Celia tell all who had need to know it my simple story, and somehow I believe I stood none the less fair on that account. I was at once taken into society and well treated everywhere. Aunt Celia says it was because I was really intelligent, interesting, and attractive, and naturally modest and well appearing. Anyhow, I soon began to enjoy myself and feel as if a great load had been lifted from my spirit. My baby is a general favorite, and Aunt Celia almost worships it. Our first boarder was Horace Franklin; he was an invalid, just recovering from a long illness, and needed a great deal of attention and amusing. I am a good reader, you know, and I used to read for hours to him. One day he asked me if I had ever read any Infidel papers. I said no, but I had once known an Infidel family, and then I told him all about 'the Darwins,' and about your naming my Rose. He listened with great interest, and said, 'If Rose was not married I don't know but I'd try to get her. You have certainly pictured her as one of earth's angels.' When I was through telling him of 'you uns,' he said, 'Well, since you love Infidels, I presume you are not afraid to read what they say on paper.' 'Oh, no,' said I; 'I've gotten bravely over my penchant for piety since I was so deceived by one of God's own mouthpieces. I tell you, Mr. Franklin, I have done a world of thinking of late, and when I found all my prayers, pleadings, and agonizings to my Maker, my Father, and best friend—as I then termed what I called God—were of no avail to either bring my lover back to me or take from me the shame of what was called a dishonorable motherhood, I lost faith in any God at all. I knew I was really pure and innocent of all intentional sin; that I had been seduced from the right by one old in the ways of iniquity, and yet bearing on his brow the honors of years of effectual labor in the vineyard of the Lord. If so bad a man could be a beloved brother in the Church, I wanted no lot or parcel in it. I am ripe now for conversion to any belief that is true and reasonable. So if you want me to read Infidelity, I am ready to do so.' 'Go, then, and bring me that package of papers that came to-day. I've been sick all the season, you know, and have got behindhand in my reading.' I took him the papers, and he opened them, ran them over, and, showing me a "Letter from the Devil,' said, 'Please read that first. This is where I left off, and I'm sure you will appreciate it, for it is full of sound sense, as well as wit and humor.'

"You remember it, Rose, of course—where Jah and Luce start out with their big bags to go to opposite ends of space and fill them with nothing, and meet again midway and mix the two bags of nothing continually and unceasingly till a thin, attenuated something is produced. Oh, I never realized before how ridiculous the idea was of making all that is from nothing.

"We read that pile of TRUTH SEEKERS—or I read while he talked and commented—day after day, till the writers all seemed special friends.

"I guess you will think I've struck up a sudden match, Rose; but remember we have been together all the time for six weeks, save the few hours devoted to sleep, or when I was busy in some other part of the house. I was installed as hired nurse for him, you see; so I was in a situation where it was my business to be with him, and business soon became a pleasure, and the pleasure is now my heart's purest delight. He is so he can take short walks in the yard, and says in a few days we will ride out to his residence in the country, some two miles distant. He owns a nice house and farm, and we shall be—oh! so happy. Aunt Celia is to live with us, and we will be a nice family circle. He has a nephew three years old that he has adopted, and this boy will be a good playmate for little Rose. If only auntie could find a suitable companion, how complete would all our arrangements be! But she says she will never marry; that she intends some day to have a little home of her own, and choose some good woman to share it with her. And Horace says that is next best to being married; that a lone life is apt to be a selfish life; that to divide our hearts and homes with many is to make us generous in disposition, charitable in thought, and gentle, loving, and kind in our natures.

"Oh, yes, I am happy, dear Rose, and my future is full of bright prospects and golden opportunities. I hope I shall improve them and make glad and joyous the home of the man who has put his happiness in my keeping. It is a responsible position, dear Rose, to assume the happiness of a household as a wife must do. You realize this, I know, by all you have written me; and I do, too. But I shall strive, as woman never strove yet, to do my full duty to him, to myself, and to our children, our household, and our neighbors. How wide one's influence is! How much we can do for good or for ill! 'May you be happy' is only a wish; but to try and create happiness for others—ah! that is life as it should be.

"Good-bye, darling. I know that you rejoice with me in my love and my hopes.

"I am, as ever, yours truly, EMMA."

"Oh, I am so glad," said Myra. "I have so pitied that poor girl. But I see she is not made of that soft, yielding, namby-pamby nature that at the first rough blast of fortune sinks into helpless, tearful grief and lamentation; that gives up all because one venture has failed. Good for her! I glory in one woman who has sense enough to be happy even under a ban; and I rejoice to find that rara avis, a man who can esteem a woman all the same after another has cast her away as a worthless, neglected, crushed flower, whose perfume he had inhaled till weary of it; then it was carelessly dropped and forgotten. I know Emma will make a better wife and mother than half the girls will whom the world thinks her betters. She will win respect and honor, too, and be everywhere loved and admired for her goodness and plain, practical common sense. All this I prophesy for her, and you know I am something of a prophet, girls, and you will see this one fulfilled to the letter."

"I shall tell her of your kind prophecy when I answer this," said Rose, smiling and patting her friend on her shoulder. "It will help her to do battle with much that will inevitably come upon one in her peculiar position. A word of appreciation and encouragement is of great assistance to one who struggles under difficulties and the frowns of Mrs. Grundy."

M. FRITZ, in Les Mondes, thus defines the principal zone of the aurora borealis: It begins at Barrow Point, latitude 73° north, on the northern coast of North America, passes over Lake Great Bear toward Hudson Bay, which it crosses in 60° north latitude, sweeps near Nain, on the coast of Labrador, turns to the south of Cape Farewell, goes between Iceland and the Faroe Isles, approaches North Cape, rounds Nova Zembla and Cape Tscheljuskin, nearing the coast of Asia at the bay of Nijni Holimsk, and lastly, returns to Point Barrow. M. Fritz holds that the appearance of local aurora is unfavorable to the hypothesis which places this light among cosmic phenomena.

After speaking of the services of Gerbert [Sylvester II.], the same writer says, it was not to his genius alone that he was indebted for the "knowledge with which he began to enlighten the European provinces; he had derived a part of his erudition, particularly in physic, mathematics, and philosophy, from the writings and instruction of the Arabians who were settled in Spain. Thither he had repaired in pursuit of knowledge, and had spent some time in the seminaries of learning at Cordova and Seville, with a view of hearing the Arabian doctors; and it was perhaps by his example that the Europeans were directed and engaged to have recourse to this source of instruction in after times, for it is undeniably certain that from the time of Gerbert, such of the European Christians as were ambitious of making any considerable progress in physic, arithmetic, geometry, or philosophy, entertained the most eager and impatient desire of receiving instruction from the writings of the Arabian philosophers who had founded schools in several parts of Spain and Italy. Hence it was that the most celebrated productions of these doctors were translated into Latin; their tenets and systems were adopted with zeal in the European schools, and numbers went over to Spain and Italy to receive instruction from the mouths of these famous teachers, who were supposed to utter nothing but the deepest mysteries of wisdom and philosophy. However excessive this veneration for the learned Arabians may have been, it must be owned that all the knowledge, whether of physic, astronomy, philosophy, or mathematics, which flourished in Europe from the tenth century was originally derived from them; and that the Spanish Saracens, in a more particular manner, may be looked upon as the fathers of European philosophy (Ibid., p. 242).

Speaking of the eleventh century, Mosheim says: "The school of Salernum, in the kingdom of Naples, was renowned above all others for the study of physic in this century, and vast numbers crowded thither from all the provinces of Europe to receive instruction in the art of healing; but the medical precepts that rendered the doctors of Salernum so famous were all derived from the schools of the Saracens in Spain and Africa" (Ibid, p. 260). "Even as early as the tenth century," says Draper, "persons having a taste for learning and for elegant amenities, found their way into Spain from all adjoining countries; a practice in subsequent years still more indulged in, when it became illustrated by the brilliant success of Gerbert, who, as we have seen, passed from the University of Cordova to the Papacy of Rome" (History Intellectual Development, p. 351).

To the above I shall add the testimony of Lecky respecting our indebtedness to the Arabs for the revival of learning: "The influence of theology having for centuries benumbed and paralyzed the whole intellect of Christian Europe, the revival, which forms the starting-point of our modern civilization, was mainly due to the fact that two spheres of intellect still remained uncontrolled by the sceptre of Catholicism. The pagan literature of antiquity and the Mohammedan schools of science were the chief agencies in resuscitating the dormant energies of Christendom" (Hist. Morals, vol. ii, p. 17).

The Crusades, the main object of which was to get possession of an empty sepulchre, and which a writer justly says, "turned Syria into an Aceldama, and inundated with blood the fairest fields of Europe," nevertheless, by bringing the Christians more generally and more directly in contact with the Saracens, accomplished much good. "They proved," says Guizot, "a great step in the enfranchisement of mind, great progress toward more extensive and liberal ideas. They, the Crusaders, also found themselves in juxtaposition with two civilizations not only different from their own, but more advanced—the Greeks on the one hand, and the Mohammedans on the other. . . . It is curious to observe in the old chronicles the impression which the Crusaders made upon the Mussulmans. These latter regarded them at first as barbarians; as the rudest, the most ferocious, and the most stupid class of men they had ever seen. The Crusaders on their part were struck with the riches and elegance of manners of the Mussulmans" (History Civilization, vol. i, p. 154).

Brought thus in contact with a people greatly their superiors in intelligence and culture, the Christians could not help receiving benefit from those whose country they invaded. That Christendom, in various ways, is vastly indebted to the Arabs, and especially to the Saracens, for the intellectual advancement that has been made within its limits, no person who has an acquaintance with the history of the Middle Ages can deny. By them the learning and ethics of pagan antiquity were disinterred from the dust of centuries and transmitted and cultivated on the soil of modern Europe. And it was contact with the Saracens that quickened the energies and enlarged the minds of the European Christians, and prepared the way for advances in every direction. Knowledge and skepticism increased together. The Rationalism of Abelard in the twelfth century, the heresies of the Waldenses which gave the Church so much trouble and called forth her vengeance, the spirit of Freethought, of which general complaint was made in the thirteenth century, all furnish evidence of the existence of a strong and growing sentiment against the prevailing system. The poetry of Dante, in which he assigned several popes a place in hell for their vices, the sonnets of Petrarch, in some of which the Church of Rome is characterized as a harlot, and the tales of Boccaccio, wherein the vices of the monks and priests were freely exposed, among other works of less ability and note, tended to increase contempt for the Church and her unholy pretensions. The influence of Roger Bacon, who was imprisoned fourteen years, and finally died in prison, his name blasted as that of a magician, helped the cause of science and progress. The invention of a rag paper, and afterwards of printing, led to a rapid dissemination of knowledge. An acquaintance with the mariner's compass, by enabling man to make the ocean a highway, and a knowledge of gunpowder, which gave civilized nations an immense advantage over barbarians, proved of incalculable value to the cause of progress. Portugal doubled the Cape of Good Hope and found a maritime passage to India; Spain explored and established herself in a new world; England, in the person of Drake, circumnavigated the world; Copernicus, and later, Galileo, opened to the contemplation of man other worlds than our own; science and philosophy received more and more attention, and the heart of man seemed to beat with a more vigorous pulsation, and his mind, brought from heaven to earth, awakened to a life of activity and adventure. A thousand glorious events and magnificent inventions and discoveries thronged upon one another with pressing haste to witness the Reformation. That religious revolution was due to the labors of thousand who preceded the Protestant reformers of the sixteenth century. These latter but reflected the comparatively advanced thought and sentiment of the age, which had been gradually growing in strength and influence for centuries. Wickliffe had long ago opposed the corruptions of Rome, and incurred the hatred and vengeance of the Church. Huss had perished at the stake for his reformatory views. Others less distinguished had met a similar fate. The bones of multitudes of heretics were bleaching on the mountains whither they had been driven by the fury of persecution.

During all this struggle between intellectual life and intellectual death, which continued for ages, Christianity opposed most stubbornly every innovation, and punished with imprisonment, torture, and death the votaries of science, philosophy, and reform. Roger Bacon was imprisoned ten years for his scientific investigations; the work of Copernicus was condemned, his theory denounced as "a false Pythagorean doctrine," and the author, there is reason to believe, excommunicated; Bruno was burnt at the stake; Galileo was arrested and forced to renounce his scientific theories, and when released his steps were dogged until his death.

If the Church once became the friend of the serfs against the nobles of Europe, it was because a proud and powerful nobility, not always submissive to ecclesiastical discipline, having almost unlimited control over the people, weakened the authority of the Church. The people once more under her power, she oppressed the nobles and serfs alike.

The archbishop of Canterbury joined with the barons in extorting Magna Charta from King John. For this act he incurred the wrath of Pope Innocent III., who removed him from office, denounced the charter, declared it null and void, and threatened the king with excommunication and the curses of the Church if he did not disregard it. It was, we may add, Spanish monks, with the famous Las Casas at their head, that introduced into America that "sum of all villainies," negro slavery.

In Spain, the supremacy of Catholic Christianity was followed by the most disastrous results. Under the Saracens, as we have seen, that country was the most enlightened portion of Europe. Its decline commenced with the triumph of the Christian faith, when science decayed, manufacturers gradually disappeared, industrial pursuits were abandoned, fields were uncultivated, and whole districts depopulated. The most valuable part of the Spanish population—the Moriscoes, a remnant of the people that had made Spain illustrious in preceding centuries—were expelled from Spanish soil. This monstrous wrong, the expulsion of 100,000 people from their native land, was urged on and compelled by Spanish priests. "When they were thrust out of Spain," says Buckle, "there was no one to fill their places; arts and manufactures either degenerated or were entirely lost, and immense regions of arable land were left uncultivated; . . . whole districts were suddenly deserted, and down to the present day have never been repeopled. These solicitudes gave refuge to smugglers and brigands, who succeeded the industrious inhabitants formerly occupying them; and it is said that from the expulsion of the Moriscoes is to be dated the existence of those organized bands of robbers, which after this period became the scourge of Spain, and which no subsequent government has been able entirely to extirpate" (Hist. Civilization, vol. ii, p. 53). The expulsion of the Jews from Spain, who next to the Moriscoes were the best part of the population, still further contributed to the downfall of that priest-ridden country. The terrible effects of the Inquisition can never be computed. According to Llorente, 31,000 persons were burnt, and 290,000 condemned to other kinds of punishment by this institution, in Spain alone. It destroyed all industry, stamped out all free thought, and in spite of all the treasures which the New World poured into Spain, the people were reduced largely through its influence to a condition of poverty and degradation. In no way did the prevailing religion intentionally encourage the dissemination of learning or the improvement of man's unhappy condition in this world. On the contrary, the Church robbed and impoverished the people here, giving them in return promises of crowns of glory beyond the grave.

The Doctrine of Filiation, or Descent-Theory.

BY PROF. ERNST HAECKEL.

It is evident that elevations and depressions, such as now can be measured in these places, have uninterruptedly alternated one with another in different places during the whole course of the organic history of the earth. This may be inferred with certainty from the geographical distribution of organisms. But to form a judgment of our palæontological records of creation it is extremely important to show that permanent strata can only be deposited during a slow sinking of the ground under water, but not during its continued rising. When the ground slowly sinks more and more below the level of the sea, the deposited layers of mud get into continually deeper and quieter water, where they can become condensed into stone undisturbed. But when, on the other hand, the ground slowly rises, the newly deposited layers of mud, which inclose the remains of plants and animals, again immediately come within the reach of the play of the waves, and are soon worn away by the force of the breakers, together with the organic remains which they inclose. For this simple but very important reason, therefore, abundant layers, in which organic remains are preserved, can only be deposited during a continuous sinking of the ground. When any two different formations or strata, lying one above the other, correspond with two different periods of depression, we must assume a long period of rising between them, of which period we know nothing, because no fossil remains of the then living animals and plants could be preserved. It is evident, however, that these periods of elevation, which have passed without leaving any trace behind them, deserve a no less careful consideration than the greater or less alternating periods of depressions of whose organic population we can form an approximate idea from the strata containing petrifactions. Probably the former were not of shorter duration than the latter.

From this alone it is apparent how imperfect our records must necessarily be, and all the more so since it can be theoretically proved that the variety of animal and vegetable life must have increased greatly during those very periods of elevation. For as new tracts of land are raised above the water, new islands are formed. Every new island, however, is a new center of creation, because the animals and plants accidentally cast ashore there find in the new territory, in the struggle for life, abundant opportunity of developing themselves peculiarly, and of forming new species. This formation of new species has evidently taken place pre-eminently during these intermediate periods, of which, unfortunately, no petrifactions could be preserved, whereas, on the contrary, during the slow sinking of the ground there was more chance of numerous species dying out, and of a retrogression into fewer specific forms. The intermediate forms between the old and the newly forming species must also have lived during the periods of elevation, and consequently could likewise leave no fossil remains.

In addition to the great and deplorable gaps in the palæontological records of creation—which are caused by the periods of elevation—there are, unfortunately, many other circumstances which immensely diminish their value. I must mention here especially the metamorphic state of the most ancient formations, of those strata which contain the remains of the most ancient flora and fauna, the original forms of all subsequent organisms, and which, therefore, would be of especial interest. It is just these rocks—and, indeed, the greater part of the primordial, or archilithic, strata, almost the whole of the Laurentian, and a large part of the Cambrian systems—which no longer contain any recognizable remains, and for the simple reason that these strata have been subsequently changed or metamorphosed by the influence of the fiery fluid interior of the earth. These deepest neptunic strata of the crust have been completely changed from their original condition by the heat of the glowing nucleus of the earth, and have assumed a crystalline state. In this process, however, the form of the organic remains inclosed in them has been entirely destroyed. It has been preserved only here and there by a happy chance, as in the case of the most ancient petrifactions known, the Eozoon canadense, from the lowest Laurentian strata. However, from the layers of crystalline charcoal (graphite) and crystalline limestone (marble), which are found deposited in the metamorphic rocks, we may with certainty conclude that petrified animal and vegetable remains existed in them in earlier times.

Our record of creation is also extremely imperfect from the circumstance that only a small portion of the earth's surface has been accurately investigated by geologists, namely, England, Germany, and France. But we know very little of the other parts of Europe, of Russia, Spain, Italy, and Turkey. In the whole of Europe only some few parts of the earth's crust have been laid open; by far the largest portion of it is unknown to us. The same applies to North America and to the East Indies. There some few tracts have been investigated; but of the larger portion of Asia, the most extensive of all continents, we know almost nothing; of Africa almost nothing, excepting the Cape of Good Hope and the shores of the Mediterranean; of Australia almost nothing; and of South America but very little. It is clear, therefore, that only quite a small portion, perhaps scarcely the thousandth part of the whole surface of the earth, has been palæontologically investigated. We may therefore reasonably hope, when more extensive geological investigations are made, which are greatly assisted by the constructions of railroads and mines, to find a great number of other important petrifactions. A hint that this will be the case is given by the remarkable petrifactions found in those parts of Africa and Asia which have been minutely investigated—the Cape districts and the Himalaya mountains. A series of entirely new and very peculiar animal forms have become known to us from the rocks of these localities. But we must bear in mind that the vast bottom of the existing oceans is at the present time quite inaccessible to palæontological investigations, and that the greater part of the petrifactions which have lain there from primeval times will either never be known to us, or at best only after the course of many thousands of years, when the present bottom of the ocean shall have become accessible by gradual elevation. If we call to mind the fact that three-fifths of the whole surface of the earth consists of water, and only two-fifths of land, it becomes plain that on this account the palæontological record must always present an immense gap.

But, in addition to these, there exists another series of difficulties in the way of palæontology which arises from the nature of the organisms themselves. In the first place, as a rule, only the hard and solid parts of organisms can fall to the bottom of the sea or of fresh waters, and be there inclosed in the mud and petrified. Hence it is only the bones and teeth of vertebrate animals, the calcareous shells of molluscs, the chitinous skeletons of articulated animals, the calcareous skeletons of star-fishes and corals, and the woody and solid parts of plants, that are capable of being petrified. But soft and delicate parts, which constitute by far the greater portion of the bodies of most organisms, are very rarely deposited in the mud under circumstances favorable to their becoming petrified, or distinctly impressing their external form upon the hardening mud. Now, it must be borne in mind that large classes of organisms, as, for example, the Medusæ, the naked molluscs without shells, a large portion of the articulated animals, almost all worms, and even the lowest vertebrate animals, possess no firm and hard parts capable of being petrified. In like manner the most important parts of plants, such as the flowers, are for the most part so soft and tender that they cannot be preserved in a recognizable form. We therefore cannot expect to find any petrified remains of these important organisms. Moreover, all organisms at an early stage of life are so soft and tender that they are quite incapable of being petrified. Consequently all the petrifactions found in the neptunic stratifications of the earth's crust comprise altogether but a very few forms, and of these for the most part only isolated fragments.

We must next bear in mind that the dead bodies of the inhabitants of the sea are much more likely to be preserved and petrified in the deposits of mud than those of the inhabitants of fresh water and of the land. Organisms living on land can, as a rule, become petrified only when their corpses fall accidentally into the water and are buried at the bottom in the hardening layers of mud. But this event depends upon very many conditions. We cannot therefore be astonished that by far the majority of petrifactions belong to organisms which have lived in the sea, and that of the inhabitants of the land proportionately only very few are preserved in a fossil state. How many contingencies come into play here we may infer from the single fact that of many fossil mammals, in fact of all the mammals of the secondary, or mesozoic, epoch, nothing is known except the lower jawbone. This bone is, in the first place, comparatively solid, and, in the second place, very easily separates itself from the dead body, which floats on the water. Whilst the body is driven away and dissolved by the water, the lower jawbone falls down to the bottom of the water and is there inclosed in the mud. This explains the remarkable fact that in a stratum of limestone of the Jurassic system near Oxford, in the slates of Stonesfield, as yet only the lower jawbones of numerous pouched animals (Marsupials) have been found. They are the most ancient mammals known, and of the whole of the rest of their bodies not a single bone exists. The opponents of the theory of development, according to their usual logic, would from this fact be obliged to draw the conclusion that the lower jawbone was the only bone in the body of those animals.

"Two Phases of Repeal."

BY THERON C. LELAND.

Mr. Abbot, on the eve of presenting himself anew for the suffrages of a Liberal constituency, seems to have gathered himself up for a supreme effort to justify his course during the past year, and vindicate his present position on the Comstock Postal Law.

He resorts first to the old, old trick, over and over again seen through and exploded, of setting up a few extremists in the party, patting them on the head, calling them good boys, saying, "You are in the right, you hav all the logic, you hold the only tenable position;" and then turning to the main body of the party and saying, "See those absurd blackguards down there—their low indecent position is what you mean. You hav got to come to that to be logical, to be courageous, to finally succeed; and since that is what you mean, you are absurd, you are odious, you are unconstitutional, impractical, and insane."

Mr. Abbot would reduce everybody to one dead level of opinion, oblivious of the fact that in every party there are stripes, lines, and shades; and every division is logical for itself. The centre, right, and right centre; left, and left centre; with extreme Radicals on the one hand, and Ultramontanes on the other, thrown in; are logical, inevitable, inexpugnable divisions in every party or miscellaneous assembly of men. Protestantism is all cut up into shades and sects, without any special odium to any, and yet there is one thin line of creed to which all are constant and all are logical.

Abolition before the war meant all the way from the colonizationist who would export free negroes to Africa, down to John Brown and the brakeman on the Underground railroad. And all were logical to their insight, their standpoint, their evidence on the subject of slavery.

Mr. Abbot would hav the marching rank and file of an army to be the scouts. "Look you now," he says in effect, "those fellows up in the mountain passes, or down in the dark ravines far in advance—they are the only consistent fellows in the fight, they hav the courage of their opinions, they are faithful to the logic of this cruel war, "they scorn to evade or shirk the inevitable corollaries of that position." You absurd, irrational soldiers, regimented and phalanxed as you are in a compact organization, you ought all to be scouts. Every soldier ought to be in the van. It is illogical to be in the rear, in the flank, or even in the centre. Break up your army pell mell and turn your organization into a party of bushwhacking scouts. To be logical you will hav to come to that.

High tariff, low tariff, tariff for protection, tariff for revenue, ad valorum tariff, and specific tariff, all hav their special logics and consistencies. But Mr. Abbot would single out the extremest of them, or the minorest minority, and exclaim to the majority, "There! you absurd impracticables, they are more absurd, impossible, and impracticable than you are; but they are the only logical party, the only courageous crowd in this tariff controversy, and their position is the one you hav all got to come to!" Can theologic logic, hybridized with volunteer candidacy, farther go? But the cuttle-fish has no other retreat than to skulk and disappear in the mud he makes.

The theologian, turned lawyer discussing constitutional law, draws this fanciful picture of the "two phases of repeal"—makes one odious, and then proceeds in his logical way (theo-logical—he knows no other) to break the head of the postal repeal party over the odium he hopes to excite against the state and municipal repeal party. It is just as rational as the convincing question, "Would you hav your daughter marry a nigger?" with which the Abolitionist was laid low so often that he arose in his wrath one day and in a wild, irregular, but effective sort of way, repealed, with only one phase to it, the Fugitive Slave Law—Dred Scott, Supreme Court and all — and, as Hans Breitman asks, "Where ish dot barty now?"

Mr. Abbot says they alone, of the whole party of repeal, take the intellectual lead"—that is to say, they alone are pioneers, they alone blaze the way for the main body to follow. They alone are the Garrisons who get mobbed and the John Browns who get hung, for the very politicians of the next age to sing peans over. They alone are the engine rushing by the platform to draw the train up to it. All this may be very illogical, and very distressing to the theologian, but it has been the course of parties all the way down from the first tribe that ever opened a debating school even after the Stanislaus pattern.

"They alone," he continues, "follow out the principle of that party with admirable valor." Now why admirable if the principle is so very unsound and absurd? "For this we must respect them, however irrational," etc. We do not see the logic of respect and admiration for people who take positions that are absurd. To be sure, we all know that Mr. Abbot has the most genuine respect for absurd opinions and absurd people, but it is not usual to avow it so candidly. Where is the d fference between right reasoning and wrong if we are to admire and respect the illogical and absurd? Or is it the mere "sic 'em on" of a reckless drover to his dog, setting him upon the leading bulls so that the whole herd may stampede into a morass together? That appears to be the object which the crafty theologian hopes to accomplish. We shall see how he will succeed. The fact is, sir, your respect and admiration are as thin and heartless and hollow as your Liberalism, and we hold both at their greatly depreciated value.

To the whole paragraph commencing "Nevertheless," etc., we hav this to repeat, reiterate, and rub in; so that the candidate, if he has any understanding, can understand it. This is a controversy within the League, not with out siders. The central demand of the Leaguers is to repeal the Comstock Postal Law—not any state law. That is what 70,000 Liberals petitioned for. That is what all Liberal editors except this semi-Liberal one hav been contending for; and that is the vital point, and no other, on the obscene question that will come up at Syracuse; and the attempt to switch us off upon a side track, and wreck our train in a swamp of absurdity, won't work. Our position is that the Comstock United States Postal Law (not any state law) is unconstitutional, no matter what or how many courts hav made decisions around and about it—for none hav decided upon it directly. It is unconstitutional for the reason that Congress is not empowered by the Constitution to legislate upon printed opinions, nor upon any question of the moral or immoral quality of anything in print offered to be transported in the mails; and the moment Congress attempts to so legislate, and is not called to immediate and indignant account by the people, the principle on which freedom of the press is based is gone, and all our other freedoms gradually ooze out and disappear forever.

If Congress is not so empowered, then all powers not delegated to Congress by the Constitution are reserved to the people or to the states, so that, if they choose, they can enforce them through the authorities of the state. Hence, when the question is about the repeal of a United States law, and not about a state law, it is "absurd"—there is where absurd comes in, a word which the gentleman who prides himself upon his culture and logic is so fond of hurling about, right and left, without any sense—I say it is absurd to talk of libel being forbidden by law and about libel being a crime, when libel is forbidden by state laws and not by laws of the United States; and when libel is a crime not under United States laws, but under those of the state—just as we propose that obscenity shall be, if at all or anywhere.

It is of no manner of account, then, if Mr. Abbot does hold it to be a crime to mail really obscene literature to children; that does not make it so, and the United States Constitution does not permit it to be made so by United States law. That is the impregnable position that Mr. Wakeman and almost the whole body of Liberals in this Republic take and are able logically, consistently, and honestly to maintain. It is the printing of obscenity that is the crime—not the mailing of it; and if it is a crime to print it, the place to make it so by legislation is the state, to be dealt with by state courts and state officials. This is our strongest point, not the weakest; and the suggestion is gratuitous and unnecessary that it needs any strengthening.

There is one phrase that occurs six times in Mr. Abbot's "Two Phases of Repeal." He dwells and insists on "really obscene literature." The Liberals of this country, before electing him again to the Presidency of the League, would like to have him define explicitly and accurately what is "really obscene literature." If he is such an expert in the article, why won't he take a quiet hour and describe to Congress and the country, so all hands will know it when they see it, what is "really obscene literature?" We need some umpire who is impartial and experienced. If we ask the pious party, Comstock, Congress, and the Supreme Court, to define it, they will include "Cupid's Yokes," Bennett's tracts and TRUTH SEEKER, all physiology, and Ingersoll's "Gods." If we ask the Liberal party to define it, they will include the Bible, trial reports of adulterous clergymen, "The Priest in Absolution," and the entertaining history of Comstock's Night with the Greene Street Girls. These are the two hosts drawn up in opposing lines with their obscene stock-in-trade on exhibition and sale. Competition is fierce; and the dickering slang over the virtues of each pile of vice is rich and voluminous. Now, dear Rev. Abbot, who shall decide when the most learned and evangelical doctors disagree? Can't you institute a clearing-house for us—evolve some obscene accountant who can strike a balance and hand over the difference to the party to whom it is due?

Anyhow, what is "really obscene literature?" If *any*body knows, won't he be good enough to tell? And if nobody knows, won't he be just as good enough not to open his head about it?

We come now to the second phase of repeal. By this he means Mr. Wakeman's argument and position and that of the Liberals who hold with him. This argument he struggles with, "thrashes around," strikes wild, concedes what he can't help, and imports more considerations which do not belong to the case. Here is one of his illuminations. He quotes from the opinion of the Supreme Court and says: "This question is purely one of theoretical constitutional law." How theoretical? One would suppose it to be a question eminently and purely practical. It is not a matter of opinion at all—it is one of fact. Let us look into this. Readers should recur carefully to what "the Supreme Court has unanimously declared," as quoted by Mr. Abbot. That "the power possessed by Congress embraces the regulation of the entire postal system of the country" is true; but sharply note that regulation is not suppression. "The right to designate what shall be carried necessarily involves the right to determine what shall be excluded" is not true—is only qualifiedly true; is true only outside of certain classes of mail matter which the postal authorities must carry, and Congress cannot legislate upon to prevent, no matter what the Supreme Court has decided or may decide. Suppose Congress should make a law that letters addressed to any resident of the State of Utah should not be carried, or that letters addressed to Socialists in this city should not be carried. Suppose Congress should legislate that Mr. Shupe's Advocate should not be carried, or that no newspaper published in Chicago should be carried in the United States mails. Wouldn't there be a jolly row at once that would upset and override any Congress that should attempt to pass such laws or any court that should attempt to enforce them? It is not true, then, and makes no approach to the truth, even if a Supreme Court does decide it, that "the right to designate what shall be carried necessarily involves the right to determine what shall be excluded." Let Congress or the Supreme Court try that on, in all the baldness in which it is stated; and let them betake themselves to secure shelter to see what would happen. As Hosea Bigelow says—

"Wen cold lead puts daylight thru ye,
You'll begin to calkilate."

The fact is, it is only outside of and beyond the main body of mail matter which the mails must carry—that is, all letters, all newspapers, and nearly all printed matter—that it becomes true that "Congress has the right to determine what shall be excluded." It is not till they enter the domain of merchandise, or articles other than letters, pamphlets, newspapers, and books, that Congress has the right to determine what shall be excluded. As between chains, Congress may determine that a watch chain may be carried, but an anchor chain not; a sample of calico may be carried but a bale of dry goods not; a book weighing two pounds may be carried, but an atlas six feet square and six inches thick not. Mail matter that our fathers carried on man or mule or horseback for two centuries, and then on mail coach, mail steamer, and mail trains for another century and is so carried to this day, is not within the class of matter which Congress has the right to exclude. Certainly the opinions, the teachings, the moral or immoral quality of that matter, never for three centuries was set up as a reason for the exclusion of any of this class of mail matter; never until 1832 was such reason or such right to exclude proposed, and then it was signally defeated. It was unfortunate for the ignominious slaveocrats who made that effort that Mr. Abbot did not liv in that day to espouse their cause—to decline to sign petitions against them, and to dissuade others from signing. It was reserved for 1873, in a Republican Congress with Christian statesmen, Christian salary grabbers, and Christian thieves, with Y. M. C. Associations to back them, and Comstock agents to lobby and prompt them—it was not till that recreant Congress that the retrogrades and reactionaries dared to attempt the enactment of such a law and put it in force. It never could hav been done in any other age of this Republic than during the demoralization and reaction of such a war as we hav had to pass through. The people never asked for it; it originated in no public need, and was wholly the offspring of the lobby. But now the people are aroused against it; the first ground-swell of popular indignation has been heard, and it is doubtful if the conspirators who procured the passage of the law will ever dare invoke it again to crush another victim, even with Mr. Abbot, the Supreme Court apologists, law theologian, and semi-Liberal President of the League, pro tem., to plead their cause.

Mr. Abbot proceeds with a series of ifs which are wholly impossible and says, "Then these laws would not in the least infringe upon the just freedom of the press," etc.; but that is just one of the vital points in the controversy. These laws cannot be "so amended" as the editor describes. They would be interpreted to warrant punishment for honest but unorthodox opinions. That is what they are wanted for. That is the whole object of them; and just laws on the subject are not what Comstock and his backers desire. Such laws would be of no use to them. This Government is practically a Christian Government. The Christian party are in power, and they want and will enforce Christian laws or none at all. The safest way, then, is to permit no such national laws on the national statute book, just as the Constitution does not permit them. Then there can be no abuses in their application. Mr. Wakeman is wholly right, then, and the Liberals of the country will sustain him in maintaining that the "issue lies between the existing laws" of Congress and no national laws at all on the subject. "We are shut down to the necessity of either opposing" or accepting these Comstock laws as they are. The only way to amend is to expunge them from the statute book as wholly unconstitutional and beyond the jurisdiction of Congress to enact. There is no analogy between obscenity and the tariff, because Congress has no right to legislate on obscenity in the mails, and it has a right by the Constitution to legislate upon the tariff. None but a shallow and thoughtless theologian would attempt to add up four pears and five peaches to make nine apples in that childish way.

The situation, then, is exactly as Mr. Wakeman states it: "In the true point of view this is not a question of obscenity, but of liberty." Fortunately, IT IS NOT "a question of both." We are attacking a United States postal law. We are maintaining the impartial freedom of the mails; and with reference to them, you may assert it and argue and mystify it till doomsday, and you cannot cipher out of the Constitution of the United States any right granted to Congress to legislate concerning obscenity in the mails or concerning the opinions of written or printed matter in the mails. In support, too, of the importance of withholding all power to so discriminate is the certain abuse of that power that always occurs, and the sure limitation of the just freedom of the press, the moment the least experiment is tried and the least particle of that power is conceded to Congress. In the happy phrase of President Madison, which The Index itself recently exhumed from the writings of that distinguished patriot, "We see all the consequences in the principle, and we avoid the consequences by denying the principle." That affirmation is a good proverbial companion to "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty," and we hope to see it become as popular as a quotation and a reminder of our patriotic duties. Elizur Wright, too, has said almost as pithy and pertinent a bon mot: "Bad logic is dangerous. It brings men to beggary and nations to the dust." Men and brother Liberals of this once free country, let us live up to the logic of our principles.

Now, let us take in some italics which intimate that we hav a fearfully troublesome proposition to deal with. It is this: "It is just as much violation of the freedom of the press for a state to interfere with obscene literature as it is for Congress." This we deny, for at least two reasons. First, Congress is forbidden by the Constitution to interfere with obscene or any other literature, and the state is not. For Congress to exert a power which has been denied to it and reserved to the people is to enter upon a course of usurpation; and with such a breakdown of the guarantees of the Constitution once started, there is no knowing where it will end, or what will become of the Constitution itself and all the liberties which it guarantees. Second, the state has the right to regulate or even to limit the freedom of the press, while the states united have not that right; and here Mr. Abbot's limitation comes properly in place—that "no man" (including editors and press men) "shall use his freedom so as to infringe upon the equal rights of others." Hence libel is rightly forbidden by law; and if, by facts such, for instance, as the observation and testimony of physicians may be able to substantiate, obscenity can be shown to work any general harm, then obscenity of that extreme and hurtful character may be legislated against and suppressed by the state. The state can be handled. Convictions unjustly procured do not so easily take place under the state. All the tyrannies, all the outrages upon the liberty of the individual for publishing his opinions, all the abridgments of the freedom of the press, hav been decreed by the United States courts, not by those of the state; so when Mr. Abbot asks what is the difference between Mr. Heywood or any other Liberal writer being imprisoned by the state or by the United States, we are able to show that the difference is very vital, since one does ruthlessly, savagely, and unjustly imprison, and the other does not. In one jurisdiction, the judges are appointed for long terms or for life, are selected from the wealthy, pious, conservative classes, are above the people, difficult to be reached by impeachment or other punishment for any unjust judgment, and are natural born tyrants and oppressors. In the other the judges are mostly elected for short terms, are more immediately from and among the people and sympathizing with them, and for renewal of their terms must go to the people for their suffrages. There are more opportunities for appeal to higher courts, opportunities for changes of venue, and, in cases unjustly charged as criminal, for public opinion to act.

Mr. Heywood, then, will care for, and his friends will greatly appreciate, the difference between being imprisoned by the state or by the United States. Though the wrong may be "in the fact of imprisonment for such a cause," yet a wrong imprisonment by a state is more easily righted. It is a smaller body to be worked upon. Less public opinion has to be wrought up, less population to be permeated with right ideas on the subject. A Governor and state courts are more approachable, more immediately connected with the people, more sensitive to public opinion, and public opinion may be rightly and efficiently invoked in cases of unjust imprisonment.

A Yankee with his pen-knife will easily slice off a whittling from a Penobscot shingle; but let him try it on the six-foot butt end of a Georgia pine and he will soon learn the beneficent uses of a sawmill for disintegration and dealing with slabs. Large bodies are inert, and difficult to penetrate by any kindly influence. The Supreme Court of the United States is worse than the butt end of any Georgian pine. It is all gummed up and interpenetrated with the turpentine of precedent and prejudice. It requires the nitro-glycerine of a popular commotion, or a cruel war, to reverse its unjust judgments. The Faneuil Hall Indignation Meeting, in behalf of Heywood, probably hardly reached the ears of the Supreme Court of the United States; while if Heywood had been as unjustly imprisoned under the laws of Massachusetts as he has under those of the United States, he would hav been liberated within a week after such a meeting as that which uttered its remonstrance in Faneuil Hall. There would hav been such a buzzing about the ears of a Massachusetts Governor and Massachusetts court as would hav compelled an arrest of judgment and the execution of justice. That is the practical difference, Mr. Theologian, between the state and the United States powers and jurisdictions; and your hair-splitting, theoretical, theological objections and charges of inconsistency are of no sort of account. We go for efficient, practical results that will do us justice and keep us out of jail. We prefer to wrestle with one of our size, who has the right to challenge us, than with a great towering giant who has no right to summon us into the ring. Supreme Courts are but men. A lie decided by them to be true is just the same a lie. There is no more veneration to be attached to unsound opinions held by the Supreme Court, or wrought into law by them, than to the opinions that hav no basis or bottom, held by common men. The respectable pleader's clinching question, then, is herein answered—"How does Congress any more infringe upon freedom when it does precisely the same thing" as the state?

But the powers of Congress are limited while the Constitution lasts, and we should n't greatly wonder if those powers would meet with some restriction after the Constitution is gone. While the Constitution does last, we should suppose Congress would derive its powers therefrom. But this theological pleader twitters right along, as gay as any bird, as if earth were air without any boundaries, and as if Congress held a dictatorship and could pass any law it pleases. Good Heavens! What is the Constitution for if not to act as a regulator instructing Congress what it may or may not do? If there is nothing it may not do, what is the use of the Constitution? It has been supposed that the Constitution was an agreement between the Government and the people—an agreement which bound Congress to do what was set forth in the agreement; and not to do what was not set forth, or was forbidden. But with this carboy of hydro-sulphuretted theological cant emptied over the safeguard, all hawsers part, and every foundation supposed solid and settled goes adrift.

O Comstock! O Anthony! Great Saint of Purity! Immaculate Conception of Christian Young Men. Look down from your Greene street height. Tear yourself one frugal moment from the beatitudes of that blest abode. Forego for one priceless hour those delights permitted only to young Christian agents while clambering over their steep and thorny path of duty. Come to the rescue of this thy suffering disciple. Steady this Ship of State, so unaccountably got loose. Port her obscene helm, and unbind her passengers "hand and foot." The Rev. Abbot, President of the Liberal League, implores you. If he finds favor in your eyes, let his will be done. Treat him to a night's debauch; initiate him into thy divine mysteries; make him a child of thine own, in close communion as he is now in spirit, and thine shall be the power and the glory forever and ever. Amen!

The Liberal League Congress.

SHALL WE MAKE IT A GREAT CONVENTION?

Friends of Freethought of the State of New York, there is nothing that advances the cause of Liberalism more than large, earnest, enthusiastic Liberal Conventions, such as we held a few weeks since at Watkins, and there is a fine chance for us to hav one at the city of Syracuse, the 26th and 27th of this month. To be sure, the Liberal League Congress then and there to be held is to be a delegated body so far as its business meeting is concerned, but I am confident all its business will be transacted during Saturday forenoon and afternoon, and that we shall then have Saturday evening, Sunday morning, afternoon, and evening for a rousing Freethinkers' Convention.

The Congress is to be held at Wieting's splendid Opera House, in the prosperous and central city of Syracuse, and as there will be present, to my knowledge, twenty or thirty of the ablest Liberal speakers in this country, we shall be sure to have a rich and interesting occasion.

And I know of no city in the Union where it is more convenient to get together a large congregation of Liberals than at Syracuse. In the first place, there is a very large number of Liberals in Syracuse, larger probably according to the number of its inhabitants than in any other city of the Union, excepting Chicago and Boston. Then Syracuse is located about half way from Buffalo and Albany on the New York Central R. R., which charges but two cents a mile fare, which gives an opportunity for the Liberals of all the large cities and towns on the line of that road to attend at very reasonable expense. And there are also railroads running out in every direction from the city that make a near connection with Cazenovia, Auburn, Binghamton, Marathon, Cortland, Homer, Rome, Oneida, Watertown, Ogdensburg, Ithaca, Elmira, Waterloo, Geneva, Watkins, Dryden, Skaneateles, McLean, Wolcott, Weedsport, and a hundred other towns, each of which is the home of many earnest Liberals. All of these should make it a point to be present at the Syracuse Congress.

There are many Liberal friends who I know will consider it a favor to entertain you at their homes, and many respectable places in the city where you can live nearly as cheap as at home.

Then there is another reason why we should have a great Convention at Syracuse. There is located the great Methodist theological school, where hundreds of young men are sent to be hoodwinked by old theology. Many of them will doubtless attend our Convention out of curiosity, and we should be able to make a favorable impression upon their minds.

There is also in Syracuse a number of enterprising daily papers that will giv our Congress a generous report, and we shall be able to make it one worthy of the great principles we possess.

Some may say there is to be some contention and difference of opinion there, and that will be disagreeable. I think there will be only just enough of that to spice the proceedings and to make it lively and interesting. From every quarter I am receiving information that the Liberals generally require and will demand peace, and I expect to see a general settlement of all our misunderstandings at the Syracuse Congress, and we shall probably see Bros. Bennett, Abbot, Leland, and company, walking arm in arm on to the platform, and everything made lovely. If that interesting exhibition is to take place, friends you should all be there to witness it, and without any jesting, I wish it might be so.

Therefore, Liberals of New York State, where you can not organize Leagues and send delegates, come yourselves, and let us hav another Convention in central New York, the influence of which shall be felt for good over the whole country.

H. L. Green.

Board at Syracuse.

Dear Friend Bennett: Please inform the Liberal public through The Truth Seeker that the Syracuse House will entertain the delegates attending the Liberal League Congress at $2.00 per day. I hold their written agreement to that effect. The Syracuse House is just across the way from where the Congress is to be held. Board may be obtained by those who may desire it at much cheaper rates at respectable hotels and boarding houses. Yours truly, Salamanca, N. Y., Oct. 4, 1878. H. L. Green.

Liberal Conventions.—A Good Beginning.

The corresponding secretary of the New York State Freethinkers' Association suggested in these columns a short time since that it would be well to hold a Liberal Convention in each county of the State during the coming year, and we are pleased to learn that the suggestion is already being adopted at least in two counties, and we hope it may be in all the others.

Last week we announced a Convention for Cattaraugus County, to be held at Randolph, N. Y., Oct. 19th and 20th, at which half a dozen of our ablest speakers are engaged to be present, and this week we are pleased to give notice that on the 29th and 30th inst., the Liberals of Ontario and adjoining counties will hold a Freethinkers' Convention at Naples, N. Y. At this Convention there will be present as speakers, B. F. Underwood, H. L. Green, Dr. T. L. Brown, Prof. T. B. Taylor, T. C. Leland, Charles Ellis, and others. As it will be held immediately after the Syracuse Congress, many will probably go from Syracuse to this gathering.

A Boomerang.

Here is the characteristic response of the "despiser of coyness and false modesty," to our challenge to produce his proof of "secret plots," or to giv the name of the author of that "private letter."

"We are charged by the plotters with attempting to 'capture the Convention.' We confess it. The plotters are doing the same thing. But the difference between them and us is this: they are trying to 'capture the Convention' by a conspiracy of calumnies, trick, and shameless falsehoods; while we are trying to capture it by fair, open, and honest argument on the issues at stake, addressed to the intellects and consciences of the members, and submitted to the decision of the majority in free and public debate. Let the right prevail!"

"The public ought to understand the spirit of the men who are trying to force the National Liberal League to abandon its former position in favor of 'reform' and take a new departure in favor of 'repeal.' The Truth Seeker unblushingly accuses us of 'fabricating' and 'concocting' the private letter we quoted in our issue of September 19—of making deliberately 'false' statements on the same subject,—of 'threatening' the League,—of intending to refuse certificates of membership to all delegates except those who will vote for us,—of being about to 'steal an office,'—of meaning to 'pack the Convention,' and 'put it in our pocket,'—of 'forestalling its action,'—of 'dictating,' etc., etc. It declares explicitly that our position on the Comstock laws 'unfits' us for the office we now hold, and nominates Hon. Elizur Wright for our successor, as if, forsooth, our faithful and honored friend did not take substantially the same position! Such absurd slanders, considering their source, are simply beneath contempt. We only refer to them as transparent proofs of the plot which we hav exposed, and proofs of the rage into which exposure has thrown the plotters. They remind us of what Mazzini wrote, in reference to similar slanders against himself: 'It was a terrible revelation to me of the future of base suspicion, distrust, and calumny, reserved for those who, in all purity of soul and faith in others, consecrate their lives to any great undertaking.'"

We indignantly and forcibly pointed out to the volunteer candidate that there was not and never had been any "secret plot," or "secret movement" "to surprise and capture the Congress," nor "to seize upon the organization of the Convention," and we challenged and defied him to produce his proofs. Mr. Wakeman in his letter published in last week's Index, gives him the same assurance. Now, the candidate editor instead of producing his authority for such a statement, and in the face of all the facts and assurances furnished him, reiterates the charge. In view of his having had fair notice and opportunity to either prove his charge, or retract and apologize, we think all spirited and fair-minded Liberals will sustain us in now denouncing Francis E. Abbot himself as a brazen, shameless, malicious——ah well! We are no poet, and need invoke no lyre to transfix on high and infamous pillory the unscrupulous theologian who bounces out of a Christian pulpit to vilify and malign not only all the Liberals of a sister city, but 70,000 and ten times 70,000 of them over the whole country. Either Mr. Abbot is a conspicuously suitable candidate for that unenviable elevation, or the author of that "private letter" must step forward to take his place; and Mr. Abbot can take whichever bull by the horn of that dilemma he chooses. One or the other must bear the palm of excellence in the art of saying the thing that is not. Vigorous English words are made for vigorous uses, and this is as good a place to put the strongest of them as ever occurred in our life-long experience, but we leave it to others to say what word fitly chosen that shall be.

T. C. L.

Additional Remarks.—The Index accuses us of "plotting," "conspiracy," "calumnies," "tricks," and "shameless falsehoods." These charges are hardly worth our attention; but we will say this much, If we hav even told one falsehood, during all this controversy, about The Index, its editor, or anything pertaining to the discusion, we are not aware of it. We certainly hav not intended to make one misstatement. On the other hand, we think we can easily point out fifty untruths which The Index has contained about us and the matter under discussion, and we will undertake to do so if the editor desires it.—[Ed. Fare and Board.

The railroads will make a very liberal reduction in the fares from this city to Syracuse and return, so that those living east or south who intend going to Syracuse to attend the Congress will do well to come this way and buy a commutation ticket. Such would do well to confer with the editor of this paper. Board can be secured in Syracuse at 80 cents, $1, $1.50, and $2 per day, according to the style of the house.

Lecture committees who desire to secure first-class entertainments for their societies should communicate at once with Charles Ellis, No. 8 Portland st., Boston, Mass.

W. S. Bell holds a debate with Rev. A. W. Dean at Nelsonville, O., October 14th, 15th, 16th, 17th, and 18th, on the merits of Revelation.

B. F. Underwood spoke at Nevada, O., October 10th, 11th, and 12th; lectures at La Rue, O., the 14th, 15th, and 16th.

Voltaire in Exile.

HIS LIFE AND WORK IN FRANCE AND IN FOREIGN LANDS.

BY M. GASTINEAU.

(Translated for THE TRUTH SEEKER.)

III.—CONTINUED.

The author of the "Temple du Goût" enjoyed all this frenzy, attesting that he had struck at the very defect in the cuirass, and meanwhile was completing his "Lettres sur les Anglais," commenced in London—a perfect revelation of political, philosophical, scientific, and literary England, hitherto unknown in France. He extolled Newton's system, Locke's philosophy, the liberties, the religious tolerance, of outre Manche. With the privileges, the despotism, and the abuses of the French system he contrasted the free institutions and customs of England. He thrashed the French priests upon the backs of the Anglican clergy by writing:

"The Anglican clergy has retained many Catholic ceremonies, and especially that of collecting the tithes with the most attentive scrupulousness. The Anglicans have also the pious desire of being masters; for what vicar does not wish to be pope?"

In his "Frederick the Great," Carlyle declares very correct Voltaire's appreciation of the English and of England in the eighteenth century.

Several manuscript copies of Voltaire's work had circulated with impunity. But the editor, Jore fils, having published the "Lettres sur les Anglais," under the name of "Lettres Philosophiques," he was thrown into the Bastille. Referred to parliament, the book was condemned as "scandalous, contrary to religion, to good morals, to the respect due to the powers," and publicly burned by the hand of the executioner. A writ of arrest was issued against its author, but he was not found at his lodgings. At that moment he was in Monjeu, assisting at the celebration of the marriage of the Duke of Richelieu with Mademoiselle de Guise. A lettre de cachet commanded the author of the "Lettres Philosophiques" to constitute himself prisoner in the Château d'Auxonne, near Dijon.

"I have a mortal aversion against the jail," wrote Voltaire. "I am sick; confined air would have killed me. They would perhaps have stuck me in a cell. . . . What makes me believe the orders were severe is that the Marshalsea was astir."

Voltaire avoided that extremity by leaving Paris and hiding in an unknown place. But he suddenly emerged from his retreat to join the army when he learned that the Duke of Richelieu had been wounded in a duel with the Prince of Liscin, who had been stretched on the ground. Arrived at the camp of Philipsbourg, he found Richelieu, slightly wounded, who feasted him, in company with the Prince of Conti and of the Counts of Charolois and of Clermont. They passed from the festal board to the battle-field. Voltaire braved musket-balls and cannon-shot. But, being taken for a spy, he came near being executed. Recognizing the dangers of his presence at the camp, he took refuge in the castle of Cirey, in Champagne, in the retreat offered him by the Marchioness Emilie du Châtelet. Voltaire, who called her a very amiable and calumniated woman, had gained her friendship by dedicating to her his "Epître Contre la Calomnie."

At that time Mme. du Châtelet was in Paris, seeking to put to work influences in favor of Voltaire and to calm the tempest. She wrote:

"I am entirely convinced that the minister has a well-formed design to ruin him. They speak of banishment. For me, I know that in his place I should have been in London or at Hague long ago."

Whether he did not believe himself safe, or was weary of living alone in that desert of Cirey, surrounded by mountains and uncultivated land, according to the portraiture of Madame Denis, Voltaire sought refuge in Belgium. He remained there one month. From Brussels he wrote two letters to the Count of Argental, dated in the current November, 1734, in which he shows his impatience to learn the issue of the interview which Madame de Richelieu was to have concerning him with the lord-keeper of the great seal, and also of the attempt in the same direction made by Madame du Châtelet. "For my part," he ends with, "I admit to you that I shall have to possess great philosophic resignation in order to forget the unworthy manner in which I have been treated by my country."

Feeling more secure, he returns to Cirey, where he finds the châtelaine Emilie and several distinguished visitors. Voltaire soon becomes the god of that circle. He throws down wit and mirth by handfuls. In the evenings he makes the guests of Cirey swell with laughter by showing them the magic lantern, by causing these Chinese profiles to play all the intrigues of the times, by running dialogues in the most comic Savoyard accent. Dramas were also represented at Cirey. Amateur comedy was, as every one knows, one of the passions of the eighteenth century. Madame du Châtelet appeared on the stage, and played her part royally well; which did not prevent her from studying the exact sciences, to Newtonize, whilst Voltaire elaborated his works.

IV.

Ever reappearing on the Parisian arena, and ceaselessly taking up again his warp of "Penelope," Voltaire put on the stage, in 1736, "Alzire" and "l'Enfant Prodigies." Emboldened, Voltaire solicited a second time a chair at the Academy; but his enemies leagued against him, and caused him once more to fail. He felt very sensitive over this check.

At the end of the year 1736, two reasons forced Voltaire to disappear temporarily from France—a moral reason and a political reason. The swelling and pullulating pack of the Jesuits and bigots accused him of sacrilege and barked at his heels for having said in his publication of the Mondain that Adam had finger-nails of the length of those of an ape, and having made our mother Eve the object of keen pleasantries. On the other hand, the relatives of Madame du Châtelet had found scandalous his presence at the castle of Cirey and his intimacy with the châtelaine, in the absence of her husband, the Marquess of Châtelet, who was with the army.

For these reasons, and especially because he felt weary of hiding and being tracked about, tired of living with the invariable prospective of the Bastille and of a writ, Voltaire was pushed to seek a temporary security in Belgium and Holland. The Prince Royal of Prussia had, indeed, offered him a refuge, but Madame du Châtelet dissuaded him from accepting it. She put under key his manuscript of the "Pucelle," which Voltaire intended to take with him to have it printed in Holland.

"It is necessary at every turn to save him from himself," she wrote, "and I use more diplomacy to guide him than all the Vatican employs to keep the Christian world in bonds."

Madame du Châtelet was really too prudent concerning Voltaire, and, with her precautions, she would have extinguished his genius, had it been extinguishable.

The very day of his passage to Brussels, the 18th of January, 1737, one of his pieces, "Alzire," was being played.

"His laurels follow him everywhere," observed the Marchioness of Châtelet to the Count d'Argental. "But what does so much glory profit him? Obscure happiness would be much preferable. O vana hominum mentes! O pectora cæca!"

Madame du Châtelet understands here, by "obscure happiness," the happy days which Voltaire spent with her at the Château de Cirey; which he charmed with his witty conversation, as Madame de Graffigny said, adding that being deprived of Voltaire's small-talk was a real punishment.

Voltaire, arrived in Brussels, remained there but a short while. M. Desnoireterres, the learned author of "Voltaire and French Society in the Eighteenth Century," attributes his short residence to the unpleasantness which, it is said, he experienced at meeting there his declared enemy, the poet Jean Baptiste Rousseau. Their quarrel had, indeed, become very much envenomed since the year 1722, and had taken the character of a mortal fray.

Rousseau had narrated according to his point of view their altercations of 1722. He pretended that it was the impiety of Voltaire, his attacks upon Christianity, which had revolted him. But in reality it was his slaying epigram upon the "Ode à la Posterité." He reproached him with being a follower of the Marchioness de Rupelmonde, and with not having had with her Platonic relations alone. He added that he had introduced Voltaire into several great families of Brussels, and that his manners there had been improper. In the church of the Sablons, he would have it appear, Voltaire had troubled the service and listened very undevoutly to the mass. He charged Voltaire, furthermore, with having blattered against him at Marimont, and with having at Mons so much incensed the table d'hôte by his words that he came near being thrown out of the window.

Rousseau, besides, had attributed to Voltaire the odious project of going to preach Atheism in the Netherlands, bringing forward to support his calumnies the learned Sr. Gravesand and the Duke of Aremberg; both of whom opposed him with an express denial.

Lastly, a violent pamphlet from Rousseau had appeared in a Paris magazine.

Voltaire, however, was not at all behind his charitable confrère. He had riddled him with epigrams, notably in his "Temple du Goût." To his pamphlet he had replied by his deoppilating "Crepinade." To understand the piquant allusion in this title, it must be known that Rousseau was the son of a shoemaker of Paris, and that, the honest man having come to the foyer to congratulate him after his first representation of the "Flatteur" at the Theater Français, Rousseau, swollen with pride, had refused to recognize him. He did not want to be known as the son of an artisan.

Here is the biased appreciation of the difference between Voltaire and Rousseau, made by a Catholic writer, M. Capefigue:

"Rousseau, the poet so long exiled for his impieties and sarcasms, was now growing old. What a change had been operated in him! Proscribed on account of an abominable book attributed to him, the 'Moïsade,' Rousseau had taken refuge in Belgium, and he was expiating in Brussels, by sacred odes and some sublime strophies, the wanderings of his youth. Voltaire had visited him a moment in Belgium; they had been again drawn together by a mutual correspondence, soon suddenly interrupted. They agreed no longer. Voltaire was commencing his career of impiety, Rousseau was ending his."

In the eyes of M. Capefigue, as in the minds of all his co-religionists, it is impiety to defend liberty of thought.

The New Age.—Concluded.

BY W. S. BELL.

Zoology pays no tribute to Samson and the story of his catching three hundred foxes and tying them, two and two, by the tails, and placing firebrands between them, and sending them out to burn up the cornfields of his enemies. However, this perplexed some zoologists until they had discovered the "figurative" character of the story, which may best be explained by a riddle. Two boys going home from school one day, met another boy, and said to him, "Here is a riddle: we two boys have the same father and the same mother, but we are not brothers; now unriddle that if you can." The third boy repeated, "Have the same father and the same mother, and are not brothers?" "Yes, that's what we said." "Dear me, I give it up." "Well, it's a lie," shouted one of the brothers, as he scampered off to get out of harm's way. In like manner, Samson's story, otherwise so perplexing, becomes luminous and instructive.

The science of geography removed the supposition that the earth is as flat as a frying-pan.

"All this is unimportant," we are sometimes told. It was so important in the time of Galileo that upon his bended knees, and with one hand upon the Bible, he was forced to deny and curse the Copernican doctrine.

Not many years afterwards Bruno advocated the rotundity of the earth and its twofold movement, and for advocating such "Atheism" he was burned at the stake.

But when has science ever persecuted a man for his beliefs? It is the glory of science that it needs no thumbscrews to make converts to its ranks. It has no rack upon which to torture those who do not obey its truths. Science does not cut people's tongues out, or their ears off, or crush their feet in iron boots, or flay them alive, or pull out their finger and toe-nails, and thrust needles into the quick. Science has none of these pains and penalties to inflict upon those who reject the light; it simply shines on like the benignant sun, warming the cold hearts and clearing the beclouded minds.

At every point where science comes in conflict with the Bible, the Bible has to give way. Perhaps one of the most persistent contradictions in the Bible, according to orthodox interpretations, is the doctrine of the Trinity. Three gods in one have for a long time passed as a divine mystery. Millions of men, women, and even children have asked, "How can three gods be one god?" The authoritative answer that it is all a "divine mystery" (i. e., figurative) has in most cases hushed them to silence, and discouraged the spirit of inquiry.

Servetus could not be silenced with such an explanation. He rejected the doctrine of "three in one and one in three." And because he could not believe this gross absurdity he was burned for two hours in a slow fire, while the believers in the divine mystery stood by and jeered to see him writhe and die.

Christian morality is not sufficient for the needs of humanity. As John Stuart Mill observes, "Its ideal is negative rather than positive; passive rather than active; innocence rather than nobleness; abstinence from evil rather than energetic pursuit of good. 'Thou shalt not' predominates over 'thou shalt.'"

In addition to this, the doctrine of atonement which leads the murderer upon the gallows to think he is mete for the kingdom of heaven; the doctrine of heaven based upon a selfish love, and the fear of hell grounded upon human weakness and ignorance—these all form a low order of morality, which is invariably motived by selfishness or self-righteousness, and is therefore incompatible with rational morality.

When a man grasps the spirit of science he becomes profoundly impressed with the universality of law. He sees every phenomenon as the result of law; and this conviction of the steadfastness of nature removes all faith in a super-nature or supernatural.

Science, we find, puts religion to no tests which it does not impose upon itself. And it will exempt religion from no tests which it uses in other fields of inquiry.

In the study of comparative religions science has brought out a world of new truth. It is no longer possible for an intelligent person to remain ignorant of the customs, traditions, and religions of other nations. Heretofore it was the habit of each nation to recognize no other gods than their own. This exclusive and egotistic spirit has in a large measure passed away. Think of the blind bigotry which impelled certain people to call themselves the "peculiar people of God." The same spirit has prompted the Christian to talk of saving the world by such chimeras as faith and baptism. What but some form of insanity could ever so possess people as to lead them to call themselves the "peculiar people of God," the children of God, "the righteous," and to stigmatize all others as "sinners," "reprobates," and "heathen?"

Science has rubbed off the galvanism from these pieces of bogus gold, and the poor brass is apparent. The coin will no longer pass current over the counter of the world's thought. So the whole question of religion of the peculiar people of a peculiar God is being slowly but surely melted up in the crucible of science.

Hundreds of ministers are repudiating the pagan hell, "the hell of our fathers." A hundred years ago such a repudiation would have been regarded as rank Atheism. But now these symbols of barbarism are being cast aside. They are called "figurative." So also are the stories about Santa Claus "figurative." The "fall" of Adam is "figurative." The immaculate conception of Jesus is "figurative." His resurrection from the dead and his ascent to heaven are "figurative." In fact, religion as a whole, is entirely too "figurative" to be of service to humanity. The great evil of religion ever has been its unreality, its impracticability, its play upon the imagination. If science can promise no heaven hereafter, it does not threaten miserable man with a never-ending hell. It aims to improve, ennoble, and bless him in this life, advising him to take one world at a time. It takes for its theme education, liberty, humanity. And while it says nothing about the soul, it has much to say and do for the body and mind. Health is of more importance than baptism or confession. Knowledge of this present life is better than a dream of another life.

If the many reforms have done much less than they aimed to accomplish, yet it is a good sign to even hear men talk of reforms. It is the voice of prophecy. These and many other reforms will come in due time. It should be borne in mind also, that if the reformers have been only partially successful, it was the Church which thwarted their efforts.

The Church has been the great obstacle against which all progress has had to contend. She has attempted to silence the tongue of truth and extinguish the light of science by persecution, torture, and death; but in spite of all its bloody persecutions, the cause of Freethought and free manhood has steadily advanced. We are now entering upon a new age, marked by the decay of religion and the reign of science. To a humane heart and a liberty-loving mind the future of humanity looks bright and glorious compared with its past. For the time is coming when humanity will rise above its weakness and attain a dignity in the exaltation of manhood which will put to blush the weakness of man and the wickedness of the gods.

That Itinerant Defender of Christianity.

CLARK BRADEN AGAIN.

Some weeks ago a letter appeared in the Meaford Monitor signed by a Mr. Jay, accusing Mr. Underwood of descending to "blackguardism" during a debate at Denver, Col., between Mr. Underwood and Clark Braden, and asserting that the audiences were composed principally of "rough miners." We answered the letter through the same channel, denying the statements and, we believe rightly, attributing the letters to the fertile imagination of Mr. Braden. Mr. Jay probably never heard of the Denver debate until informed of it by Braden. The following letter and certificate show how false and malicious are such charges against Mr. Underwood.—Ed. Journal.

DENVER, COL., July 13, 1878.

B. F. UNDERWOOD, ESQ., My Dear Sir: Your letter containing clipping from the Meaford (Ont.) Monitor was duly received. I went immediately after the Moderators, two of whom are in the city; the other, Judge Kingsley, left Denver some time ago for the Black Hills. I inclose a statement from the two. Governor King was once the Governor of Kentucky, and is a member of the same denomination with Braden. Judge Shackleford was formerly one of the Judges of the Supreme Court of Tennessee. They both think such a statement as that in the Meaford letter is an outrage on the people of Denver and a gross libel on yourself. I sent you the Times with an article by the reporter, Mr. Jeffries. He is the one you rebuked from the platform. I showed the extract in reference to yourself and Denver, contained in that letter, to some of the committee that arranged the debate on Mr. Braden's side. They hardly think Braden would be guilty of such conduct, and still they don't know how to account for the statement in the letter unless it came from him. They are puzzled over it, but I don't think there is any question at all about it. I showed it to several of the ministers who attended the debate. Rev. Mr. Bliss said it was a gross outrage. Dr. Reed said it was a very unfair statement of the facts, although he thought there could hav been a little more courtesy used by both disputants. Rev. Mr. Eads, Methodist, said the statement is shockingly unfair, though if he were one of the disputants he would hav used different arguments from those Braden used. Indeed, I hav shown the letter to dozens, and they are all indignant. I send you the Moderators' statement, and will send you a protest from several prominent citizens who attended the debate.

Yours truly, JOHN G. JENKINS.

DENVER, COL., July 12, 1878.

JOHN G. JENKINS, Dear Sir: At your request the undersigned, being two of the Moderators in the debate in this city between Messrs. Underwood and Braden, take pleasure in stating that the audience during the debate was composed of some of the best citizens of Denver—ladies and gentlemen of culture and refinement. The very nature of the subject under discussion led to points that involved the propagation of the animal and vegetable kingdoms, but were as delicately handled as the nature of the case permitted. We regard the debate as a very able one, and very instructive, although we disagreed with Mr. Underwood. Respectfully yours, JOHN Q. A. KING.
J. D. SHACKLEFORD.

Here is what the Denver Daily Times thinks of the outrageous attack of Braden upon Mr. Underwood and the people of Denver. The Times says:

"A correspondent of the Meaford (Ont.) Monitor says: 'In the Denver debate Mr. Underwood sustained the character (of a gentleman) only until he . . found that a great portion of his audience were of such a character that he could safely descend to blackguardism with impunity (they being rough miners), then down he went—and there staid until the close of the debate. And it was not until Mr. Braden was assured that the people of Meaford were respectable, and quite above the Denver miners, that he would consent to come here to debate with Mr. Underwood.'

"This is from a letter probably written by Mr. Braden himself, who should be ashamed to so libel the Christian people here who made up his audiences. If it is not from himself, it was in his interest, in a controversy of his, and he must hav known what it was. The absurdity of calling the fashionable audiences who attended the Braden-Underwood debate blackguard miners is as ridiculous and outrageous as anything could be. The audiences through the entire two weeks were the very elite of our church-going people. If that little Canadian village of Meaford, wherever it may be hidden, has a population 'quite above' Denver's, it ought to become the Mecca of all civilized people. Governor King, Judge Shackleford, and Judge Kingsley were the moderators in the debate; and Canada has no better men or finer gentlemen; and had the disputants descended to anything like blackguardism they would have been checked very positively. The sympathy of the Times reporter who attended the debate was against Mr. Underwood to such an extent that that gentleman spoke of it from the stage; but when a slander like the above is published against Mr. Underwood and our best people, he desires to protest in the interest of honesty."

A Veteran Once More in the Field.

A LETTER FROM LUCY COLMAN.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: I am going to write you a letter because I am too full of indignation to keep quiet. If you shall find after its perusal any unrighteous indignation in it, do not let it see the light; otherwise, give it to the public. You know by my appearance at Watkins after the arrests that my whole soul was stirred to its depth because of that outrage.

I was not a member of any Liberal league, always having been satisfied with the Radical Club, which paid no bounty to any National Radical Club for the privilege of existence. We had such a club in active operation several years. It was organized by that indefatigable worker, H. L. Green, who was at that time, with his excellent wife, a resident of our city of Syracuse. C. D. B. Mills was our first Chairman, but after a year, more or less, resigned, and I had the honor to be elected to the place made vacant by his resignation. This position I held more than two years, being chosen every quarter. For aught I know, the choice which made me President so often was satisfactory to Mr. Mills; he surely never voted against me. Mr. Green was the Corresponding Secretary, and John W. Truesdell Treasurer, often paying our entire rent out of his own private pocket. If he (Mr. Truesdell) was not satisfied with me as President, he certainly had a very strange way of showing his disapprobation. When the dreadful small-pox epidemic visited our city in 1875, I was one of its victims. I sent in my unconditional resignation, because the disease was of such a nature that it confined me to the house several months. I do not know of what the Club died, save that the great depression in business scattered many of its members; 'twas hard for the working people (we were mostly of the working class) to pay the expenses of home, and anything in the shape of luxury or entertainment outside of physical necessity had to be given up. I am not a young woman. I was born long enough ago (and into the orthodox Church) to be engaged in the early struggle against a hell of literal fire, in which all unbelievers were to spend an eternity.

Abner Kneeland was one of the victims of that most respectable law against blasphemy. I remember how my blood kindled as I looked in his benignant face and thought of his wrongs. I was a looker-on in Boston when William Lloyd Garrison went to jail as a hiding-place from the mob who wanted his life because he had denounced that most respectable national law by which men and women were held as slaves, permitting men, as in the case of Comstock, to feast their lecherous eyes, and practice their adulterous deeds, on defenseless women and young, unoffending girls, save the offense of a color not "respectable." I have seen a number of mobs, have been honored by being mobbed (your correspondent to the contrary, who talks about "being in scrapes" so strangely) for the slaves' sake three several times. I was the first and for a long time the only woman to whom dear old John Brown communicated his plans for the rescue of these same slaves, thereby becoming particeps criminis in the breaking of another respectable law.

A few years since our Chief of Police in this city issued an edict that any woman found in the street after a certain hour in the evening, without suitable escort, should be arrested. I made it my business to be in the street after that hour, being my own escort, and was not arrested. As men make the laws, I shall not complain if they make them of such character as shall confine them to the house in all hours necessary for their good behavior. My life has been a busy one, and I am tired through and through. I hoped my public work was done, but the imprisonment of Mr. Heywood in Massachusetts, the wrongs done to Mrs. Besant across the water, and then these arrests, one of them of my own sex, have so stirred the dying embers into life that by the force of their heat I am impelled again into the field in opposition to tyranny in this new form; and so on Friday last I said to my sister, Dr. Raymond, a woman true as steel to the right: "Help me to form a Liberal league. Let us lay aside our dislike to some of the features of the organization, and 'remembering those in bonds as bound with them,' put on again the armor, and do what we can for freedom." We started with our paper, and naturally decided to ask the old officers of the Radical Club to put their names first on the list. We called on Mr. Truesdell, knowing that he was liberal with money and we should get a dollar, and perhaps more, with his name. To my astonishment he informed me that there was already a Liberal League formed, and he was a member. What I said to Mr. Truesdell is not the world's business. I said what I thought my duty, for I immediately took in the whole trick. Mr. Truesdell does not set himself up as above tricks—perhaps believes in them—plays some pretty sharp ones on the Spiritualists, and to his own conscience stands or falls; but that the first President of the Radical Club of Syracuse would stoop to political trickery to help Mr. Abbot keep himself in power by leagues gotten up so silently that only the requisite number to get the charter are obtained—and some of them pledged to secresy—the delegates pledged to vote for Mr. Abbot and against the repeal of this most "respectable" postal law—a man whom I had supposed above and beyond doing a mean or treacherous thing! Is human nature never to be trusted? Ah me! I am soul sick.

I hav been bereaved by death of all my immediate friends; only one sister remains to me; husband, child—all gone. This same man has sat by the bedside of some of my dying ones, has stood in the room consecrated by their deaths, and has spoken words of faith and trust so grand and noble that my admiration has been without measure for him and his words. Had you asked me to name a man true to justice, far above double-dealing, I would hav written his name so large, in letters golden, that all men and women could not hav failed to recognize wherever published. Henceforth let his name in such connection be written thus:

I asked Mr. Truesdell to show me the list of names. Of course he could not refuse; perhaps he did not wish to refuse. And again, Oh! how sharp the pain as I read, "Matilda Joslyn Gage." Can it be that she was privy to that trick—she who is working for woman's enfranchisement? Is she also a trickster? Does Mrs. Gage remember how she has suffered by being "left out" because, forsooth, she belonged to the original woman's rights party, and by her presence and voice might reveal the actual design of some assemblage not radical or brave enough to do its work without "respectable" on its face? I will hope she was not in the secret, but her name has never yet been soiled by its association with mine. I would not hav given my name to a Liberal league that by a trick would hav kept her name off from it and herself out of it.

I hav not taken The Index for some time. I found it did not suit me. Neither did THE TRUTH SEEKER meet my wishes. But I was glad to hav them published for those who did like them. Even the Banner of Light no doubt speaks volumes to those people who hav faith in its sayings; but I hav no need for it. I wish the article in its pages quite recently published, concerning our Radical Club, had been somewhere truthful; but such statements are of small moment. The Word I had never even seen till its editor was imprisoned to make the world respectable; but to-day I take both THE TRUTH SEEKER and The Word because I believe their editors to be honest men, working for freedom of thought and utterance, for honest money, and the elevation of the working men and women of the present and the future. They are persecuted for conscience' sake all in the name of purity and chastity, and, greatest of all, respectability. I believe with all my heart in character so firm that it cannot be bribed with money or soiled by the tricks of a politician.

We hav formed our league, and call it "The J. Stuart Mill League of Syracuse," with twenty-two good, honest names, obtained without stealth, leaving no one unasked because not free enough, or refusing the name because too free. The world needs workers for its redemption. This "splitting hairs" of difference had better be given up, and instead make of them all, unsplit, a beautiful mattress on which the tired and wayworn may rest. We hav sent the money for our charter, with twenty-two names of good, honest men and women, half of them of the old Club. I hope of the five who may be chosen to represent us at the National League not one will fail to vote conscientiously, without fear or hindrance. Jesuitism out of the Ro oish Church is even more hateful than in. I am for Freethought without limitation, always spoken openly and with honesty.

ON ONE of the Prussian railroads willows hav been grown with advantage on the slopes of excavations and embankments. It is surprising that a similar method of beautifying and strengthening the roadways of railways is not more generally adopted. A perfect network is formed by the roots, binding the whole surface firmly and preventing washouts, and the thick green growth covers ugly gashes in the earth and unsightly elevations with an agreeable, eye-relieving thicket. Almost any of the varieties of willow can be used with success, but that which is recommended as the best is the Salix amygdalina. In dry soil the cuttings should hav a good length underground.

Misstatements Corrected.

In the eleven columns of labored special pleading for and in defense of Comstock's pet laws—by which a most obnoxious consorship of the press is to be kept up and a system of espionage maintained which no lover of liberty can tolerate—which have appeared in The Index in its last two issues, the editor, as usual, made several inaccuracies of statement and employed arguments the fallacy of which should be exposed. We can notice but a few of them now.

I. He asserts, what he has said before, that a repeal of the Comstock laws is impossible, but that a reform or modification is very practical. To perceive the fallacy of this argument it has only to be examined. In the first place, the editor has not the slightest grounds for making such an assertion or means of knowing it if it is true. If a law is bad, the most rational cure is to repeal it and remove it from the statute books. The effort to modify or "reform" it, when there is not a feature in it worth preserving, is excessively foolish and unworthy to be made. If a man's pet dog has gone mad, and is trying to bite the children and other members of the family, the best thing that can be done is to kill the animal at once, to remove from him the possibility of scattering torture and death among all within his reach. That is a kind of repeal far more effective than all the temporizing, modifying, or "reforming" that a dozen Index editors could suggest. Whatever is an evil and whose effects are only evil should be suppressed—utterly destroyed.

So far as the possibility of repealing a bad law as compared with remodeling or reforming it is concerned, the odds are altogether in favor of repealing. If it is decided that a law is bad, the right way to do with it is to repeal it. There is far more difficulty in doctoring it up, fixing it over, changing it, lopping off here and adding there. If repealed, thousands would be suited; if changed or "reformed," the chances are that nobody would be satisfied. The best way to reform a mad dog, or a horse with the glanders, is to knock him in the head. That is the only kind of reform that would meet the case, and it is much the same with the Comstock postal laws. They should be totally wiped off the books. If they be expurgated and anything else is needed, the same can be devised anew much easier than to try to make anything acceptable of those Comstock abortions. The fact is apparent that there was no necessity for those laws, that the entire indecent literature of the country had been seized and confiscated before Comstock procured the passage of his laws, and since their passage they hav effected nothing save to act as an engine with which he has deprived honest men of their property, their liberty, and their lives. Comstock boasts that he has driven fifteen persons to suicide, and it has been estimated that at least fifteen more hav otherwise been driven out of the world. Hundreds of thousands of dollars hav in the aggregate been cruelly wrung from those who could ill afford to spare it, and all by the means of these very Comstock laws which The Index man is so anxious to hav retained upon our statute book, and which he would make all Liberals to shout for, nolens volens.

We repeat, there are no good grounds for saying that it is impossible to repeal these laws, but that they can easily be modified. There are thousands of people not in the Liberal ranks who are opposed to those laws, and a persistent effort on the part of the Liberals of the country, with others equally opposed to Comstockism, will ultimately secure their repeal. But The Index editor is probably to be credited with the failure in the effort at repeal made last winter At the very time when the petitions were being signed all over the country, he opposed the movement with all his ability, and kept it up during the session of Congress, producing a lamentable schism in the Liberal ranks, and also preventing such action by Congress as would otherwise hav taken place. Had a bold, undivided front been maintained by all the Liberals of the country, the effect would hav been very different from that produced by presenting divided and contending factions. The editor of The Index is mainly responsible for this state of things. But for his factious and persistent efforts, the business might very possibly long ago hav been settled in the interest of liberty and free mails, and the Liberals might hav been saved a very unfortunate division.

II. Mr. Abbot says, "The 'repeal' position, if generally taken by Liberals, would reduce to absurdity all the efforts ever made in the Liberal cause; it would show that, as a body, they are utterly incapable of any statesmanlike or philosophical view of public affairs, or even of their own interests." Few things more absurd than this could be uttered, and what unblushing assurance for that man to claim that he, par excellence, possesses statesmanlike and philosophical views! Such is the conclusion we are forced to, as he is the great leader in the opposition to repeal and the principal stirrer-up of faction in that direction. Nearly all the seventy thousand who signed the petition last winter were in favor of repeal, and we know that large numbers of them are persons of intelligence and worth, but according to this cultured editor, he and his diminutive clique are the only ones, in all the Liberal ranks, who possess statesmanlike and philosophical views. There's modesty for you.

III. The statement that "the repeal position, if generally taken by Liberals, would reduce to absurdity all the efforts ever made in the Liberal cause," is intensely false. The result would be nothing of the kind. Opposing a miserable censorship and a detestable system of espionage, and advocating free speech, free discussion, a free press, and free mails, will not reduce to an absurdity all efforts heretofore made in the Liberal cause, but, on the other hand, will assist them and add glory to them.

IV. The statement is equally false that the welfare of the Liberal League depends upon the adoption of Mr. Abbot's platform; but the contrary is the truth. If free speech, a free press, free mails, and opposition to Comstockism, are the watchword and enter into the purposes of the League, its career will be far more glorious than in sustaining the efforts of our enemies to suppress the highest principles of liberty. If the League is to be saddled with the horrible incubus of the support of Comstock's unconstitutional postal law, its days of good are numbered, and it can be supported but by a moiety of the Liberals of the country. Let the wise and prudent minds among us decide whether this state of things is desirable.

V. Mr. Abbot again says, "It was not 'orthodoxy' which enacted the Comstock laws, though orthodoxy may now gladly avail itself of them for purposes of its own; the real author of those laws was the people's conscience, outraged by the crimes which the laws condemn." It is most singular that a man who professes so much morality, virtue, and culture should so far forget himself as to utter such a naked and barefaced falsehood. This entire sentence contains nothing but the grossest untruth. The Comstock laws were enacted at the direct instance of orthodoxy. Anthony Comstock went to Washington backed by the Young Men's Christian Association of this city, and it was he who procured the passage of those laws. The conscience of the people did not call for them at all. The people did not wish any such laws passed, and did not know they had been enacted until they were enrolled upon the statute books of our country; and there are hundreds of thousands of people scattered all over the land who to-day do not know that such an infamous set of acts help to make up the laws of their country; and when they are told that an honorable, intelligent, law-abiding citizen and editor is now serving out a sentence of two years in prison, at hard labor, for sending through the mails a little pamphlet containing not an improper sentence or an indecent word, they will not believe it. They will indignantly tell you that such a law cannot exist in this free country, and it surely ought not to.

We say again, the conscience of the people had nothing to do with the passage of the Comstock laws, but he and the orthodox Young Men's Christian Association had all to do with it, and it is such a man as F. E. Abbot who is going to all lengths to sustain those laws, and who would, had he the power, compel every Liberal in the land to bow in allegiance to them. It is only necessary to become acacquainted with the manner in which those laws were rushed through Congress to understand how much the conscience of the people had to do with their passage. Those laws were enacted by the Forty-second Congress, which distinguished itself by the passage of the law for "back pay," or "salary grab," increase of salaries of its own members, as well as doubling the salary of the President and many other officials. Much of the time of the session, from its commencement in December, 1872, to March, 1873, was spent in trying to see how to steal the people's money and how much of it could be transferred to their own pockets. There was an unusual amount of drunkenness and immorality in that session. Since the foundation of our Governmen there has not been a more dishonest, disgraceful, and worse-than-useless session.

During the forty-second session of Congress four hundred and fifty-nine acts were passed in all, and many of them of a most culpable character; but far more than half of these, to wit, two hundred and fifty acts, were rushed through in the few expiring hours of the session, amid confusion, uproar, and drunkenness of the members that would hav disgraced a madhouse. In the disorder and confusion that prevailed it was utterly impossible for one member in ten to know anything of the nature of the bills he voted for. The titles of the bills were barely read and not understood at all by a very large proportion of the members. There was no time for a moment's examination or discussion; they had to be put through on the "double-quick," or they would utterly fail. As it was, the session was prolonged into Sunday to the extent that their acts were really illegal. It was similar with the placing of the President's signature to the bills; he did not even wait to have their titles read to him, but signed one after another as fast as possible, and as his clerk handed them to him. In this way were the Comstock laws enacted; they were among those that were rushed through the house in those last moments. It was known by a few of the influential Christian members that the Young Men's Christian Association wished them passed, and that was all that was necessary; they went through in a crazy rush, without attention, examination, or consideration. This is what the editor of The Index calls the act of the "people's conscience." A more false assertion could not be made. It was the work of the orthodoxy headed by Anthony Comstock and by nobody else. The conscience of the people had nothing to do with it, and we defy the editor of The Index to show to the contrary.

VI. The cultured editor says: "The 'repeal' position is utterly wrong in principle. It denies the essential criminality of attempts to propagate the most destructive and disgusting vices among the young. It denies the right of the nation to legislate against this crime in a province where there cannot possibly be any other legislation against it, namely, in the national postal system." Here are three falsehoods in this short extract. The "repeal" position is not wrong in principle. When a bad law is passed by any legislative body, it is right to repeal it as soon as practicable. It does not deny the criminality of attempts to publish and circulate, in any way, obscene and really vile publications, but it objects to the U. S. mail being made a police organization or a system of espionage for the detection of a class of crimes with which the United States Government has nothing to do. Obscenity should be left to the states to punish, the same as libel, larceny, perjury, forgery, arson, highway robbery, burglary, manslaughter, murder, etc. It is just as improper for Congress to busy itself as to how to detect and punish obscenity as how to detect and punish chicken-stealing, horse-stealing, or the obstruction of gutters in this city. These are matters with which the General Government has nothing to do, and it transcends the powers conferred upon it by the people when it attempts anything of the kind. The repeal party are in favor of leaving the punishment of obscenity to the action of the common law, the same as other crimes. There is not the slightest necessity for the General Government to commit an unconstitutional act to punish obscenity. This country got along exceedingly well, both in states and territories, for nearly a hundred years without any such kind of laws being passed by the General Government as Comstock has procured; and it is only since those laws hav been placed on our statute books that trouble in this line has been felt. And it was wholly unnecessary, for, as we hav said before, the obscene publications which some three men had gotten up in this city, were all seized and suppressed before those infamous laws disgraced our country. They were gotten up to establish a spy system in our mail service, and to make it easy to oppress and punish heresy in the name of obscenity, as we hav abundantly seen.

VII. The Index again says: "If you demand total repeal of the Comstock laws, you necessarily demand total immunity for the villains who formerly used, and would immediately again use, the United States mails as the channel of a business every whit as murderous as would be the importation and sale of infected clothing from the yellow fever districts of the South." Nothing of the kind is true. We demand no impunity for the publishers of and dealers in anything criminal. We leave them to the action of the laws which were found amply sufficient to drive out all the obscenity the country has been cursed with, and with very little difficulty. If The Index tells the truth, how is it that obscene matter was not passing through the mails up to the time that the Comstock laws went into operation, while it is a well known fact, as already stated, that all that stuff was suppressed a year before the passage of those laws? The Index man has not the slightest grounds for saying that if those laws were repealed, the mails would again be filled with obscene matter. If the state laws are duly executed there will be not only nothing of the kind sent through the mails, but it will not be sent by any other mode of transportation nor be published at all. It would be well could the truth be introduced into the head of The Index editor, that the Comstock postal laws can only reach obscenity that is sent through the mails, while the state laws are far more efficient, and stop it by mail, by express, by freight, selling it over the counter, the transferring it from one to another in any way, the selling of it, and the publishing of it. He will then understand the superiority of the state laws over the postal laws, even were the latter constitutional. The mails are no more sacred than the express lines, freight routes, steamboats, canal boats, or the mode of passing it from hand to hand. And the cultured editor should be able to comprehend the fact that obscenity is a crime, not because it is sent through the mails, but because it is obscenity and is sold or conveyed in any possible way.

VIII. The same paper says: "Repeal is in the highest degree impolitic, because it is absolutely impossible, and because the demand for this impossibility will only postpone indefinitely all change for the better in the existing laws." This is the very essence of untruth. The Comstock laws are notoriously bad, and their repeal is both politic and possible. And again, the demand for the repeal does not postpone the change for the better. The effort that has been made for repeal has done much good. Comstockism is greatly checked. His vile operations hav been exposed to the public eye; he has become obnoxious to the courts and to the public; he has not this year made one-third as many arrests as two years ago, and does not secure one-fifth part as many convictions. Had The Index man worked as hard against Comstock and his laws as he has for them, had he co-operated with the body of the Liberals of the country as zealously as he has opposed them, and had the true facts been generally placed before the people of the country, those laws would not to-day disgrace our statute books.

IX. The same editor again says, "The repeal position tends to strengthen Anthony Comstock and his hold on power; because it tends to keep the tyrannical abuses of it out of sight." More positive untruth. The effort at repeal, on the other hand, has shorn Comstock of much of his power. It is not one-fourth as great as before the effort at repeal was made. The more he is shown up—the better he is understood—the less his power becomes. It is utterly false to say that the effort at repeal tends to keep his abuses out of sight. The opposite is the truth.

X. Again we quote: "The advocates of 'repeal' take the attitude of demanding absolute immunity both for Freethinkers and obscenity-mongers at the same time." This is barely and meanly false. No immunity has been demanded for obscenity-mongers. We wish them punished by the legitimate and efficient state laws, and not in an unconstitutional manner by the Comstock postal laws. We do not wish to see the Constitution violated and the rights of freemen trampled under foot for the sake of prosecuting or persecuting any class of men.

XI. Again let the cultured editor speak: "The repeal position is most disastrous to the Liberal cause, and would prove to be utterly ruinous if it were taken unanimously." A more false statement could not be made. No disaster has arisen to the Liberal cause in consequence of asking for the repeal of the Comstock laws. It was the only sensible step on the subject that Liberals and freemen could consistently take. The great disaster has come from the course the editor of The Index, and a few as narrow-minded as himself, hav taken to oppose the wishes of a large majority. It is a great pity that that cultured editor has been so influenced by envy, jealousy, and malice as to lead him to take such a foolish course in opposing the tens of thousands who totally disapprove of the Comstock laws. It was such a course as was inevitably calculated to bring disaster in its train. Had he been broad enough and magnanimous enough to work fraternally with those who were honestly and earnestly struggling to perform a good work, it would hav been vastly better for himself and for the Liberal cause. Upon the head of Francis E. Abbot justly rests the condemnation of having brought upon the Liberal cause the greatest evil that has befallen it for the last quarter of a century.

XII. Mr. Abbot, once more, says: "If, therefore, the Liberals as a whole should declare themselves in favor of utterly repealing all laws against obscenity, or merely the United States laws, they will inevitably be considered by the general community as favoring vice and obscenity, since that would be the certain consequence of such repeal. They will be presumed to intend the consequences of their own acts, and be judged accordingly." Here are sophistry and heartlessness in about equal proportions, revealing the real animus that has all along impelled this apostle of culture and respectability. He would not condemn a law, no matter how unconstitutional it may be, lest the "general community"—Mrs. Grundy, Miss McFlimsey, Mr. Gunnybags, and Mr. Creamcheese—might turn up their delicate and fastidious noses and think somebody is in favor of obscenity. This is the real position of Mr. Abbot. He would rather that the Constitution should be violated and the rights of the people disregarded than that he and his should not, by the leaders in society, Mrs. Grundy & Co., be regarded as respectable. He places respectability and the recognition of community far above both the Constitution and the principles of liberty. If that is the position that Liberals are to take, we are gone. If we are to be governed by that cowardly, hypocritical, contemptible policy, we are disgraced forever. We can retain neither our own respect nor the respect of any honorable, brave, high-minded man.

There are numerous other points upon which Mr. Abbot's assertions and positions are false and untenable equally with those already considered, but we cannot take the time now to review them and expose their fallacy. His premises being false, his conclusions are bound to be false. When his labored article of eleven columns is dissected and analyzed in the light of truth, his arguments and reasoning will be found superficial, sophistical, hollow, and frivolous; and it is a pity that any honest, well-disposed Liberal should be misled by them.

We will refrain from further criticisms at this time, and will close by giving our readers a letter from a no less distinguished person than the able historian, biographer, and literateur, James Parton. It was written to our friend, T. B. Wakeman, by whose permission we lay it before our readers. It bears directly upon the topics we have been discussing.

"NEWBURYPORT, MASS., Sept. 29, 1878.

"MY DEAR FRIEND: I think those Comstock laws, as they are very properly called, ought to be totally repealed, and for these reasons:

"1. Because they are Comstock laws, and not the deliberate judgment of Congress.

"2. Because they are useless. The forbidden articles can still be sent everywhere by express.

"3. Because it is not possible to put into human language a definition of the word obscene which shall let the Song of Solomon, Rabelais, Juvenal, and Tom Jones pass, and keep out works intended and calculated to corrupt.

"4. Because the control of the Government over the mails is obviously limited to what you well style 'postal reasons.' Dynamite may be excluded; sealing wax may be excluded; liquids may be excluded—because they endanger the fulfillment of the contract with all the other senders of mail matter. But the Government is not called upon to sit in judgment upon the moral character or intellectual quality of the parcels entrusted to it.

"5. Because the laws in question are so liable to abuse by a narrow-minded or provincial officer. They enable the prim and prudish village to judge and condemn the metropolis.

"6. Because the state laws and municipal laws, previously and now existing, are sufficient for the detection and punishment of all real offenders against decency and good morals.

"With regard to the constitutional argument, so ably and powerfully presented by yourself, I can only say, being no lawyer, that it seems to be unanswerable. It came upon my mind with convincing power, and I have never had a doubt since. These laws are wrong every way, and pernicious in many ways. You know how I hate and loathe the books and papers that circulate among boys, which can have no other than a corrupting effect. I could join, heart and hand, in hanging a wretch who, for a little money, would either write, or publish, or sell such works. And yet it seems to me that the espionage of the mails by an illiterate person is even a worse evil than that. It menaces the very citadel of liberty.

"Yes, I go for immediate and unconditional repeal; and this has been my feeling ever since reading your masterly speech delivered in Faneuil Hall last summer.

"Very truly yours, JAMES PARTON."

Letter from Mr. Wakeman to The Index.

The following letter seems so sound and clear upon the subject which it treats, and which has engaged the attention of Liberals for some months past, that we think we cannot do better than to lay it before our readers.

NEW YORK, Sept. 22, 1878.

To the Editor of The Index: I do not know that I shall be a delegate to the Liberal League Congress; and as you call for "public discussion" very pressingly in your last issue (Sept. 19), let me state the position of those you oppose so decidedly, at least as far as I understand it.

There is, as I see, no material difference as to "principles." All are in favor of liberty, and opposed to obscenity. The difference arises in the application of the principles. The question practically is, How far is it Constitutional and safe to liberty to employ the National instead of the State Governments in attempts to define, discover, and punish obscenity? Nobody in the League proposes to repeal all State laws on the subject, so as to "foster obscenity," or to run the League in the interests of Freelove. Insinuations of this kind can do no good.

Those you choose to regard as opponents believe:

1. That the Constitution of the United States confers upon Congress no power whatever to legislate upon this subject; that its attempts so to do in the Comstock postal laws are beyond even any "implied powers," and are plain usurpations, which break down the whole Constitution as the bulwark of liberty, and in the words of Hon. Elizur Wright, leave it "not worth two brass buttons;" that those laws are a decoy and espionage system over the post-office; that they hav been the source of great wrongs and injustice; and that they cannot be amended so as to be safe and constitutional, and should therefore be repealed.

2. That the power to suppress obscenity and indecency is one of the general powers reserved in the United States Constitution to the people and the States, and that it should be exercised by the Legislature and courts with the greatest caution, only in "unequivocal and well-defined cases," and plainly within the Constitutions of the several States.

These positions hav been clearly and repeatedly stated by a large part of the Liberals of the country. They are in the petition signed by seventy thousand, asking the repeal of the Comstock postal laws. They were affirmed when presented at the great meeting at Faneuil Hall, called to protest against the conviction of Mr. Heywood. They were reaffirmed decidedly at the Watkins Convention, and appear at length in the resolutions there adopted. They hav been in substance approved by a large part, and I believe, nearly all of the Liberal press. I do not therefore feel called upon by your challenge to go over the whole story again. A large edition of my speech at the Faneuil Hall Meeting has been circulated, and covers the main points. No one has as yet pointed out any error in its law or practical recommendations; but, on the contrary, letters from leading Liberals and lawyers have been a constant assurance that the positions there taken are sound and safe. In order to do my part in the "public discussion" I will gladly send to any one, who will honor me with address and a three cent stamp, a copy of that speech (including Judge Field's opinion) and the Watkins Resolutions. All I ask is a fair and impartial study of them, and I believe but one conclusion can result. If the tone of the speech should appear too warm for a legal opinion, let it be remembered that it was delivered at a crowded indignation meeting, and should be forgiven if it has a touch of its spirit.

On the first page of The Index referred to, the repeal of these postal laws is spoken of as a "whim," or an effort to get the Supreme Court to "reverse itself," for which "editors" in jail are supposed "to wait." This levity seems to me unintelligent and ill-timed. I think you will find that those most earnest for "repeal" hav been the most earnest for the pardon of the editor, and most active in circulating his petition. Why should they not at the same time ask for the repeal of the law? That law is in truth a real danger, and its repeal not a mere whim. Nearly every case of wrong and outrage by Comstock has been perpetrated under that unconstitutional postal law. Out of thirty cases I hav looked over, only two or three hav been under the State laws, and only one conviction. Scarcely one of the outrages would have been possible in a State court. I have known of men hunted to death under this law, and one imprisoned for ten years, and fined $5.000; and Heywood is in prison yet! This is a substantial whim to those who suffer, and I feel indignant at the indifference of those who call themselves Liberals in regard to it. Even if they hav no regard for constitutional safeguards, or a free post-office, they ought to consider the causeless misery and ruin of their fellow-beings as more than a whim. I show in the speech referred to that the only safety for liberty is to get the whole subject out of this usurped United States jurisdiction. There is no way in which these laws could be safely amended, even if they were constitutional. The iniquity is in their use—that is, in the decoy and espionage system which is their very substance; and the only safety is in their "repeal," which is no "empty honor," but a pressing necessity.

Nor is there any intention of getting the Supreme Court "to reverse itself." The action of that court in the Jackson case has made it necessary to reverse the court by the action of Congress, that is, by the repeal of the law, which will do it effectively. I mention half-a-dozen instances where this has been done with perfect success, in our national history; and it can be done again if our Liberals have the traditions of liberty in their hearts, instead of a causeless obscenity panic. The political position of the Liberals now is quite similar to that of the Republicans after the Dred Scott decision, but our case is clearer than theirs. All we have to do is to stand firmly by the Constitution and the liberties of the people; as I have pointed out was done by Jefferson, Jackson, and Lincoln, and the Supreme Court will not be long in the way.

The above are all of the objections I find in your paper to the position I hav stated, and these were in a side paragraph. A few words are due in regard to the application of the "principles" proposed by the majority of the officers of the League in their "Card." The only matter of difference is in the second plank, and the wording of the first sentence astonishes me. It goes far beyond anything that any court, or even Mr. Comstock, has ever assumed or claimed, and seems to me to be the work of some one strangely ignorant of the subject. It distinctly claims that it is "the right and duty of Congress and of the national courts to pass and to inforce laws to suppress the circulation of obscene literature, including the exclusion of such literature from the United States mails."

The first and main part of this sentence forces the jurisdiction of the whole subject upon the United States Government. I pray to be shown a single word of the Constitution that authorizes anything of this kind. It has never been even claimed. An amendment to the Constitution will certainly be necessary to confer this absolute and preposterous power. Was the Liberal League organized for this purpose? If not, this plank is useless in its platform. As to the second part of the sentence, i. e., as to postal exclusion which it proposed to "include" in the larger jurisdiction, I hav disposed of that in the speech referred to until some answer is made to it.

So, also, as to attempts to define, discover, and punish obscenity under State laws, I will say nothing further than to refer to the documents named. Danger to liberty still lurks even there; and I hope, Mr. Editor, you will try your hand in framing a statute that will give us a clear and safe definition.

In conclusion, let me express the belief that the "Card" of the Directors of the League has no justification in fact as they suppose. If there had been any caucus, plot, ticket, or concerted action of any kind I should hav known of it beyond doubt; and I hav heard of nothing of the kind. Notwithstanding my differences on this one point mentioned, I hav favored the re-election of Mr. Abbot; and I had hoped that the Freethinkers' Assocciation of this State would be consolidated with the League so as to save the expense and time required to keep up two associations. If this could be done, the political affairs of the Liberal cause would certainly find strength in unity. On the other hand, that is on the "spiritual side," the Free Religious Association could be extended so as to largely replace the functions which the old churches and religions hav performed. Why may not this dream be realized? There is nothing in the present dispute that should prevent co-operation of Liberals. True, it is an important question of constitutional law and of public policy, but it really involves no principle. Let us find out what is true and what is best to be done about it, and not threaten to retire or talk about the League being assassinated.

Very respectfully yours, T. B. WAKEMAN,
No. 93 Nassau St., N. Y. City. Counselor-at-law.

To this letter, which we think our readers must decide is able and fair, the editor of The Index attempts some reply; but if the reply presents the same ability and fairness contained in the letter, we fail to perceive it. We will quote the essential parts:

"We deem it proper, however, to say that the 'whim' referred to by Mr. Wakeman he has failed to understand. Both the 'repeal' and the 'reform' positions emphasize equally the need of protection for complete liberty; but 'repeal' asks also for the abrogation of all United States laws against obscenity, which is more than is required to protect liberty. This more is the 'whim' we referred to very plainly; we see no cause to misunderstand it, or to complain of it when understood. Mr. Wakeman is entirely in error in the construction he puts upon it.

"He appears to us equally careless in the construction he puts on the second principle of the 'Card,' which (of course through the merest carelessness) he has entirely misquoted. It was not intended 'to force the jurisdiction of the whole subject upon the United States Government;' nor do we think the wording at all suggests any such extravagant position. But we take this opportunity to state that the platform in the 'Card' is not proposed at all for adoption in that form by the League; it simply states the principles of the signers, which will be fully 'approved' if the League in any manner adopts unequivocally, by a simple majority vote, the policy of seeking to 'reform,' and not to 'repeal,' the Comstock laws. The League is only expected to decide between these two policies again, as it did decide between them at Philadelphia. Similar resolutions at Syracuse would be the only 'approval' contemplated."

"Repeal" does ask for the abrogation of the United States laws upon obscenity because they are unconstitutional; BECAUSE THEY ARE WRONG. The General Government has no more right to legislate about obscenity than about horse-stealing, how many days a man shall work on the highway, or how many feet on the sidewalks in our cities a tenant may occupy. The General Government has no more to do with what we may write in a letter or with the moral character of what we send through the mails than it has with deciding how many children a man and wife may hav, whether they shall be equally boys and girls, at what age they shall commence going to school, and whether the girls shall study arithmetic or not.

The great difficulty with Mr. Abbot seems to be to comprehend that there are limits to the province and powers of the General Government so far as law-making is concerned. He seems to think Congress has the right to pass all the laws that a state or city government may enact. Nothing can be more untrue. Congress has its legitimate province, state legislatures hav theirs, and municipalities and city councils hav theirs, and they each hav no right to infringe upon the rights of the other. Congress has no more right to enact laws for the punishment of obscenity than it has to legislate whether the people of New Jersey shall paint their schoolhouses red or white, or whether the division fence between two farmers in Michigan shall be ten rails high, and how it shall be kept in repair; whether the bridge over Squawdunk creek shall be of oak or pine. The General Government receives certain powers from the people by virtue of the Constitution, and further than this it has no right to go. There cannot be found in the Constitution a word conveying to Congress the power to make laws about obscenity. It is wholly a sectarian usurpation and imposition.

Mr. Abbot affects that Mr. Wakeman made a serious mistake in quoting the language in the candidate editor's second plank, and says the same was "entirely misquoted." The transposition of the words "to pass" is not at all essential and makes little or no change in the meaning. It is only a hypercritical mind, or a drowning man catching at straws, that would magnify such trivialities into affairs worthy of notice. Mr. Abbot's proposition does precisely what Mr. Wakeman asserts that it does. It distinctly claims that it is the right and duty of Congress and of the national courts to pass and enforce laws to suppress the circulation of obscene literature, including the exclusion of such literature from the United States mails.

It, however, is worthy of attention, and it should not be lost sight of by the reader, that in that second plank, introduced with such a flourish, the candidate editor and his three candidate compatriots distinctly make the proposition that a Congress shall hav the right to pass, and the national courts shall enforce, laws to suppress the circulation of obscene literature, including the exclusion of such literature from the United States mails." On this plank they declare they will stand; on this plank they ask to be re-elected to the offices they now hold, and, in addition, they horrify us by positively asserting that unless that plank is accepted by the National League they will not be candidates.

The demand here made is more monstrous than will be noticed by the casual reader. Mr. Wakeman is quite correct in saying that this demand virtually calls for an amendment of the Constitution; for that document contains not one word imparting to Congress and the national courts such power. Is it really true, then, that Mr. Abbot and his three companions in office are determined to commit the Liberal League to demanding an amendment of the Constitution in order that Congress may pass laws against obscenity and the national courts may enforce them, and that upon the failure of the League to accede to that demand the valorous four will positively refuse further to be candidates?

If there is any meaning at all in the first part of that second plank, it is that Congress and the national courts shall pass and enforce laws to suppress the circulation of obscene literature; and as the Constitution confers no such right, it must be amended before they can legally perform this labor. This astounding demand is doubtless greater than the astute editor and would-be President really intended, and is a greater contract than he will be able to carry out. He will hardly be able to induce the Liberals of the country to demand an amendment of the Constitution, that Congress may pass laws to suppress obscenity. If he gave the subject due thought, he could not mean anything less. He certainly meant something greater than excluding obscene literature from the mails, for after stating the major part of his proposition, or "plank," he continues: "Including the exclusion of such literature from the United States mails." As Mr. Wakeman says, this latter part of the plank, touching the exclusion of obscene matter from the mails, is necessarily subordinate and inferior to the first part, which demands that Congress and the U. S. Courts shall pass and "enforce laws to suppress the circulation of obscene literature," because the first part of the plank includes the latter. Whatever includes something must be larger than the thing included.

The editor, however, evidently wishes now to evade the force of his own language, for he says: "The 'card' is not proposed at all for adoption in that form by the League." In issuing this pronunciamento he doubtless meant just what he said, or he would not have made it imperative that the League must accept his plank on pain of losing him for a candidate should they refuse. His friends, however, agree that it would hav been vastly better had the candidate-editor not have issued that "card," or especially the second plank of it, and, in place of it, hav let so much of his paper been blank. But great men have made mistakes before.

"Let the Galled Jade Wince."

MR. EDITOR: It has been my good fortune heretofore to hav no personal public quarrels with any of my fellow-Liberals, and, as you are aware, it is not my fault that the "Monroe doctrine" has come before your readers. I was compelled to defend my name against the aspersions of one whom I cherished as a friend, and as I did not hesitate to call things by their right names, the editor of the Seymour Weakly Times has drawn his quill, never to lay it down until we cry "Hold, enough!" We sought no war with Dr. Monroe. He began the attack by slandering us without cause; and after we defended ourselves before the Liberal public in the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER, he has renewed his misrepresentations, and is attempting to justify his slanders by heaping upon us, and upon all Liberals of the land who disagree with him on the Comstock business, additional calumny.

This is a strange position for a Liberal editor to assume. How will it read, "Dr. J. S. Monroe, champion of the Comstock Inquisition?" How close his sympathies run to the religious part of society may be judged by his own language: "Thousands of good Christian people read the Times. There is n't a man nor woman in Indiana, in or out of the churches, that would do us harm, even if there were no law in the land." If the Christians are his best friends, the reason is plain—he is their friend as opposed to the progress of the Liberal movement. The great misfortune in the Doctor's case is, he does not know what he is writing about, and he may be so slow to see his error that his wit will be bought at a high price. Josh Billings once said, "It is better not to know so much than to know so many things that aint so."

In attempting to defend his abuse of us he has assumed the defense of the Comstock laws, and charges those who were arrested at Watkins with being the "champions of Freelove;" and those who think we were unjustly dealt with must share the same accusation of being "champions of Freelove." But the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER are too well acquainted with the Comstock persecutions to take fright at this false alarm. They learned long ago that the arrests made at Watkins had nothing to do with the question of Freelove. The Convention passed no resolutions on that subject, nor were any lectures given upon it. The Convention was one of the most peaceful and catholic spirited that hav ever convened in this country. No one was excluded on account of his opinions upon religion, politics, or social reforms. Assembled there were Atheists, Materialists, Spiritualists, Positivists, Shakers, Quakers, Methodists, Presbyterians, orthodox, and many others of various beliefs. The largest liberty was granted to all. Ministers were invited to the stand to speak in opposition to Freethought, and such invitations were accepted. And an equal liberty was given to others to sell books treating upon social questions. Liberty of speech and liberty of the press were the main planks of our platform. Unless we had thus taken broad grounds our Convention would have contracted itself into some sort of narrow sectarianism, as Materialists, Spiritualists, Liberal Leaguers, or something of that sort. But the broadest liberty is not compatible with the mutual admiration style of doing business. Personal freedom means liberty to those who differ from us on radical questions; and without such liberty the Watkins Convention would hav been a farce. But according to the "Monroe doctrine," all this talk and work in the ranks of Freethought is only a cover for Freelove—it was a Freelove Convention, and the leaders of it went there expecting to be arrested: "Of course, all the above-named parties were arrested, as they knew they would be, and no doubt wanted to be." Now this charitable way of imputing bad motives to good men and women is just a trifle off color; but it is passing strange that one whose very soul goes out for peace and harmony should attempt to cross Jordan on such a bridge. While in the pious act of flinging mud at us, he benevolently observes: "Our business is to make men and women truer, purer, and happier." His mission is, if we may believe his own words, "The promotion of good, the promotion of peace and harmony," etc. Stone a man as long as you hav strength and opportunity, and then say, "Our object is to make men and women happier, and to promote peace and harmony." And because we find neither peace nor happiness in this new departure of brother Monroe, he is disgruntled, and thinks us hard to please.

But we not only knew we would be arrested, and wanted to be arrested, but we did it all for the purpose of making money! "This wilful violation of law can hav no other motive but that of money-making." Such charges being false, what, I ask the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, was left for us to do but to repel the charges as slanderous? And because we pronounced his statements "unmitigated falsehoods," he replies: "Nice language for a dear brother and a man that wants to lecture to the Rationalists in the West and to gain their good will." How modest is the good Doctor to make the name of J. R. Monroe synonymous with "the Rationalists in the West," and to repel his slanders is to fail "to gain their good will." Comfortable hallucination this, that the editor of the Seymour Weakly Times carries "the Rationalists of the West" in his pocket. His nod disposes of the patronage of Indiana and the West. We at first thought that perhaps we were rating his claims too high, but after a second reading of his many recent charges upon us as Freelovers, we find that, come what may, he intends to "boss" the West. Hear his warning voice: "Perhaps Mr. Bell will conclude to cancel his engagements to lecture in the West at $20 an hour. At any rate he may not meet with very enthusiastic audiences," etc. He will not permit us to forget that the West is his'n, and that our occupation is gone unless we recognize the Weakly Seymour sovereignty.

Unfortunately for the Times it is so far behind the times that it has not got the sympathy or indorsement of another Liberal paper in the land. The Boston Investigator, The Index, THE TRUTH SEEKER, The Evolution, The Positive Thinker, The Physiologist and Family Physician, Dr. Foote's Health Monthly, and even other papers less liberal make a discrimination between "Cupid's Yokes" and obscene literature. Thousands of people at Watkins took the same ground, and over ten thousand signers of the Heywood petition maintain the same position, while on the other hand the Seymour man stands alone in defending the Comstock outrages. No wonder that he raves when he sees his situation. Nothing short of desperation could make a sane man write such wholesale falsehoods as are contained in the following paragraphs taken from the editorial columns of the Seymour Weakly Times of Sept. 28, 1878:

"The question isn't for the liberty to publish what you please about religion, the supposed gods and devils, saviors, ghosts, and virgins, the divinity of an old book, and the like; but it is whether "Infidels," Rationalists, Materialists, and Spiritualists shall espouse Freelove and fight its battles. This is the shape the champions of the Heywood pamphlet hav got the business into, and no amount of denial and sophistry will get it out of that shape."

"The people of Indiana are not a community of Freelovers. They don't believe in breaking up the family circle—the sacred ties of father, mother, and child, husband and wife, and scaling back the relations of the sexes to a level with those of the hogs and cattle upon the commons. This we understand is what is meant by 'Freelove.'"

Has he found this "scaling back the relations of the sexes to a level with those of the hogs and cattle upon the commons," a doctrine taught in the Boston Investigator, THE TRUTH SEEKER, The Index, The Evolution, The Positive Thinker, Dr. Foote's Health Monthly, The Physiologist and Family Physician? Yet because these journals discriminate between "Cupid's Yokes" and obscene literature, they, one and all "espouse Freelove and fight its battle."

We giv a half dozen paragraphs below of the "Monroe doctrine." But the good man confesses that he was irritable, and "too crabbed and mad to be amiable and good." Many thousands of your readers will reach the same conclusion:

"The Heywood school of Freelovers would cure the 'social evil' by dissolving the marriage ties and reducing every man's wife and daughters to the level of the common street walkers. This doctrine is the test of Eastern 'Liberalism!'

"The Rationalists, the 'Liberals' of North America, such of them as want to improve the race, such of them as want to promote the welfare and peace and prosperity of all classes of men and women; such of them as, in lieu of the religion of 'faith and belief and prayer,' desire to offer the religion of good works, independent of beliefs—the religion of humanity, of benevolence, forbearance, justice, manhood, magnanimity, and mercy—such men and women as these may be called on to consider how long they can afford to tolerate the leadership of men whose ambition and greed and quarrelsome, jealous, vindictive natures lead them continually to attack, misrepresent, and endeavor to injure and break down all other honest workers in the cause. This may soon become a prominent question.

"To pool the issues is what the 'Cupid's Yoke' champions want. Every man's wife is every other man's wife; every woman's husband is every other woman's husband. There is to be a continual interchange of husbands and wives, according as fancy or convenience dictates, and the offspring, the children, are to be 'pooled.' No man is to know his own child and no woman is to know who is the father of her child. This is the Heywood pamphlet improvement on marriage! And the chief leaders of 'Liberalism' are willing to become 'martyrs' and to lie in prison that this doctrine may be freely disseminated and acted upon.

"We are willing that the eastern Freelovers shall print what they like. But we don't want them to couple their car to our train. We can't pull them to the first station on the route, much less to the kingdom. 'Infidelity' has nobler work than the defense of obscenity and sickening sexual communism.

"Our readers must excuse the tone of our paper this week. We are far too ill and irritable to write at all, but are compelled to. The style isn't what we like. It is foreign to us. But we are too crabbed and mad to be amiable and good. And the furious attacks made on us by the Eastern champions of Freelove and obscenity in the last week have not tended to restore our good temper. We hav just now no patience with the people who want to destroy the holy associations of the fireside, disrupt the sacred family circle, tear asunder the ties that bind together the husband and wife, the parent and child, and giv over our virtuous mothers, wives, and daughters to a common brothel as wide as the community. We hav no patience with such people."

"Certain Eastern 'leaders' are making an indorsement of Freelove literature the test of Liberalism." Not at all. The test is the right to sell any kind of literature that is not obscene. It is too late for a certain Western (would-be) leader to attempt to force Comstockism upon the people either east or west.

"Only think of a man becoming a martyr for a doctrine that he does not believe in! That is an awkward position."

"But we shall do our best for Brother ———, believing him to be merely the victim of misplaced confidence, a good-meaning man, who has unwittingly, and we are willing to believe unintentionally, placed himself in a fatally false position, and instead of having the courage and candor to acknowledge it and back down, is attempting to bull it through."

W. S. BELL.

New Bedford, Mass.

REMARKS.—Not having seen the last number of the Seymour Times, we are not prepared to make any comments in relation to what it may contain. But Brother Bell has given sufficient quotations from it to show clearly that falsehood and slander are the leading motives of the man who conducts it, and that his foul and false charges are scarcely worthy a moment's attention. If Western Liberals are pleased with such reading matter, we cannot object, but as for us, we neither care for what such a man may see fit to say, nor wish to spend time or space in replying to him. We hardly think the scurillous slanderer will succeed in running W. S. Bell entirely out of the West. Though Bro. Bell is no more a Freelover than is Dr. Monroe, he is totally unlike him in other respects—Mr. Bell is a truthful man and a gentleman. We trust the Liberals of the West will at least give him a hearing.—[ED. T. S.]

The Voice of the Keystone State.

At a meeting of the Liberal League of Linesville, Crawford Co., Penn., on Sunday, Sept. 15, 1878, the following preamble and resolutions were unanimously adopted:

WHEREAS, We learn through THE TRUTH SEEKER, and in other ways, of the recent arrest of D. M. Bennett, W. S. Bell, Miss J. S. Tilton, and George Mosher, all good and peaceable citizens of the United States, for selling a certain pamphlet called "Cupid's Yokes;" and

WHEREAS, We recognize the right of every American citizen to buy, read, or sell any and all books that to him may seem best, without first consulting Anthony Comstock or any other tyrant for permission so to do; and believing that to surrender this principle would be to surrender the very corner-stone of that liberty guaranteed to us by the Constitution, and for which our forefathers fought and died; therefore,

Resolved, That we look upon the arrest of the persons aforesaid as a gross violation of the genius of the age and an outrage upon the moral as well as the civil law, and we condemn the action of the Grand Jury at Watkins in indicting the persons aforesaid, and also the action of Judge O. P. Hurd as unwarrantable and savoring of the spirit of the Spanish Inquisition.

Resolved, That we believe the law passed by Congress in the winter of 1873, and commonly known as the Comstock Law, to be unwise, unjust, impolitic, and unconstitutional, and we demand its unconditional repeal.

Resolved, That we consider the cause of the arrested ones our own, and will forward to the Treasurer of the Defense Fund such sums of money as we are able to giv, to the end that justice may triumph and oppression fall.

Resolved, That we, by these resolutions, call upon the Liberals of the United States, of all classes, to raise now their manly protest against this outrage upon free speech and a free press, and, by contributions and other encouragement, assure these arrested persons that they shall not be left to fight the mailed hosts of superstition and persecution alone.

Resolved, That the Liberal League of Linesville forward to G. L. Henderson, Treasurer of the Defense Fund, the sum of $30.00, to be used in the defense of the persons arrested, or others who may be hereafter arrested in a similar false and outrageous manner.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the Boston Investigator and the New York TRUTH SEEKER for publication, and entered at large on the minutes of this League.

The Directors' Card,

AND THE REPEAL OR MODIFICATION OF THE LAWS AGAINST OBSCENITY.

MR. EDITOR: As Mr. Abbot of The Index is desirous that we should discuss this subject, I offer you my views as a repealer.

I wish to state, First, that I have no personal quarrel with Mr. Abbot, or with the Directors of the League. And I will admit that they had a right to issue this card, and to offer themselves for re-election, and to submit a platform on which they are willing to stand. But although I agree that they had a right to do this thing, I differ with them as regards the wisdom of the course they hav taken. I cannot help thinking that it looks like dictation—like attempting to forestall the action of the Convention. What should we think of the President and Directors of the Paine Hall Liberal League issuing such a card? or what would we think of Governor Rice and his counselors issuing such a card? We should feel indignant, and should probably tell the Governor that when the proper time came we would attend to that business. And such an insult would be certain to elect the Governor and his counselors to stay at home for the future.

But let me examine some of Mr. Abbot's reasons for this card. Mr. Abbot says that the success of the repealers will be the perversion and destruction of the original objects of the League. Let us see how that can be. What were the original objects of the Liberal League? I think the following sentence answers, namely: The complete secularization of the State. What has that to do with the repeal or modification of the laws against obscenity? Simply nothing. If it has, repeal will assist in more thoroughly effecting the State secularization. Again, says Mr. Abbot, "If the League should abandon or weaken its position, or surrender itself to the management of those who are deluded by the Freelove sophistries, it will simply commit suicide. And those of its members whose character, ability, and reputation hav commanded for the League no small measure of respect will speedily retire from its membership." This language is certainly unworthy any man calling himself a Liberal. It is the old spirit of the slave-driver cracking his whip.

In a society of Liberals, whose platform proclaims national protection for national citizens in their equal civil, political, and religious rights, what right has Mr. Abbot to single out one class of members for this tirade of abuse and insult, because they differ with him on one single point—in regard to how it is best to suppress obscenity? Is not this a clear violation of the Freelovers' equal rights as members of the Liberal League? I think it is. Listen again to the charge and the threat: "Should the League weaken its position, it will commit suicide, and the respectable people will withdraw from the League." The first charge is false, and the threat is cowardly. Is not this talk more like orthodoxy than Liberalism? If you don't believe as we do in regard to obscenity you ought to be damned, and we will now proceed to damn you by inviting the men of character and reputation to retire from the League, if you should happen to get a majority to vote for repeal.

If the repealers are a majority of the members of the League, hav they not a right to vote as they think, or shall they be false to their convictions for fear some respectable people will withdraw from the League? I say, out upon such childish cowardice. Follow rather the advice of the old Investigator, where it says, "Hew to the line; let the chips fall where they may."

I will now try to giv you a few reasons why the Directors' card should not be approved:

1. I hold that it is impossible that Freelovers, sexual reformers, Malthusians, etc., can be protected in the right of free speech and free press while we hav a law on our statute books punishing people for obscenity.

2. Because a large majority of the people of the United States honestly believe that the Freelove doctrines are obscene, and therefore ought to be prohibited by law.

3. Because a large number of Liberals themselves believe that the Freelove doctrines are obscene, and therefore ought to be suppressed.

4. If the Supreme Court should decide that the Freelove doctrines are obscene—and Judge Clifford has so decided in the case of "Cupid's Yokes," and Mr. Abbot has said, through The Index, that some portions of it are obscene, and Mr. Underwood stated last Sunday that he believed free love meant promiscuity, and everybody believes that promiscuity is obscene—then, I ask, how in the name of logic and common sense can we allow men to talk free love, which is obscenity, and still prohibit and punish them for talking Freelove? To my mind the thing is an absurdity and impossibility. I do not call myself a Freelover, but I do thoroughly believe in free speech, no matter whether a man's notions are moral or immoral, respectable or obscene; believing that truth and purity are better than error and impurity, and believing, with John Milton, that we do wrong to fear truth and right in a fair and free fight, though all the fanatics and fools in the world are given fair play and free discussion.

> "Truth crushed to earth will rise again;
> Th' eternal years of God are hers;
> While error, wounded, writhes in pain,
> And dies amid her worshipers."

In every age and every clime there are always some views that are heterodox and some that are orthodox. What class of people of the present day are in danger of being deprived of free speech? Is it the highly educated and dignified Unitarian who denies the divinity of Christ? Is it the cultured and refined Free Religionist? or is it even the bold and popular Atheist, Bob Ingersoll? No, sir; it is none of these classes; their liberty was won in days gone by. It is the poor, the despised, the fanatical and radical Freelover, the sexual reformer, the Malthusian, etc. It is the man or woman who dares attack our most sacred and cherished institution—the marriage institution. It is our Woodhulls, Heywoods, Trueloves, Bradlaughs, and Besants Shall Liberals be constantly boasting of their principles of free thought and free speech, and yet be afraid to discuss the question of marriage, for fear of Mrs. Grundy or Mrs. Orthodoxy? I hope not. What is the use of the Liberal League pretending to defend free thought and free speech if it is not ready and willing to defend those who are being deprived of the right of free speech—no matter whether they be Freelovers or Free Religionists, it makes no difference which?

Mr. Abbot must pardon me for taking such liberty with him, but I feel like giving him a word of caution lest he should repeat a chapter in the history of the Woman Suffrage movement. You will remember that our orthodox Boston women refused to associate with the Woodhulls on account of their Freelovism, and broke up the American Woman Suffrage movement and started one more in harmony with their orthodoxy, when that noble old Spartan, Lucretia Mott, came forward and set the Boston bigots a wider and broader and nobler example by taking Mrs. Woodhull's part and defending her equal rights.

If the Liberal League admits Freelovers to become members, then they hav the same equal rights with all other members; and all this talk about a secret plot to capture and destroy the Liberal League is anything but dignified, or even decent, treatment of those members of the League. Hav not Freelovers a right to get a majority of the members to vote for repeal? Of course they hav. Then why should Mr. Abbot or his secret correspondent denounce them for doing what they hav a perfect right to do, namely, to vote for their convictions of right?

Will the Reformers please answer the following questions? First, How can we hav absolute freedom of speech on political, religious, or social questions and still hav a law punishing people for exercising free speech on those questions? It is impossible; it is an absurdity. Yet this is what we now hav on social questions. Again, I hav often noticed that when Mr. Abbot attempts to define obscene literature, he speaks of its being sent to children. If he could get Comstock and our Government to accept that modification and limitation, it might not be so bad as it is now. Now it is applied to Reformers like Heywood, Truelove, Bradlaugh, and Besant.

Another reason why we ought to vote for repeal is, Because what is moral or what is immoral should never be decided by a majority vote, but each man and woman should decide those questions by their own reason and conscience.

Another reason why we should vote for repeal is because obscenity, like intemperance, like smoking, lying, gambling and drinking, is a vice, and not a crime, and can be more easily reformed by moral and educational means than by force of law.

Another reason is that the man who wants a law against obscenity, an imaginary evil, is opposed to a law against rumselling, a vice that is corrupting a thousand times more young and innocent children than obscenity, is straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel. But it is said that we never can get the people to repeal the obscenity laws, and we might get them modified if we only demanded modification. We believe that obscenity laws are wrong, and therefore we ask for their repeal, let the consequences take care of themselves. How was it with laws against blasphemy? are they not on the statute books to-day? and yet, because of public opinion, they are a dead letter. So we must denounce all laws against obscenity, and create a public opinion that shall make men ashamed of them, as they are now of the laws against blasphemy.

Another reason—and this is the last I shall name—why we ought to vote for repeal is, because Freelovers, or marriage reformers, like all other reformers, political, scientific, and religious, must always be Radicals; and we Liberals ought to be found standing by their side, and not standing with the conservatives, fighting against them.

[New York Letter to San Francisco Chronicle.]

Beliefs and Disbeliefs.

RELIGIOUS VIEWS OF MANY OF OUR PROMINENT WRITERS—DANA, EMERSON, LONGFELLOW, WHITTIER, HOLMES, LOWELL, BANCROFT, AND OTHERS.

Richard Henry Dana, the oldest American author living—he will be ninety-one next November—has long been connected with the Episcopal Church, though he is said to be very liberal, as Episcopalians so often are. He really has no identification with the present generation, having written his latest poems nearly forty years ago. If he had been born later, if he had come fully into the spirit and influence of the latter half of the century, he would probably hav been a Rationalist, notwithstanding the temperamental conservatism of his character.

Ralph Waldo Emerson, like so many thinkers and literary men, is a pantheist—pantheism has been styled the Atheism of poets—wholly rejecting the kind of theism which dissociates God from nature and regards him as a sort of spiritual personality. He began his intellectual life as a Unitarian, but soon withdrew from the society in Boston to which he preached because he could not agree with it on the subject of the "Lord's Supper." There is no variety of heresy that Emerson has not been guilty of, and he has given great uneasiness to the evangelical by the boldness and radicalism of his utterances. Knowing the purity of his life, the absolute stainlessness of his nature, they were disturbed that he should eliminate the Almighty from his system of philosophy. Of late years, however, they hav grown accustomed to his heterodoxies, mildly regretting that so excellent a man should live as if there were no God (meaning their narrow conception of God) in the world and no plan of salvation. Emerson has expressed much of his belief in his essay on "Immortality" in his last volume: "All I hav seen teaches me to trust the Creator for what I hav not seen. Whatever it is which the great Providence has provided for us, it must be large and generous and in the style of his great works. The future must be up to the style of our faculties—of memory, of hope, of imagination, of reason. I have a house, a closet which holds my books, a table, a garden, a field. Are these, any and all, a reason for refusing the angel who beckons me away? As if there were no room or skill elsewhere that could reproduce for me as my like or my enlarging wants may require. We wish to liv for what is great, not for what is mean. I do not wish to liv for the sake of my warm house, my orchard, or my pictures. I do not wish to liv to wear out my boots. . . . It is not my duty to prove to myself the immortality of the soul. That knowledge is hidden very cunningly. Perhaps the archangels cannot find the secret of their existence, as the eye cannot see itself; but ending or endless, to liv whilst I liv. . . . You shall not say, 'O my bishop, O my pastor, is there any resurrection? What do you think? Did Dr. Channing believe that we should know each other? Did Wesley? Did Butler? Did Fenelon?' What questions are these? Go read Milton, Shakspere, or any truly ideal poet. Read Plato or any other of the interior realities. Read St. Augustine, Swedenborg, Immanuel Kant. Let any master recite to you simply the substantial laws of the intellect, and in the presence of the laws themselves you will never ask such primary-school questions."

A. Bronson Alcot is the spiritual comrade of Emerson, though his elder by four years. He is even more an idealist, more a Platonist, than his friend, but less broad, less rounded, less practical. Mentally, he hardly lives in this time. He goes back to the ancient Greeks, to Plotinus, to Porphyry; he gleans wisdom from Jacob Bohme, Thomas Taylor, Novalis. His understanding, his soul, as he would say, is as if Christianity had never been invented. He is one of the gentlest, meekest, best of men, but as complete a pagan as Aristippus or Carneades.

Henry W. Longfellow is a Unitarian of the broad school, a vertible latitudinarian. In the highest sense a gentleman and scholar, he counts creeds as nothing, conduct as everything. His poems, albeit not great, breathe refinement in every line. His home is the abode of every virtue and courtesy; but the shadow of sectarianism has never fallen on it. His religion is natural and rational; culture has lifted him above the need of theological belief.

John G. Whittier was educated by his parents a Quaker, and has always retained his connection with the body of Friends, but his religious views are gentle and broad as they can be, and his mind is incapable of entertaining a dogma of any kind. Humanity is his creed and conviction. Where humanity can be helped, there his sympathy always goes, and there, though he may not know it, his sympathy ends.

Oliver Wendell Holmes has revealed his liberality in his writings, and his hatred of ecclesiasticism in declaring that all belief is bounded by Romanism on one hand and Rationalism on the other. That is organized superstition; this is absence of superstition. Like most physicians, he tends to Materialism, but his poetic talent suffuses his opinions and feelings with idealism. His faith is confined to morals and æsthetics, and culture is his chief deity.

James Russell Lowell once held to a sort of Unitarianism, but is now simply a deist, possibly not even that. An acquaintance once asked him his conception of heaven. "A place," was the reply, "where you always have $1,000,000." His intimates declare him a glorious good fellow, though, as a Yale professor once remarked, "he has not the slightest conception of God." Perchance the professor can tell us who has. The orthodox seldom remember that all Rationalistic philosophers claim that God is not only unknown and unknowable, but unthinkable. They can not help imagining that what they hav been taught to believe is perceptible and demonstrable truth, when reality it is darkness and complete blankness.

George Bancroft, though grown conservative with years, and a frequent attendant at church, continues to be a Liberal in all theological matters. He could hardly be anything else after the wide culture he has received abroad and at home. A man who has studied under Planck, Blumenbach, Dissen, Wolf, Schleirmacher, and Hegel, would be not likely to be narrowly orthodox.

George Ripley, who began life as a Unitarian clergyman, and who was afterward associated with Hawthorne, Margaret Fuller, Charles A. Dana, and others, in the Brook Farm experiment at West Roxbury, has always been a consistent skeptic, growing more radical with advancing age. He is now, and has been for years, a member of the Independent Religious Society, of which Octavius B. Frothingham has charge. A notable example of the difference between the sexes as to faith is furnished by Ripley and his first wife. They were both at Brook Farm and equally radical. After the association had been dissolved, Mrs. Ripley rebounding from Rationalism, took refuge in Romanism. She became zealous in the new belief, and died in the full odor of sanctity in the bosom of the Apostolic Church. It is said that, on her death-bed, she exacted a promise of her husband that he should pay for great number of masses for the repose of her soul. He honorably kept this promise, and for years opened his purse to the priests for a series of genuflexions and ceremonies presumed to be efficacious in delivering his departed wife from purgatory. Strange and dramatic antithesis—a pronounced skeptic paying for an ecclesiastic service which he deemed ridiculous to a church he regards as a mixture of mummery and superstition. The second Mrs. Ripley, German by birth, is of her husband's way of religious thinking.

Parke Godwin, son-in-law of Bryant, is entirely independent of ecclesiastic prejudice, looking upon life and nature with the eye of a man of the world and the mind of a philosopher. Constitutionally a Freethinker, in a just sense of the much-misunderstood word, his studies among the leading modern thinkers of Germany have developed in him a wholesome and elevated Rationalism. He has no system. He is an eclectic, taking what he considers good wherever he finds it.

Walt Whitman, as any reader of the "Leaves of Grass" must see, limits himself to the religion of humanity. He is a great practical democrat, worshiping nature, and ranking as poetic all that is natural. He is a deist, though his deity is essentially nature, by which alone deity can be judged. He is by no means devoid of piety; but his piety consists not in psalm-singing, sermon-writing, sectarian charity, and foreign missions. He considers the heathen better off in many respects than the so-styled Christians of our American capitals, and counts it not merely useless but downright imbecility to take away from people a creed adapted to their needs and substitute for it a creed that they do not understand and do not want.

James Parton has a sovereign dislike for theology and theologians, and is strictly and conscientiously moral. Born in England and remaining there but five years, he is said to hav imbibed a prejudice against orthodoxy from living with a very rigid family in this country until he was fifteen or sixteen. He says he has seen far more genuine unchristianity among professing Christians than among people who would be commonly ranked as sinful unbelievers. He has supreme faith in and love of humanity, and beyond humanity we are not, in his judgment, called upon to go.

Thomas W. Higginson, like any number of disbelievers in the supernatural origin of Christianity, has filled a Unitarian pulpit, and relinquished it after a moderate amount of experience as a preacher. Only twenty-four when he began his ministrations at Newburyport, Mass., his strong anti-slavery views were distasteful to his congregation, and he resigned to go to Worcester, where he remained six years, and then surrendered clerical avocations. He has long been an avowed Rationalist, and is fond of discussing points on which the orthodox and heterodox are at variance. He is uncompromising as to his convictions, having frequently refused to write articles and books in which he was asked to suppress some of his opinions. If he cannot say what he believes he declines to say anything. He is at all times an earnest and eloquent advocate of Rationalism.

NO REVENGE is more heroic than that which torments envy by doing good.—Anon.

THE DISTAL portion of the metacarpal of the right wing of a small pterodactyl, with a spread of wing not exceeding five feet, has been discovered by Mr. S. W. Williston in the Atlantosaurus beds of Wyoming. It is now in the Yale College Museum. This is the first indication of the existence of pterosaurian remains in the Jurassic formation in America. All remains of this kind previously found were cretaceous, and were those of reptiles of enormous size. Provisionally, the name Pterodactylus montanus has been given to this new species.

Letters from Friends.

WAVERLY, IOWA, Sept. 27, 1878.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Inclosed find an article concerning a proposed lecture by Mr. Wendling, who advertises himself as a lawyer from near the home of Col. Ingersoll in Illinois. The correspondence speaks for itself.

WAVERLY, IOWA, Sept. 26, 1878.

REVS. RANSOM, HAMMOND, AND LESLIE, LOCAL COMMITTEE WENDLING'S LECTURE, Gentlemen: It is announced in the press that Mr. Wendling will "demolish" the skeptical theories of Col. Ingersoll, on the 8th of October, 1878.

Acting under instructions from some of the Infidels and Freethinkers of our city, I am instructed to ask if your committee, or Mr. Wendling, will arrange with us on that occasion so as to divide the time with one of our number, giving us at least one-third of the time between his opening and closing for the purpose of question or debate. Our community is largely composed of persons who are liberal on questions of religion. We are apt to style the pulpit the "coward's castle," because from it the oracle of orthodoxy asserts what he will, denounces us or our honest convictions in such speech as he chooses, and denies us a reply. If Mr. Wendling comes among us to convince us of error, and is capable of demolishing the greatest orator, as well as the most cogent reasoner, of the age, he has certainly no reason to fear any one here. We understand that Mr. Wendling must be paid a large sum for his lecture. Such an arrangement would fill the house.

Respectfully, M. E. BILLINGS.

WAVERLY, IOWA, Sept. 27, 1878.

M. E. BILLINGS, Dear Sir: Your communication addressed to Messrs. Hammond, Leslie, and myself, as "Local Committee Wendling's Lecture," etc., was duly received.

In reply, permit us to state that it is impossible for us to giv any encouragement that such an arrangement as you hav suggested could be effected. We hav engaged Mr. Wendling to perform a certain service, viz., to deliver a certain lecture in which he replies to Col. Ingersoll. You will readily perceive that beyond this we hav no control. What Mr. Wendling might agree to we cannot state. He is expected here on the 3:16 P.M. train, Tuesday, Oct. 8th, the day of the lecture; and if you should desire, he doubtless could be "interviewed," and then "speak for himself." We are confident this will be satisfactory to you and your friends. In behalf of Committee,

Respectfully, GEO. R. RANSOM.

As Mr. Wendling speaks Oct. 9th at Manchester, and as he is hired to perform "a certain service" here, of course there can be no chance for a debate, and, as usual, the pulpit has it all its own way. M. E. BILLINGS.

PENDLETON, IND., Sept. 23, 1878.

BRO. BENNETT: You may add my name to the "Declaration of Rights," as well as to the second Roll of Honor to the amount of $5.00, to be paid when needed. I am poorly able to do this, but I feel that it is the duty of every Liberal, not only of the United States, but of the world, to do all in his power to thwart the attempt of designing Christianity to crush Liberalism from the face of the globe. "Oh," some will say, "they are weakening every day;" all of which is very true; and none are more cognizant of the fact than Christians themselves, and the simple knowledge of this fact makes them only the more desperate. Only last week an old member of the M. E. Church here spoke in a Sunday-school convention on this very subject, as follows: "Something must be done. Why, the Infidels are taking the town." Also, last month the M. E. minister of Pendleton attended a camp-meeting at Albany, Ind., and came home "tired out," and reported that he "never worked harder in his life, and thirty-one other preachers worked equally as hard for a whole week or more, and not a single soul was converted;" and, moreover, "but very few seemed to desire their prayers." This is all well enough, and I say, Amen. But it does not follow that Liberals should sit idle, because that numerous army of priests will not let Christianity die out without a struggle.

Yours for science, truth, and absolute liberty,

O. H. THOMAS.

DANVILLE, Sept. 23, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Find inclosed post-office order for $5.95; four dollars to apply on TRUTH SEEKER from May last (as you will see our subscription expired that month). Thanks for your kindness in sending after it had expired. I hav some friends, who are subscribers of your paper, who wish to add an order for books in this letter; you will oblige by sending same to my address: Three copies of "Cupid's Yokes, one "Holy Bible Abridged" (in cloth), one "Sepher Toldoth Jeschu," one of Mrs. Besant's "Law of Population" (in paper), and one copy of the new Trinity—which must be a little novel, containing a woman, while the old and holy one contained the male only. Well, these are days of progress, surely.

We have taken your paper since its first start at Paris, Ill., and find it also of the progressive order, having grown four times its original size, and filled with matter of vital interest to all. May it continue to grow in interest as it has in the past. I think it is of a healthy constitution, having outlived all the pestilential attacks of old orthodoxy, and grown strong in proportion to the opposition it has had to meet from all sides, until it has become a tower of strength, imparting healthy ideas to many, whom it has liberated from mental slavery to true liberty of conscience and Freethought. Most respectfully, L. H. GURLEY.

FREEDOM OR SLAVERY.

SOUTH EXETER, ME., Sept. 22, 1878.

DEAR BRO. BENNETT: Four of your correspondents have paid their respects to my letter on the obscenity question; two favorably and the others not so favorably. The question with me is, Shall I giv up my own individual authority to some one else, or shall I declare that to me it is absolute and final. Stephen Pearl Andrews wrote to Hull's Crucible: "A liberty which anybody else in the universe has a right to define is no liberty for me. A pursuit of happiness which some despot, or some oligarchy, or some tyrannical majority has the power to shape and prescribe for me is not the pursuit of my happiness." Are the above sentiments true or false? If true, then why deny me the right to pursue happiness as I feel it my right to pursue it. If false, then Mr. Comstock has the field, and you cannot refute him. When John Calvin burnt Michael Servetus at the stake, did he strike down Servetus' individual authority, or did he respect it? D. M. Bennett & Co. are exercising their own individual authority in sending their thoughts to the people. They say, Our books are good and truthful, and we have a right to send them out unmolested. Comstock & Co., backed up by law, deny that right, and forcibly suppress them. Now, I deny in toto Mr. Comstock's right to forcibly suppress any publication, be it obscene or otherwise, from a free circulation. In so doing he or any one else show themselves to be contemptible cowards. If Comstock or any one else really loved truth for its own sake, they would ask for no other weapons than the pen and the tongue. I hav worked thirty-two years to stop rum-selling and obscene talk and reading. How? By the cowardly and contemptible business of putting them in prison? That is just what John Calvin did. No; but I hav, by pen and voice, tried to educate and enlighten people up to a condition where their moral stomachs did not crave such horrid stuff. Profanity is shocking, but obscenity a great deal more so. Tobacco is a terrible curse to the people who use it; but because it is such a dreadful curse, shall I forcibly suppress it? Rum-selling is a degrading business, but it can never be stopped by force. Giv the people clean food, clean clothes, clean persons, educate them properly, and generate them rightly, and you take a step towards bringing the people into a condition when the spiritual or the human stomach will not call for such putrid food.

Yours for "untrammeled lives," SEWARD MITCHELL.

MORAL DISEASES.

MONTGOMERY, MICH., Sept. 9, 1878.

BRO. BENNETT: I have just read a note in THE TRUTH SEEKER to the effect that it is thought that Bishop McCoskry was troubled with a disease termed satyriasis, instead of a wicked heart. I am really glad that people are beginning to reason upon the subject of what is called crime. They will soon learn to place the responsibility where it belongs and treat some eccentric so-called criminals for disease, instead of punishing them for crime.

Satyriasis is a disease of the sexual organs or some of the organs in sympathy with them. It may be produced by a tumor on the back of the neck, or even a temporary blister or tumor on the medulla oblongata, or an affection of the cerebrum, a lesion of the kidneys, the urethra, or even from lodged fecal matter in the lower bowel—constipation—and many other causes which I cannot mention here. Even a wen, if extending far back towards the occiput, will produce it.

In this disease there is an uncontrollable sexual passion, and persons of the most upright character and circumspect behavior, when seized with it, are entirely at the mercy of the disease. Not long since I heard a man say in a conference meeting that he had been terribly tempted during the past week, but through the help of Jesus he had overcome, and he wanted his brethren and sisters to support him by their prayers. Within two weeks of that time his disease got the mastery of him, and he is now in the workhouse for an attempt at rape. Had the "poor, erring creature of Adam's race" applied to me or some other intelligent physician instead of Jesus, he would probably hav been saved the mortification of a punishment for a disease misnamed a crime. About a year or more ago one Isaac B. Sautelle was arraigned on charge of the same crime in the city of Boston and sentenced to fifteen years' imprisonment. He was subsequently brought out of prison and tried for another similar offense, and received fifteen years' additional sentence. As I watched the proceedings of the trial, as it was published in the papers, I became well satisfied that the man's crime was a disease, that could hav been treated better in the hospital than the penitentiary. But red ribbon is an article that is always dispensed by asses instead of scientific men and women.

While I am on the topic, I want to call attention to another class of unfortunates. I recollect, while on a boat from New York to Boston once, of noticing one of the boat hands, when I said to myself, "Poor fellow! Some of these days you will probably be arrested for rape and sent to prison for a moral deformity which had its origin in your organization." This man had an unusually large neck, with strong vital and animal propensities, and he would find it hard to resist the temptation to steal when hungry, or to control any of his natural passions. He was probably begotten of legal rape, and he inherited the sin of his parents. Such persons are to be pitied rather than blamed, inasmuch as their organisms came to them unsought for, and, perhaps, unwanted. A man can no more help his peculiar development than he can alter a physical deformity; and if he is changed, it must be by patient and continual labor, assisted by scientific philanthropists. If instead of punishing people for moral deformities we would send them to hospitals to be cured, we would save the State a great expense and entail a blessing on their posterity. If then we should turn about and abolish our legalized system of prostitution and put an end to rape in the marriage bed, we should hav fewer moral deformities in the next generation.

If these few thoughts shall encourage any sympathy for morally diseased "criminals," whether in or out of the Church, I shall hav accomplished all that I intended.

D. W. HULL, M.D.

SALEM, MASS., Sept. 14, 1878.

MR. BENNETT: In this week's TRUTH SEEKER occurs the following by H. B. Martin, M.D.:

"The snake story is so inseparably connected with the doctrine of the fall of mankind in the first Adam that if we reject it the whole economy of the plan of salvation is deprived of its chief corner-stone. Apart from the idea of the first Adam being deceived by the snake there is no sense or import whatever in the prediction of the second Adam coming to bruise the head of the serpent, which has invariably been interpreted to mean Christ's conquest over Satan."

It seems to be the general opinion among writers, men in particular, that the Adam of snake notoriety was the first Adam. They hav been so educated; not by the Bible, however, which proves the first Mr. and Mrs. Adam to hav been created, with whose history neither snakes, nor curses, nor forbidden fruit had any connection whatever. The loss of the snake may be accounted for by the fact of the exclusion of that particular species from the ark, there being no room for the dust on which to feed him. The Bible givs no account of the death of the dust-made "Adam" (as of many of its noted characters—none more so than this, or of such world-wide fame), except in the universal deluge from which only the descendants of Mr. and Mrs. Adam were rescued, and other choice animated nature, and in which every trace of the tribe of Adam and Eve, and of their snake also, was drowned out.

"'Unto the woman he said, I will greatly multiply thy sorrow and thy conception; in sorrow thou shalt bring forth children; and thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee.' This is the whole of the curse pronounced upon the woman, and certainly there is no call for any religion to reconcile an offended God here; but if there is need of anything in her case, it is for some law or judgment to free her from being kept eternally under the rule of man; and that is one of the things that Liberalism proposes to try to accomplish."

It is an up-hill work to travel in the old, beaten track of the orthodox vehicle, whose wheels are sunk down to the hub in the mire of the deluge, there to grovel until the "Day of Judgment." It were better to leave this for the "chosen" to escape as best they can when the day of their redemption arrives, and take the other horn of the dilemma, if woman's emancipation is, in any sense, the object of Liberalism, and reject, with her, this old clerical club, so decorated with curses and denunciation. According to the Bible, Eve and her husband were no ancestors of hers, nor was the snake of her family acquaintance; hence their offenses were none of hers, and no curse of the Almighty ever rested upon her on their account. Nor would Liberals now be called upon to rescue her from "the rule of man" had he ruled himself properly, leaving woman to rule herself (as she has left him), as she is bidden by the law of nature and by the law of the Bible—a discovery which man seems never to hav made, else he hid this light under a bushel lest it be extinguished in the broad daylight of common sense and common humanity, and the light of the gospel also, according to Gen., chap. i and chap. v.

Had man read his Bible as he should, commencing at the first chapter, which givs an account of the creation of man and woman, of the blessing bestowed upon them, of the command to them to hav dominion over the fish of the sea and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth, and to eat of every tree, in the which is the fruit of a tree yielding seed; and which says: "To every beast of the earth, and to every fowl of the air, and to every thing that creepeth upon the earth, wherein there is life, I hav given every green herb for meat; and it was so. . . . And God saw everything that he had made, and behold, it was very good. And the evening and the morning were the sixth day."

Here is no forbidden fruit, no dust-eating serpent, no subjugation of woman, and no little, insignificant, nipped-up garden, and no flaming sword to keep the way of the tree of life—whose way is as unlimited as is the boundless universe. It would seem that the "midnight oil" that the clergy hav wasted to keep this "divine inspiration" out of sight, for man's subjugation to him, and woman's subjugation to man, was sufficient to float every ship in the world's navy. And yet here it stands, an everlasting rebuke, a weapon fitted to woman's hand against all clerical and all legal usurpation.

This account of the creation in the first chapter of Genesis, from the 27th verse to the 31st, and the genealogy, age, and death of the patriarchs, from Adam unto Noah, as given in the fifth chapter of Genesis, from the 1st to the 5th verse, ought to appear as a frontispiece to every Liberal paper and book, and specially to every illiberal one—for it is "inspiration"—so that the people may read for themselves, and learn what "inspiration" is in its acceptable aspect; and if they choose to support ministers, let them hire them to repair the injury they have done as "blind leaders of the blind." It will be a lucrative employment; a life-service to all who may successfully engage in it—the greatest service of which the wisest of them can boast; the most efficient means of bringing Infidels to the true faith, as it is, in the truth of the "eternal" nature, without beginning and without end. Says the Christian, "If you take away our religion, what will you giv us in its stead?" We will giv our aid in repairing the terrible havoc it has made with your common sense. Christians contend that the Adam and Eve manufactured of the dust and of the rib are the created man and woman whose name God called Adam in the day when they were created (Gen. v, 2). "Three are one, and one is three," equally and extraordinarily "sensible to the last."

M. U. F.

FT. LEAVENWORTH, KAN., Sept. 30, 1878.

BRO. BENNETT: An impression seems to prevail that I am your correspondent "Anti-Fraud," or else that I am the correspondent he alludes to. I desire to state that I know not who "Anti-Fraud" is, and that I hav no idea who his Leavenworth correspondents are. All I know is that I am not one of them. I am, like many others, quite curious as to the identity, both of your correspondent and his Leavenworth friends. WM. EMMETTE COLEMAN.

"CUPID'S YOKES."

MY DEAR BENNETT: I hav just finished reading Heywood's celebrated book, "Cupid's Yokes," and I must say I was wonderfully disappointed in the work. I had been led to believe from the notoriety which the Y. M. C. A. and Anthony Comstock hav given it, that the book was the vilest, most obscene, and indecent publication in existence; that its circulation among the masses was productive of great evil, tending to weaken the marriage tie among sensible people, and to eventually destroy all legal as well as moral obligations between the sexes. But its perusal has dispelled that illusion. The book is well written, the very choicest words possible to convey the ideas are employed, and not a bawdy or obscene sentence can be found within its covers. The author has quoted largely from standard historical and medical works, making his book pregnant with useful information.

But many of the theories advanced by Mr. Heywook are to my mind at once erroneous, illogical, and impracticable. The free intermingling of the sexes which he advocates, and the license which he predicts for future generations, instead of being progressive, I believe to be retrogressive. Such a condition of society evidently did exist long ago, when people dwelt in caves without clothing, and modesty was unknown to man. But we are now moving in a different direction, and I have no fears that the sale of "Cupid's Yokes," or any other book of the kind, will demoralize society. Bad as our present marriage laws are in some respects, and faulty as our present social system is, the remedies which Heywood suggests are infinitely more dangerous to society than the diseases he would cure. But Mr. Heywood has a right to his peculiar opinions, and ought to hav the right to publish them provided he does not outrage decency nor trample upon the rights of others. The claim by District-Attorney Cummings, that this work is obscene when compared with the works of Shakspere or some passages in the Holy's holy—King James' Bible—is simply ridiculous.

But what has all this to do with your arrest at Watkins? About as much as the lamb had to do with soiling the stream which flowed from the wolf to him. "Æsop" intimates that the wolf was bound to eat the lamb, roil or no roil. So the Y. M. C. A. must hav Bennett. The fact is, you are in the way of this saintly order; you hav let in the sunlight of truth among some of their clergy; you hav exposed some of their "ways which are dark and tricks which are vain," in short, you are an Infidel and must be locked up to protect the Church. When Comstock and the powerful organization behind him hav succeeded in putting one or more of their gods into our Constitution, then it will be lawful to arrest you and all your sympathizing friends upon a true charge, and the Y. M. C. A. will no longer be compelled to call Infidelity obscene.

ONE WHO THINKS FOR HIMSELF.

ANN ARBOR, MICH., Sept. 7, 1878.

BRO. BENNETT: I see by THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 7th that you hav again been arrested for presuming to exercise the sacred rights given by the Constitution to every American citizen. Will these indignities have no end? Will honest men and women forever be thrown into prison to satisfy the vindictive hate of these canting, hypocritical men of God?

You hav been arrested, and may be imprisoned; yes, will be, if money and influence and Christian guile can imprison you. But be of good cheer; you are not the first who has suffered for opinion's sake, and you are not destitute of friends. Christianity from the first has bitterly opposed all advancement, and blood has flowed in torrents at its commands. But thanks to the noble exertions and untiring energy of such men as D. M. Bennett and others, it is relaxing its hold and mankind is better for it. Inclosed please find $2.15; apply $2.00 upon TRUTH SEEKER, and send me "Cupid's Yokes." More anon. Yours, etc.,

W. A. CRANDALL.

UNIONTOWN, CAL., Sept. 9, 1878.

DEAR BENNETT: I learn from THE TRUTH SEEKER that you hav put your foot in it again, and got arrested by the bigots at Watkins. Just as I expected. You go blundering along, saying things which offend good Christians, and what else can you expect? Why can't you be cultured? Go slow—use a little Abbotism—and respect the feelings of the dear pious and religious people, and not be eternally thundering at, and bursting in the gates of their temples, tearing down their altars, lashing and demolishing their Christian and other gods, and getting people to do their own thinking. Besides, what business had you to go poking off to Watkins anyhow, and lending your influence in cheering the hearts and strengthening the minds of those ungodly men and women assembled there to devise further means to take away the bread and butter from the priests and preachers, and teaching people how to get along without them, with the assurance that they will be happier and better, by throwing godology, and all priestcraft to the dogs, and living by the light and rule of common sense, reason, and justice? And why so kind and accomodating to Miss Tilton during her temporary absence in assisting her to sell Mr. Heywood's innocent little book for which he is now suffering martyrdom in prison, and which was designed to enlighten poor downtrodden suffering women, and teach them how to avoid some of the miseries to which they are now subjected? Why should you, or Mr. Bell, or Miss Tilton, or Mrs. Besant, or Mrs. Chase, or anyone else, care how many poor women suffer from compulsory and reckless child-bearing through the want of a little plain physiological information, and bringing into the world a weakly, puny, sickly, starved, and a half-made race of children without means to properly feed and clothe, much less educate, who in their turn only become mentally, morally, and physically fit for slaves of priests, tyrants, or brutes, or food for pestilence and famine? Let those whose hearts are not entirely seared against the sufferings of their fellow creatures answer for you. But so it is, ever has been, and ever will be, so long as ignorance and superstition in the world overbalance intelligence and common sense. Whenever a man or woman steps out of the deep worn old ruts of theological nonsense and bigotry in enlightening and elevating his fellow-man, and points out to him or her the true common sense road to happiness, they must expect to encounter the dying kicks and struggles of the old rotten priesthood. You, Brother Bennett, being one of the foremost in this age in strangling this hydra-headed monster, come in for your share of the kicks. The battle between truth and falsehood is now hot, but will, in my opinion, soon be hotter, and although no prophet, I predict that before another generation passes away, victory will be inscribed on the banner of truth. Long life to D. M. Bennett and his paper.

Ten dollars of the inclosed P. O. Order is to pay one half of my pledge to the "Defense Fund," and for the balance please send me the "Ethics of Spiritualism," and "Cupid's Yokes." The latter I have never read, and would like to see what the hypocritical Christian idiots are making such a fuss about. Faithfully and earnestly yours, A. LOHRY.

HYGEIAN HOME, SPRINGFIELD, MO., Oct. 3, 102.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Since reading the last number of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I felt as though I would like to grasp your hand and say, "Well done thou good and faithful one," so much abused and yet so patient. Not as a lamb, however, dumb before its shearers, but ready and able at all times to faithfully and understandingly meet the many unjust censures thrust upon thee. The paper like its editor bears acquaintance, and having read every number of it from the first, has come to be an old tried friend, a necessity from which I cannot think of separating. Its growth in scientific and general intellectual interest is so great as to afford a constant feast for the mind, and I hail its weekly visits with perfect delight. Its regular contributors are amongst the best, and could all from whom I hav solicited subscriptions realize its genuineness as I do, many additions would be made to its already extended list of subscribers.

Your reply to friend Van Buskirk's inconsiderate and inappropriate letter (who of course never gets into "a scrape,") is right to the point and ought to enable him to see and acknow edge his inconsistency.

The "cultured editor" too, has shown up his true colors again. With all his boasted intellectual refinement, he undoubtedly manifests a decided weakness.

His jealousy seems to be so much excited as to render it quite impossible to prevent it cropping out on all sides.

His premature effort to secure to himself a continuation of the office of President of the National Liberal League is certainly very futile as well as unwise, and will doubtless assist him to "step down and out."

If D. M. Bennett will not accept the office, then, I too, think Hon. Elizur Wright would be a good choice, as I believe he is an honest, independent thinker, and will fearlessly labor for the general interest of humanity.

I was really sorry to learn of your Watkins arrest, as well as that of Miss Tilton and W. S. Bell, which seemed so very unjust. But the result will doubtless prove beneficial, as there is no surer way of increasing friends and patrons to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and exciting investigation of Liberal thought generally, than the effort now used to suppress it.

Hitherto I hav felt indignation over your arrests Brother Bennett, but my desire now is that you be again arrested by Anthony Comstock for publishing and sending through the mail the Christians wholly (holy) obscenity Bible. Does your conscience never smite you for daring to send broadcast over the land to contaminate the unsophisticated minds such a collection of filth, the very essence of obscenity? Surely you must be held amenable for this outrage upon the morals of society. It is certainly distasteful enough left alone under the sanctifying influence of the remaining portion of the sacred text, but unmasked before the world must produce a deleterious effect upon the sensibilities of "cultured" people. Then again do you not know you are disinheriting yourself of heaven's promised blessings in taking from the word of God. But perhaps you are trying to analyze it, if so your effort is a laudable one, and it is then to be hoped the agent for the suppression of obscene literature will not mistake your motive, and again cause your arrest. In that, however, I think you hav rather a hard task before you, as I can't see after all that you will be able to make of it anything better than concentrated obscenity.

I think it is evident you hav struck the keynote to this obscenity question, and if it is a matter of principle with the Society for the Suppression of Vice, you will surely be rearrested.

Won't they hav a sweet time of it though in causing arrests for circulating the obscenity of the Bible? And it must inevitably come to that, for it cannot be denied that it is the pure, unadulterated article.

To help the matter on then, I want, at least, one copy of it, as I think the "fight" this time will be rather enjoyable.

I wish also to renew my subscription another year for THE TRUTH SEEKER, as it is assured an existence whether the business of arresting and imprisoning is kept up, or not, and as my letter is growing lengthy will close by asking you to accept the within order for $4.60, $1.00 dollar for defense fund, and the remainder for books and papers.

Fraternally yours, J. S. LYON, M. D.

We the undersigned, having read "Cupid's Yokes," and finding therein nothing indecent, or obscene, desire the privilege of having our names enrolled with the honorable body who hav pledged their lives, fortunes, and sacred honor, to perpetuate the rights and liberties belong to all American citizens.

J. S. LYON,
MISS NETTIE LYON,
MRS. J. S. SPENCER,
O. A. WHITCOMB,
REBECCA WHITCOMB.

ANAHEIM, CAL., Sept. 23, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: My spirit of indignation is aroused. To think that while I was sitting here in my home in this new Italy of America reading THE TRUTH SEEKER, you, the champion leader of Freethought in America, were arrested for selling a "Cupid's Yokes" instead of a book with holy Bible on the covers and more real obscenity between them than is found outside of Anthony Comstock's stock-in-trade makes me mad. What a pity that Train don't make a choice selection from the Holy Bible so as to get in prison! It looks as though they thought God's word would spoil if they let too much light in upon it. By the way, Beecher has said another radical thing. Here it is: "I hold that there are really no Infidels in the world, except perhaps in a few cases where extreme corruption of life has led men to hate goodness, truth, and purity." I send you a clipping from the S. F. Chronicle showing the latest effort of the priests to get their God into the Constitution of our State. Please publish it.

My husband and I hav just celebrated the fortieth anniversary of our wedding, and as a token of our joy we pledge five dollars to the Defense Fund. We also want the "Watkins Proceedings" as soon as published. Let every reader determine to keep the ark of Freethought afloat. Plenty of friends are needed to keep her off the "bank and shoal" of bigotry, and so we must giv a long pull, a strong pull, and a pull all together. Truly I feel like working in the political field. Something must be done. It wont do to supinely sit and let them put the shackles on. Keep up your courage, and the next time you go to Watkins, sell Bibles!

Yours truly, MRS. K. PARKER.

ROCHESTER, N. Y., Sept. 22, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Our daily papers have all made some comment on the Watkins Convention and they refer the topic under discussion with some comment to the majorities for a proper adjustment. But what is the education of the majority? It is really astonishing to find so many young men in this city who hav been raised within sight and hearing of our large common schools and yet cannot tell whether Ohio is a state or a city. We have just had a visit from an old friend who was proud of their church membership but did not know the meaning of vicarious atonement. I was told the past week by a church member that circumcision was a sort of baptism, and when asked how sharp stones could be used he declared there was no such statement in the Bible. Justice certainly demands a better education of our majorities before they are capable of being judges or juries farther than themselves are concerned. Respectfully yours, D. SIZER.

TOLEDO, IOWA, Sept. 20, 1878.

BRO. BENNETT: I can and do fully and unequivocally indorse and stand ready to defend the noble sentiments laid down in the "Declaration of Rights," and want to add my humble name to the list. Now let every friend of Freethought and free speech do his or her duty, and victory is ours. Fraternally yours, J. E. FRICK.

SALINA, KAN., Sept. 24, 1878.

DEAR MR. BENNETT: I admire your paper and like to read it; and especially do I like to see so many learned and moral men protest against the infamous acts of the Christian Comstock—a man without a heart or conscience. I sympath ze with his innocent victims—those imprisoned for opinion's sake—and hope the day may soon come when bigots will no longer rule the courts. I like the position of THE TRUTH SEEKER, standing as it does almost solitary and alone in its fight for freedom in a country which some Europeans consider abounds in nothing but Bibles, money, and humbugs. I like the "Letters from Friends." I noticed some passages in letters in this department in the issue of Sept. 21: "How long are such acts to be tolerated in this land that claims to be a free and independent nation?" Says S. Carver, "If it must be war, then war it is, and war to the knife if necessary." It would not be the first time the Christian Church has been the cause of turmoil and bloodshed. But their power is fast vanishing, and this is but the dying struggle of the hydra-headed monster. Justice and humanity will yet reign triumphant upon this glorious earth, with reason, science, and common sense for a shield. "There is a Liberal sentiment," says Lewis Morris. But we hav conservative Liberals as well as conservative orthodox, and the former are more dangerous to our cause than the latter. Says another of your correspondents: "It is time for all brave men and women to come to the front, and giv the cowards the protection of the rear. It is no time to falter now." Another one of our friends says that "the greatest foe to progress is not error, but indifference to truth." This I hav said many times. Liberals are indifferent to their principles, and will not organize for protection and encouragement to the faint-hearted. After a rousing speech in some Liberal meeting, nearly every auditor feels the lightning of Liberalism tingle through his veins, but as soon as he goes back home he relapses into his old indifference. We want more Liberal Leagues all over the country, but I am afraid that, if left to itself, it will be a slow movement. I would like to see a great National—or better, international—Defense and Propaganda Association—one possessing the means and energy to send Liberal lecturers where they are needed to speak and organize Local Leagues, which could meet every Sunday. Please put my name to the Declaration of Rights, also on the Roll of Honor to the amount of $1.00, and send me a copy of the proceedings at Watkins.

Yours respectfully, JOSEPH HENRY.

PALMYRA, N. Y., Sept. 30, 1878.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: When the news came of your last arrest by the Comstock influence I felt like doing something, aiding you financially, but being unfortunately short of "greenbacks," I thought I would do the next best thing and make an effort to spread THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hav heretofore sent in two or three names, and now I send a money-order for ten more to men of thought, and men of influence, and I trust you will retain many of them as life subscribers. I hope so, at least. It is apparent to all who read your paper, at least to all others who take any notice of passing events, that there is a wonderful commotion in the religious as well as the political world. It is evident that old theology is on its last pegs, consequently there is an unrest on the part of its advocates. They are bound to use might or force to carry their points. But it is my honest opinion, and that based upon what I can gather by your management of THE TRUTH SEEKER, that when they undertake to choke Bennett they had better let out the job.

Well, now, let me say to every subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER, Make an effort to spread the circulation of the paper. Get it before the masses, let the people read to examine for themselves and the result of emancipation of the mind from the effects of false conceptions, and ideas will surely follow.

My best wishes for the triumphant success of right,

LEVI WOOD.

TRUXTON, N. Y., Sept. 24, 1878.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I think it is time to let you know that I have received THE TRUTH SEEKER every week since I sent for it. Am well pleased with it. I also received the book "Humphrey-Bennett Discussion," which, in my way of thinking, is one of the best ever written. I hav lent both books and papers to men who are in favor of Freethought and a free press as well as myself, and I think, before long, you will hav new subscribers from Truxton. I am getting the paper into men's hands who will do the best they can for the cause of liberty and justice. I had my thoughts about priests and preachers for a long time, but never saw anything except on one side until I saw your paper. But I never thought they were right. They are a hard set; and if any one should go to hell, they should be the first, for they hav deceived the people. Inclosed you will find $2.

I hope you will come out all right from Watkins, and Judge Hurd, and the rest of the Comstock crew. He and the preachers get a good living out of the folks, preaching about hell, etc. Excuse me for writing so much and taking up your valuable time. I would send you the full price of your paper for a year, but I think that I will hav to write to you once in three or four months, as there are many of your books I would like to get. I will do what I can for you; and, as I am canvassing for books, may be able to help your cause. I will hav an eye to your affair at Watkins, and, if I don't do any more, will send you the price of your dinner for one day, anyhow. I remain yours truly,

JOHN DEAN.

ROCHESTER, N. Y., Sept. 23, 1878.

TO D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I hav been a subscriber to your valuable paper almost a year. I think it is one of the boldest and most straightforward papers I ever had the pleasure of reading. I write to you for the purpose of purchasing some of your valuable and interesting books. On the inside page you will find a bill of what I want, also money for the same ($2.00). Hoping you will send them with dispatch, I remain yours truly, R. PUNNETT.

GEORGETOWN, CAL., Sept. 19, 1878.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: For the inclosed please send me "Cupid's Yokes," and "The Holy Bible Abridged." Hurrah for Bennett and the rest of those brave fighters of oppression and injustice! That's right, "fight it out on that line," and if the Liberals of the country don't stand by you, they are not worthy of the name. Owing to mining speculations, I am like the Prodigal Son—"busted." If it had not been for the terrible howl from the Christians against "Cupid's Yokes," I never would hav sent for it, but now I too want to see what it is that is goading them nearly into frenzy. In addition to the one subscriber I sent you from this place (W. J. Hurd), will try and send more, for that is about all I can do now. Wishing you a complete triumph over your enemies at your closing trial, I remain yours truly, F. H. MOORE.

DOWAGIAC, Sept. 11, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Inclosed find twenty-five cents, for which send that awful pamphlet, "Cupid's Yokes," and your production on "Matter, Motion, Life, and Mind." I have a great curiosity to see and read "Cupid's Yokes." I think that affair at Watkins, namely, the arrest of yourself and others, one of the most contemptible acts the Church has been guilty of for a number of years. I wish I was rich, so I could aid you and help to put down that vampire of justice and freedom—that basest of all villians—Anthony Comstock.

We hav a Liberal League in this place, and, of course, hav to suffer the usual persecutions; but, somehow or other, we seem to prosper in spite of all the anathemas hurled at us—in spite of all the prayers of the five churches in our town. I hav the honor of being secretary of the League. We hav just raised $37.25, and sent it to the yellow fever sufferers. Col. L. F. Copeland, of Buchanan, Mich., delivered an address on "Snobs and Snobbery," and a collection was taken up for the benefit of the suffering South. The number of Christians present were, with the exception of "old maids' babies," about the scarcest thing I ever saw. The words Liberal League on the bills seemed to scare them. It showed that they believed more in the theory than in the practice of the story of the good Samaritan. With a wish for your success in your noble work, I remain a true friend in equal rights to all. C. H. DUNNING.

True Freedom, and How to Gain it.

We want no flag, no flaunting rag,
For Liberty to fight;
We want no blaze of murderous guns
To struggle for the right.
Our spears and swords are printed words,
The mind our battle-plain;
We've won such victories before,
And so we will again.

We love no triumphs sprung of force;
They stain the brightest cause;
'Tis not in blood that Liberty
Inscribes her civil laws.
She writes them on the people's hearts
In language clear and plain;
True thoughts hav moved the world before,
And so they will again.

We yield to none in earnest love
Of freedom's cause sublime:
We join the cry, "FRATERNITY!"
We keep the march of Time.
And yet we grasp no pike nor spear,
Our victories to gain;
We've won without their aid before,
And so we shall again.

We want no aid of barricades
To show a front to wrong:
We hav a citadel in truth,
More durable and strong.
Calm words, great thoughts, unflinching faith,
Hav never striven in vain;
They've won our battles many a time,
And so they will again.

Peace, progress, knowledge, brotherhood—
The ignorant may sneer,
The bad deny: but we rely
To see their triumph near.
No widows' groans shall load our cause,
No blood our brethren stain;
We've won without their aid before,
And so we shall again.

The New Planet.

There is now very little doubt that the unknown star seen by Prof. James C. Watson, of Ann Arbor, during the recent eclipse of the sun, was really a new planet. His observations were made, as will be remembered, at a point in Wyoming Territory on the line of the Union Pacific Railroad. While the star was visible there was hardly more than time to note its position, magnitude, and characteristic appearance, and even this had to be done somewhat hastily. All systematic inquiry as to its possible or probable identity with any previously known heavenly body was necessarily postponed until after the eclipse; but Prof. Watson had taken pains to commit to memory the relative places of all the stars which would then be near the sun, down to those of the seventh magnitude, and he also had a stellar map in front of him, so that he could consult it if he wished.

In the third sweep of the heavens which he made with his telescope, after the beginning of totality, he saw the object which is now believed to be a new planet, whose path of revolution about the sun is within the orbit of Mercury. He seems at once to hav recognized it as unfamiliar, and carefully marked its position on the paper circles with which he was provided for that purpose. He estimated its magnitude to be four and a half, and noticed that its light was ruddy and the appearance of its disk such as to indicate that it was situated beyond the sun. An idea of its brightness may be gained from the fact that few eyes can detect stars of less than the sixth magnitude without telescopic assistance, though some persons are able to see seventh magnitude stars unaided.

When the discovery was reported to the astronomical world of Europe, three views were presented for discussion:

I.—The object seen by Prof. Watson was the star known as Theta, in the Constellation of Cancer, the Crab; or,

II.—It was a comet; or,

III.—It was really an intra-Mercurial planet.

To the first supposition the reply was that Prof. Watson saw the star Theta Cancri at the same time, and even compared the new body with it.

The second hypothesis was met by his statement that he noticed particulary that the object did not present any elongation such as would be probable if it had been a comet in that position.

The third view alone remained, and that is now generally accepted. Sir George Airy, the Astronomer Royal for England, does not regard Prof. Watson's reason as quite conclusive for denying the possible cometary character of the object; but, nevertheless, he concedes the very high probability that it is in fact the long-sought intra-Mercurial planet.

This conclusion is strengthened by the calculations which hav been made by M. Gayot in Paris since the news was received there. These show that the star discovered by Prof. Watson was just where the theory of Leverrier's hypothetical planet required that to be at the time of the eclipse. It is difficult to repress a feeling of regret that the great French Astronomer could not hav lived a little longer, so as to see his confident anticipation thus verified.

The latest word from Prof. Watson on the subject of the recent eclipse points to the discovery of still another heavenly body hitherto unknown. He is now inclined to the opinion that a star which he then thought might be Theta Cancri is also, in fact, new to astronomical science.

The Hayden Case.

The Rev. H. H. Hayden stands acquitted of the death of Mary Stannard, as far as the judgment of an examing court can acquit, and the neighborhood and press in general approve the decision. The case of Mr. Hayden differs very materially from that of the Rev. Ephraim K. Avery, to which it has been by some thoughtlessly compared. The circumstantial evidence against Avery was of a very strong nature, and it may be worth while to recall the history of that celebrated trial.

On a chilly morning in December, 1832, a farmer of Tiverton, R. I., found the body of a young woman suspended by the neck from a stake which projected from a haystack. In a pocket in her dress was the following letter:

If I am missing inquire of the Rev. Mr. Avery, Bristol. He will know where I am gone. S. M. CORNELL.

The Rev. Ephraim K. Avery was a Methodist minister who lived in Bristol, R. I., and preached in Fall River. He was about thirty-five years of age, had a wife and children, was a popular and effective preacher, and of excellent reputation. A Coroner's jury, hastily assembled, pronounced that Miss Cornell had committed suicide, and that a married man (meaning Avery) had, by his wicked conduct, driven her to the act. The people of the vicinity were not satisfied with this verdict, and the authorities instituted a rigorous investigation. That investigation showed that Avery had been intimate with the murdered girl, that she had been seduced, that he had been seen going one bitterly inclement night toward the lonely place where the body was found, and that he could give no satisfactory account of his whereabouts at the time the crime was supposed to hav been committed. Avery fled, but was captured in a friend's house in Massachusetts, the father of the late Senator Sumner being a party to the arrest. The trial excited absorbing interest throughout the whole country. Jeremiah Mason conducted the defense, and the jury acquitted the prisoner. Avery went to Ohio, where he became a farmer, and where he died a few years ago. The mystery of Sarah Cornell's death was never solved.—N. Y. Sun.

Edison Eclipsed.

A HOOSIER INVENTS AN INSTRUMENT FAR SUPERIOR TO THE TELEPHONE FOR TRANSMITTING SOUND.

CINCINNATI, Sept. 22.—An invention that far outstrips Edison's telephone in transmitting sound, and in simplicity and cheapness of construction, has been invented by an Indiana young man, Mr. Israel D. Jewett, assisted by his father, Mr. H. D. Jewett. The place where this invention, which has been called the agophone, came to light is a little village of one hundred inhabitants, St. Omer, which lies two miles from the railroad town of St. Paul, on the Indianapolis, Cincinnati and Louisville Railroad, about thirty-seven miles from Indianapolis. Father and son are proprietors of a drug store, printing office, musical instrument store, post office, and general repairing shops, all in the same building. The instrument they hav invented is now in operation between their general utility shop and their residence, a quarter of a mile away. The difference between this instrument and Edison's telephone is that it does not hav to be held to the mouth and shouted into by the speaker while the listener must hold his ear to the tube to hear the faint sounds. In the agophone the speaker stands ten feet away from the instrument, and his voice is heard distinctly at the other end of the line at an equal or greater distance from the instrument.

The invention was inspected by a reporter on Saturday, who found a group of wondering neighbors gathered to hear and see the great invention. A conversation was in progress between the elder Jewett, in the store, and his wife at their residence. Mr. Jewett was leaning on the counter, three or four feet away from the little box, which was the instrument. He spoke in a natural, easy tone, not especially directing his voice to the instrument. The answers came back with such distinctness that they were understood equally as well in the further corner of the store as at the mouth of the instrument. Mrs. Jewett was asked to sing, and the words of "Over There" came with all the sweetness that would hav been heard if the singer had been in an adjoining room. Mr. Jewett went home, and, at the request of his son, took a seat eight feet from the instrument and played the "Arkansas Traveler" on his violin. Every note was heard distinctly, not only in the store, but on the street and in the rear yard, which is separated by another room from the store. The closing of a door, sweeping the floor, footsteps and conversation between Mrs. Jewett and others in her room all were heard in the drug store. The ticking of a watch, placed in the instrument, was heard at the other end of the line. The inventor is reticent about the principles of his instrument. It has no battery and no magnet, unless there is a magnet most artfully concealed. All that can be seen of the agophone is a little box, open in front, with black walnut sides, the back of thin iron plate. About an inch in front of the iron plate is a thin pine board forming a partition across the box. It has an opening about an inch in diameter, from which a small funnel of thin copper plate runs back through the iron end of the box, and closing on a small brass wire. The brass wire extends out about two yards and connects with copper wire, which forms the connecting medium. The instrument at the other end of the line is the same. Mr. Jewett does not offer an explanation of his principle, except to say that the copper funnel is a vibrator. He is exceedingly anxious about securing letters patent, and seems afraid to tell too much before that end is attained.

DETERIORATION AND RACE EDUCATION. By Samuel Royce. pp. 586 Price, $2.50. Boston: Lee & Shepard. New York: Charles T. Dillingham. This book is an earnest and eloquent plea for the better education of the human race. The author displays a thorough knowledge of the portions of the subjects of which he treats, but his treatise does not cover the whole ground. On one most important, perhaps the most important point bearing upon the welfare of the race, Mr. Royce is strangely silent—the limitation of offspring. And this is the more strange because in this book education is considered from a broad humanitarian standpoint. There appears to be no other cause so promotive of race deterioration as the too rapid multiplication of the offspring of that portion of mankind least able to feed, clothe, shelter, and properly educate the men and women of the future, and yet few writers hav the courage to so far brave a false public opinion as to speak boldly on this point.

The author deals largely in statistics, though he sometimes draws erroneous deductions therefrom. The Kindergarten system of education, amplified and expanded, or a modification of it to suit people of all ages and degrees of intelligence, is one of the means proposed for the better education of the race. The volume should be carefully perused by all interested in social science and education.

Facts and Scraps from my Sunday Readings.

Between living animal organisms and vegetable organisms there is no known sharp line of demarkation, and the fact is the same between vegetable and inorganic matter. The whole chain of identities and existences seems united in one continuous evolution.

Man has been distinguished as a laughing, talking, thinking, and reasoning animal, and the only one that uses tools. But it is found that he is not entirely alone in any of these qualifications.

The English power rules successfully 240,000,000 of subjects in the East. Its territory from Peshawur to Cape Comorin is 1,900 miles in length, yet the trade between England and its eastern province is worth annually only $500,000,000, while the expenditure for government costs England $250,000,000, which proves the fabled wealth of the East to be an idle tale.

From the upper jaw of the Narwhal, or Sea Unicorn, grows a large, spirally twisted ivory pole, from eight to ten feet in length, the largest, and probably the most remarkable, tooth in the animal world.

The sponge is an animal, and it is obtained in various parts of the Mediterranean and at the Bahama Islands.

When oxygen becomes deficient from any cause (in water), the higher forms of both animal and vegetable life disappear, and in their place are found others of a lower type.

E. B. FOOTE, of 120 LEXINGTON AVE., NEW YORK, to whom all letters from the sick should be addressed. In its issue for January 19, 1878, Mr. Bennett's TRUTH SEEKER thus speaks of DR. FOOTE and his medical publications: "We know him (Dr. Foote) personally and intimately, and we say, with all the assurance that knowledge imparts, that he is a man of the highest incentives and motives, whose life has been spent in instructing and improving his fellow-beings by giving such information as is well calculated to enable them to be more healthy, more happy, and to be better and more useful men and women. His medical works possess the highest value, and have been introduced and thoroughly read in hundreds of thousands of families, who, to-day, stand ready to bear willing testimony to the great benefit they have derived from the physiological, hygienic, and moral lessons which he has so ably imparted."

THE

Creed of Christendom;

Its Foundation Contrasted with its Superstructure.

BY W. R. GREG,

Author of "Enigmas of Life," "Literary and Social Judgments," &c.

One vol. Crown, 8vo., with Complete Index. Cloth, $1.50.

"Some twelve years ago, in a London drawing-room, one of our most eminent men of science said: 'Why do not the bishops answer Mr. Greg's Creed of Christendom? They are bound to answer it—if they can.' In the lifetime of the present generation the earliest work at all similar was that of Mr. Charles Hennell, which, in various respects, had great merit; but Mr. Greg, coming later, had the advantage of access to many able German researches, and his work continues the most complete on all sides; to it one may most confidently appeal when assailed by eager Christians with the current commonplaces of their warfare. Since bishops, deans, learned canons, and academic divines do not reply formally to so thorough, clear, and learned a treatise, which has been so long before the public, we have the best of proof attainable that this historical argument—occupying precisely the ground which English academicians have chosen as their own—is unanswerable" (F. W. Newman, on "The New Christology," in Fortnightly Review).

Sepher Toldoth Jeschu;

THE BOOK OF THE GENERATION OF JESUS.

WITH PREFACE AND NOTES BY SCHOLASTICUS.

First English Translation

Of the ancient Jewish story of Jesus, who was born at Bethlehem about 106 B. C., being the son of a betrothed maiden named Miriam (Mary) by Joseph Pandera. By the power of a charm stolen from the Holy of Holies he cured lepers, raised the dead, and wrought other miracles. Wherefore he was arrested by the elders of Jerusalem, scourged, crowned with thorns, and by order of the Sanhedrin stoned to death and hanged on the day before the Passover and the Sabbath, in the reign of Queen Alexandra, about the year 75 B. C.

Death of Simon Kepha on a tower in the city of the Nazarines about 39 B. C. How and why the Romans changed "Kepha" to "Petros."

Startling evidence that Paul flourished before the middle of the first century B. C., contemporary with the aforesaid Kepha.

AGENTS are informed that the best thing to sell to make money on, and also to benefit mankind, is this book. It explains and advocates the only harmless and practical means of avoiding the evils of celibacy, on the one hand, and of overburdened parentage on the other. It advocates more and earlier marriages, and increase of family only when health and pecuniary means will permit, but it most efficiently opposes abortion, prostitution, and all undesired and inconsiderate procreation. It contains the latest medical researches and results of science. The medical directions are easy, plain, explicit, though chaste and delicate. No married couple should be without it.

Abstract of the

OF

JEAN MESLIER,

A Roman Catholic priest, who, after a pastoral service of thirty years at Etrepigny and But, in Champagne, France, wholly abjured the Christian dogmas.

EDITED BY VOLTAIRE.

This little work contains very sound reasoning. Its utterances are among the most powerful and convincing. The clergyman gives most excellent reasons why the old dogmas of superstition and error should be discarded.

Price, 25 cents. For sale at this office.

A Modern Symposium.

SUBJECTS:

THE SOUL AND FUTURE LIFE: By Frederic Harrison, R. H. Hutton, Prof. Huxley, Lord Blachford, Hon. Roden Noel, Lord Selborne, Canon Barry, R. W. Greg, Rev. Baldwin Brown, Dr. W. G. Ward.

THE INFLUENCE UPON MORALITY OF A DECLINE IN RELIGIOUS BELIEF: By Sir James Stephen, Rev. Mr. Martineau, Frederic Harrison, The Dean of St. Paul's, The Duke of Argyle, Prof. Clifford, Dr. W. G. Ward, Prof. Huxley, R. H. Hutton.

Christianity and Infidelity

A JOINT DISCUSSION BETWEEN

REV. G. H. HUMPHREY, Presb't'n Clergyman

OF NEW YORK, AND

D. M. BENNETT, Editor of The Truth Seeker

It was conducted in the columns of The Truth Seeker, a letter alternately from each contestant appearing each week, beginning April 1, 1877, and closing Sept. 29, 1877, thus continuing just six months, giving thirteen letters from Humphrey and thirteen replies by Bennett.

The subjects discussed were as follows:

PART I.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to American Liberty.

PART II.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to Learning and Science.

PART III.—Is there a stronger probability that the Bible is divine than that Infidelity is true?

The discussion has excited a large share of interest, both among believers and unbelievers: and as both sides are fairly presented, it is suited to readers of all shades of opinion.

The New York Advocate, a paper having a very extensive circulation, in speaking of the volume, says, "Perhaps a more able and exhaustive presentation of both sides of the great questions which have agitated the civilized world for centuries has never been made. At any rate, in this volume will be found a perfect magazine or storehouse of arguments, pro and con, which every intelligent man and woman should peruse with candor and with an earnest desire to arrive at sound conclusions on themes of the highest importance to all mankind. . . Light is what we need. Let the controversies proceed. Let the blows descend upon the error-dispelling anvil. Let the sparks fly in all directions from the heated steel. The truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, is what the people demand on all the great questions of the day, whether of Finance, Science, Politics, or Religion, and discussion will elicit it." Let every person who feels the slightest interest in theological questions, whether on one side or the other, read the Humphrey-Bennett Discussion."

A thick 12mo volume of 550 pages, well bound sent, post-paid, to any address, for the low price of one dollar.

DR. LYON'S Hygeian Home is at Springfield, Mo. See adv. in May Nos. TRUTH SEEKER. 13'25 Resp'y, J. S. LYON.

The distinguished physician for all PRIVATE CHRONIC and SEXUAL DISEASES, is without any exception the greatest living practitioner of the age. The thousands of cures he is performing annually substantiate this fact. He has patients in every State of the Union and in the British Provinces. Every reader of this who has any affection of the Head, Throat, Lungs, Heart, Stomach, Liver, Kidneys, Bladder Bowels, Womb, Genital Organs, Rheumatic or Neuralgic Difficulties, or Eruptions of the Skin, Blood Impurities, Tumors, Cancers, or any Nervous Affections or Diseases of the Eye or Ear, are invited to write to Dr. Fellows, whose charges are extremely low, so that those in most humble circumstances in life can avail themselves of his valuable services. The Doctor's crowning medical achievement has been in the discovery of an EXTERNAL or OUTSIDE APPLICATION for the permanent cure of SPERMATORRHŒA and IMPOTENCY, as the result of self-abuse in youth and sexual excesses in mature years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Powers, etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy. Dr. Fellows has prescribed his EXTERNAL REMEDY for 1,100 cases without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the Insane Asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others on the verge of Consumption, while others again had become Foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

Address, with stamp, Vineland, New Jersey, where Dr. R. P. Fellows is permanently located, and obtain his PRIVATE and other CIRCULARS, with cures SWORN TO, which is irrefutable testimony to the Doctor's unprecedented success in treating all the diseases here named. TERMS EXTREMELY LOW IN ALL CASES. WRITE YOUR ADDRESS PLAINLY.

(From the Rock Mountain Herald.)

"Dr. Fellows is a successful specialist for all the diseases which he claims to cure, such as chronic and sexual complaints. His wonderful skill and success are bringing him hundreds of cases weekly, by letter and otherwise, from all over the United States."

Gems of Thought.

CLEAR your mind of cant.—Dr. Johnson.

IT is almost as difficult to make a man unlearn his errors as his knowledge.

HE that will know the truth must leave the common and beaten track.—Locke.

GREAT things are not accomplished by idle dreams, but by years of patient study.

ONE should seek for others the happiness one desires for one's self.—Buddhist Scriptures.

CHOOSE always the best course, and custom will soon make it the most pleasant.—Pythagoras.

PYM would rather suffer for speaking the truth than that truth should suffer for the want of his speaking.—Goldwin Smith.

IGNORANCE is not devotion or the mother of devotion, and faith which is not founded upon reason is not faith but folly.—Theodore Parker.

EVERY degree of guilt incurred by yielding to temptation tends to debase the mind and to weaken the generous and benevolent principles of human nature.

There is nothing more unreasonable than for men to liv viciously and yet hope to escape the necessary consequences of their vices.—Dr. Samuel Clarke.

LET the counsel of thine own heart stand, for there is no man more faithful unto thee than it. A man's mind is sometimes wont to tell him more than seven watchmen that sit above in a high tower.

THE influence of men is not to be confined to the circle of their acquaintances. It spreads on every side of them like the undulations of the smitten water, and will reach those whom they never saw.

PRIDE is a virtue—let not the moralist be scandalized—pride is also a vice. Pride, like ambition, is sometimes virtuous and sometimes vicious, according to the character in which it is found, and the object to which it is directed. —Lord Greville.

THE recognition of virtue is not less valuable from the lips of the man who hates it, since truth forces him to acknowledge it; and though he may be unwilling to take it into his inmost soul, he at least decks himself out in his trappings.—Montaigne.

NEVER will I seek or receive private, individual salvation; never will I enter into final peace alone; but forever and ever, and everywhere, I will liv and strive for the universal redemption of every creature throughout all the worlds.—Buddhist Liturgy.

AN infant, a prattling child, dying in its cradle, will liv again in the better thoughts of those who love it, and plays its part through them, in the redeeming actions of the world, though its body is burnt to ashes, or drowned in the depths of the sea.—Dickens.

"OH! for a man that will stand up and say, I want to be good, honest, virtuous, and upright, loving my neighbor as myself, helping my fellow-man along the rugged road of life simply from a love of doing these things for their own sakes, and not because he fears eternal torture in hell and hopes for a reward of a golden crown in heaven.—Thomas Paine.

THE judgment of reason being once set aside, there remains no possible means of judging whether any one thing whatsoever be more reasonable or more unreasonable to be believed than another; or whether in any case whatsoever either belief or unbelief be in any degree reasonable or unreasonable at all.—Dr. Sam Clarke.

REASON bids us use and develop all our faculties; inclination often bids us loiter in the path of progress, lest we spend too much strength in learning that which we may possibly hav to unlearn; but experience, our best guide, teaches us that all mental exertion is in some way beneficial to ourself or to others, and that nothing we accomplish can be lost or wasted; for inevitably there comes a time in our existence when what seemed to us a trifling thing proves to be of the greatest moment and the utmost benefit, perchance in a trying hour. —Lessie N. Goodell.

S IT not worth while to hav lived when we feel that we hav done good work for the whole world? When we hav launched forth thoughts that will go on down the long avenues of time forever—thoughts that will make men and women wiser, better, and happier? Thoughts that will liv when we ourselves shall hav become but dust and ashes? Take heart, then, O reformer, and fear not that thy labor will be of no import. The seed sown to-day in corners and by-places shall spring up and bear sweet and precious fruit for thy children's children in thy oncoming years.—Mrs. E. D. Slenker.

ATTER and the present life are vilified in order to sell quack inventions concerning a "life to come," which would otherwise be unknown. As science has established the claims of matter to respect, priests hav bounded it with the cry of "Atheism." They hav not been working for truth, but for power. But, notwithstanding all this, true development leads rapidly in these days to a full and final rest in the sublime faith that matter is all, and that in learning our true relationship to the material universe, and in obeying the laws that govern that relationship, we are doing the very best we can to secure happiness in this life, and are making the best possible preparation for any here may be to come.—Charles Ellis.

Odds and Ends.

BUSINESS is driving with horse jockeys.

BUSINESS with the junkmen is "picking up.'

THE wages of Ah Sin are seventy-five cents for a dozen pieces.

WHY is a spoilt child like a straw bonnet? Because its the better for a good trimming.

AN absent-minded editor copied from an exchange one of his own articles, and entitled it, "Wretched attempt at wit."

ONE of a party of friends, referring to an exquisite musical composition, said: "That song always carries me away when I hear it." "Can anybody sing it?" asked a wit in the company.

"I KNOW I am a perfect bear in manners," said a young farmer to his sweetheart. "No indeed, you are not, John; you have never hugged me yet."

MRS. PETERS asked rather sharply, "Do you think that a little temper is a bad thing in a woman?" And the gallant philosopher replied, "Certainly not; it is a good thing, and she shouldn't lose it."

"YOUNG man," said a minister to a youth in his congregation, "do you know what relations you sustain in the world?" "Yes, sir; two cousins and a grandmother; but I don't intend to sustain them much longer."

A GOLDEN CALF.—A coxcomb, talking of the transmigration of souls, said:

"In the time of Moses I have no doubt I was a golden calf."

"Very likely," replied a lady; "time has robbed you of nothing but the gilding."

THE following conversation lately passed through a telegraph office: "I lent you five dollars one year ago to-night. If you hav not had it long enough, please keep it one year longer." To this delicate hint the answer was returned: "Had forgotten it, and hoped you had. Let her run another year."

DOUBLE VISION.—Mr. Hillgilder went home the other night considerably intoxicated, and afflicted with double vision. He sat for some time with his sleepy gaze riveted on Mrs. Hillgilder, and then quietly remarked, "Well—hic—I hope t'holler if you two gals don't look enough 'like to be—hic—twins."

"FELLOW-CITIZENS," said a North Carolina candidate, "there are three topics that now agitate the State—the United States Bank, the Tariff, and the Penitentiary. I shall pass over the first two very briefly, as my sentiments are well known, and come to the Penitentiary, where I shall dwell for some time."

A SCOTCH parson had a farmer neighbor who was in the habit of shooting on Sunday. But after a while the Sabbath-breaker joined the church. One day the minister to whose church he belonged met a friend of the farmer, and said: "Do you see any difference in Mr. P. since he joined the church?" "Oh, yes," replied the friend, "a great difference. Before, when he went out to shoot on Sunday, he carried his gun on his shoulder, but now he carries it under his coat."

AN English writer has been sharply criticising the management of the London public schools, known as the "Board Schools," and produces the following as specimens of the written examinations of some of the scholars:

"Where is Turkey?

"'Turkey is the capital of Norfalk.'

"Where is Turin?

"'Tureen is the cappital of Chiner, the peepul there livs on burds nests and has long tails.'

"'Gibberralter is the principle town of Rooshia.'

"What do you know of the patriarch, Abraham?

"'He was the father of Lot, and ad tew wifes—wun was called Hishmale and the t'other Haygur. He kept wun at home, and he turn'd the t'other into the desert, where she became a pillow of salt in the day time and a pillow of fire at nite.'

"What do you know of Joseph?

"'Hee wore a koat of many garments. Hee were chief butler to Faro and told his dreams. Hee married Potiffers dorter, and he led the Gypshans out of bondage to Kana, in Gallilee, and then fell on his sword and died in site of the promiss land.'

"Give the names of the books of the Old Testament.

"'Devonshire, Exeter, Littikus, Numbers, Stronomy, Jupiter, Judgment, Ruth, etc.'

"What is a miracle?

"'Don't know.'

"If you saw the sun shining overhead at midnight, what would you call it?

"'The moon.'

"But if you were told it was the sun?

"'I should say it was a lie.'

. . . . . .

"Another boy, giving his impressions in regard to Moses, wrote as follows:

"'He was an Egypshion. He lived in a hark maid of bull-rushers, and he kep a golden carf, and worshipt braizen snakes, an he het nuthin but kwales and manner for forty year. He was kort by the air of his ed while riding under the bow of a tree, and he was killed by his son Absion, as he was a-hanging from the bow. His end was pease!'

. . . . . .

"'What is meant by conscience?' said a schoolmaster to his class. The almost simultaneous reply of half their number was:

"'A hinward monitor.' An inspector who happened to be present inquired: 'And what do you understand by a monitor?' To this an intelligent youth exultingly answered: 'A hironclad.'"

THE TRUTHSEEKER

DEVOTED TO SCIENCE, MORALS, FREETHOUGHT AND HUMAN HAPPINESS

Vol. 5. No. 42. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT.} New York, Saturday, October 19, 1878. {SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY.} $3 per Year.

Notes and Clippings.

THE Milan Cremation Society has, since January, 1876, burned twenty-three bodies.

THERE are 160 Freshmen this term at Cornell, 40 at Union, 75 at Brown, 18 at Tufts, 231 at Harvard, 65 at Michigan, and 50 at Rochester.

W. T. THORNE, who was, in 1874, expelled from the North Carolina Legislature for denying the existence of a God, is now a candidate for Congress.

IN its crimes and its woes our modern civilization, even as illustrated in this enlightened Christian country, has never been outdone even by the wildest and wickedest ages.—Sun.

PROFESSOR MAX MULLER believes in the higher education of girls. He has just given $1,500 to be invested to provide an exhibition for a scholarship at the High School for Girls at Oxford.

THE Rev. Frederic Robinson of Putnam, Ill., is a physician as well as a preacher; so it is hard to tell on which profession to place the odium of the outrageous conduct in which he has been exposed.

LEPROSY has appeared at Parcent de Pedreguer and several other towns in the province of Alicante, in Spain. Several cases hav proved fatal. The authorities intend establishing a special hospital for the reception of those persons attacked by the scourge.

THE Rev. H. P. Peck of Napa, Cal., got a license to marry a supposed widow, and applied to several clergymen to perform the ceremony; but, according to the local newspaper, they learned of certain impediments. Mr. Peck had a wife in St. Louis, and the woman had a husband in Oregon.

THE Grand Orient of Free Masons in France has expunged from its ritual all recognition of God, and in consequence the Grand Lodges of Ireland, Scotland, and England hav severed all relations with the French body. Action by the Grand Lodges of the United States and Canada will be taken soon.

THE school connected with the San Francisco Protestant Church for Chinese is a mixed affair. A morning session in English is conducted by a white woman, who teaches the elements of the Christian religion. An afternoon session in Chinese is conducted by a Chinaman, who teaches the precepts of Confucius.

THE General of the Jesuits is reported to be seriously at variance with the Pope, and this is supposed to account, in a great measure, for the falling off in the St. Peter's pence, which is likely to reduce the Pope to great straits, or to the acceptance of the handsome stipend offered by Italy, which he, as did his predecessor, has refused.

MR. BEECHER is thought to hav aimed the following at Theodore Tilton on Sunday night last: "There be men who are great geniuses, who hav large faculties of thought and expression, who are orators, accomplished speakers. Then there comes a small fry of sputtering speakers who hav the gestures, the hair, the bad grammer, running about in imitation."

THE Rev. P. W. Hockkeppel, pastor of the St. James Catholic church at Wilmington, has been removed from his position by Bishop Becker, for improper conduct toward a young lady of good standing and reputation, and for certain irregularities in connection with a sum of money realized from a church fair. The bishop has ordered him to retreat into a brotherhood until he has condoned for his sins.

MR. JOHN B. CALDER was a pillar of the Second Baptist Church of Providence, R. I. He was also the Treasurer of a Sunday-school, and a burning and shining light in the Young Men's Christian Association. He was also the cashier of the Grocers' and Producers' Bank—capital $160,000. Both religiously and financially he stood high in the community. But he was an obliging man, and when his friends were in need of money, he assisted them out of the bank funds. The result is that the bank is out a large sum, vaguely stated as from $80,000 to $100,000 and that the exemplary Calder is in Providence jail. Only a few days ago he assured the bank's President, "upon his honor," that everything was all right, and that there were no overdrawn accounts.

MAGAZINES and newspapers hav been for several years used with excellent effect in the reading classes of the Plymouth (Ind.) schools. The compositions and conversation of the pupils hav been improved in a remarkable degree and the love of good reading and desire for further instruction hav been stimulated. This is unquestionably a great improvement over the use of the Jewish Bible as a school-book, from which nothing new or useful can be learned.

THE Rev. W. B. Broadwell was the beloved pastor of the Christian church in Vancebury, Ky. His hair was white and his face bore a benign expression. His power as a revivalist was remarkable, and his piety seemed to be genuine. One night recently his effigy was burning in front of his residence, and by the light of the fire he was fleeing to the woods. The change in the affairs of Broadwell was caused by the discovery that he was an atrocious criminal.

THE Rev. Dr. Bartol, who was well nigh killed by a thunderbolt, thinks that if the stroke proves fatal it must prove one of the most agreeable of deaths. To be stunned, however, as he was, is very unpleasant. His recovery of consciousness was instantaneous. He was for an instant terribly oppressed; an irresistible weight seemed passing through him, and he felt as though he was in wonderland. His recovery was attended by a nervous shock and a headache for a week.

THE Rev. Frank C. Buffum was formally deposed from the Congregational ministry in Hartford several years ago, on charge of immorality. He went to Illinois and remained out of public view until recently, when he turned up as a revivalist in North Pownal, Vt. He has been remarkably successful there in converting sinners, and is the choice of the Congregational church for pastor; but the Hartford scandal is brought up against him, and a council is to be held to decide whether he has really reformed so as to be fit to occupy a pulpit again.

THE Associated Chambers of Commerce of England held their autumnal meeting at Sheffield last month, and the debates of the representatives from all the great centres of trade of the kingdom expressed both anxiety and despondency. "Instead of making commercial progress," said one of the delegates, "England is retrograding." From 1842 to 1872 British trade made a marvelous advance, but since 1872 the exports have declined in value from $1,280,000,000 to $990,000,000, and meantime, too, the imports of manufactured goods are increasing, and our grain is now steadily pouring in at an unprecedented rate.

THE Rev. Mr. Blowhard, after several years of married life, was at last blest upon a Saturday by the addition of a fine boy to his family circle, which had hitherto consisted of himself and wife. Upon the same day the church at which he officiated received a timely and much needed donation, over both of which events the reverend gentleman was very much elated, as he communicated them to members of his congregation on his way to church on Sunday. It chanced that in his prayer he alluded to the financial event by returning thanks "for the arrival of a little succor," and was consequently much scandalized when asked after service whether he referred to the money or the baby.

HE RESISTED THE DEVIL.—A colored brother whose eyes were watery, and who had evidently been imbibing experience whiskey, was telling his young friend George that he ought to jine too. Said George, "I would, but de temptation to do wrong is too strong for me." "Whar's yer backbone, dat ye can't rose up and stand temptation?" exclaimed Brother Peter. "I was dat way myself once. Right in dis yere town I had a chance to steal a p'ar of boots—mighty fine ones, too. Nobody was dar to see me, and I reached out my hand and de debil said Take em Den a good spirit whispered for me to let dem boots alone." "An' you didn't take em?" "No sah—not much. I took a pa'r o' cheap shoes off de shelf, an' I left dem boots alone!"

VESUVIUS is at it again, after quietude for six years. Outbreaks are few and far between, that next preceding 1872 was in 1855, which overwhelmed the village of Cercolo, the stream of lava flowing ten miles. Between 79 and 1850 only forty-nine serious eruptions are believed to have occurred, and during the early part of this century the crater had been so long inactive as to justify Sir Charles Coldstream's remark; 'There's nothing in it." The summit had become in appearance a rocky surface, pierced by fissures, whence vapors escaped. In October, 1822, a violent eruption carried away more than 800 square feet, leaving a vast chasm miles in circumference. The eruption that overwhelmed Pompeii, was in 79. The amount of matter eructed is enormous, that sent forth in 1737 being over 33,580,000 cubic feet.

IN the French Department of the Vosges the Cure objected to a man of nineteen sitting on a bench in church with other men, and ordered him to remove to the children's department. The young man, knowing that at eighteen he might legally have been married, and that he was competent to serve in the army, resented being treated as a child, and refused to move. The pastor struck him in the face. An action of assault was instituted, but the judge held that the curate had only committed an abuse of ecclesiastical authority, for which he was not amenable without the consent of the Council of State, and he saddled the plaintiff with costs. An appeal has been taken. The logical consequence of the judge's ruling would be that a priest could not be tried at common law even for murder in his church.

So far from declining, our exports are rapidly advancing, and our imports continue to fall far below them. Our imports of merchandise for July were nearly four millions short of those for the same month of 1877, and for August about two and a quarter millions less, while the exports of goods in July were over nine millions, and in August nearly sixteen and a half millions greater than in the same months of 1877. The decreased movement of goods importation has continued up to this time, while the exports hav gone on swelling in amount and in value. The decline in importation as compared with 1876, began in November, 1877, and has gone on steadily since, the exports meantime being largely on the increase, every month of 1878 showing a decided gain over either of the two preceding years. For the eight months of this year up to September our goods imports declined over $49,000,000, and our goods exports increased $100,000,000, the net change thus being at the rate of nearly $223,000,000 per year. Including specie, the excess of exports is $189,122,000 for the eight months, against 64,415,000 for the same time in 1877, being a gain of $124,706,000. If this rate is maintained, as it seems likely to be, we shall hav a trade balance for the whole year of $289,000,000. For the eight months, too, our net export of specie was only $621,282, while for the same period last year it was more than $25,000,000, the exports having been $18,000,000 less, and the imports $6,000,000 more, than in 1877.

IS THERE TO BE A MILLENNIUM?—Among the other ancient doctrines of the Church which hav been losing their hold on a skeptical age, is that of the second coming of Christ. At a time when even theologians of high places in orthodoxy are arguing and explaining hell away, when certain scientific writers make the soul an etherealized material force, and when reasoners like Harriet Martineau, who represented a large class of thinkers, deny immortality itself, and treat it as a vain and illogical imagining, it is not surprising that the faith in the millennium grows weak and dim in many quarters. It is, indeed, a subject little preached about nowadays, whether the reign of the Messiah is treated of as a practical earthly sovereignty, or the indwelling of a powerful spiritual influence. The Jews at one time believed that the Messiah would one day come to reign at Jerusalem, and to bring together again the scattered tribes of Israel; but now great numbers of them smile at the idea as nothing more than a superstition. They are satisfied to remain where they are and in the enjoyment of their riches, and hav no desire to emigrate to the Holy City, which offers very few attractions as a place of residence, and furnishes no inducements to enterprise. Of course there are many of them who still cling to the tradition; but it is fading away from the minds of the more cultivated of the Hebrew race, many of whom, in truth, hav no definite spiritual belief at all, but are pretty thorough Materialists. There is also a Christian tradition touching the millennium which is based on the Hebraic tradition, but a very small part of the Christian Church at this time has any faith in the old notion of the personal reign of Christ at Jerusalem with all the pomp of an earthly court.

Events of the Week.

BISHOP DUPANLOUP, French prelate, is dead.

TWO HUNDRED thousand peasants hav revolted in Ningpo, China.

THE Hero Glass Works, of Philadelphia, were burned on the 12th. Loss, $50,000.

THE jury in the Billings wife-murder case failed to agree and were discharged.

A GANG of Texan desperadoes are committing murders and outrages in New Mexico.

THE town of Edenville, Pa., was destroyed by fire on the morning of the 13th. Loss, $350,000.

A NEW Methodist church, in Grand Rapids, Mich., was destroyed by a storm a short time ago.

GEN. COLTON, of San Francisco, Vice-President of the Southern Pacific Railroad, died on the 9th.

THE Rev. Mr. Rogers, pastor of a Presbyterian church in this city, has "evoluted" to Universalism.

THE Yale college students had a free fight a few days ago in which several were severely wounded.

SEVENTEEN persons were drowned by the overflowing of a river in northern Italy a few days ago.

THE Rev. Father McElroy, of White Plains, N. Y., is being "investigated" for immorality and drunkenness.

THE natives of the South Sea island of New Caledonia hav revolted and are massacring the French and English settlers.

A COMPANY of cricketers from Australia are making a playing and paying tour through this country. They hav already paid a visit to Europe.

BISMARCK meets with considerable opposition to the passage of his Socialist bill in the German Parliament. The bill appears to be a sort of aggravated Comstock law applied specially to Socialism.

THE death rate still continues very high in the fever-stricken districts of the South, and the suffering is intense. The total number of deaths from yellow fever in New Orleans thus far reported is 11,583.

THE Rev. A. H. Bradford, late agent of the publishing house of the Episcopal Church, South, is charged with unlawfully appropriating to his own use several thousand dollars belonging to the concern.

THE Rev. Mr. Hayden is in jail again. Fresh evidence has been found against him—enough, it is claimed, to convict him of criminal intimacy with Mary Stannard, poisoning her with arsenic, and then cutting her throat.

THE Spiritualists of Connecticut opened their annual convention at Hartford on the 12th. E. R. Whiting of New Haven was chosen President of the Association for the coming year. Andrew Jackson Davis addressed the convention.

A FALSE alarm of fire was raised during a recent performance in a theater at Liverpool, England. During the panic which ensued thirty-seven persons were trampled to death, and over one hundred were wounded. Two of the killed were women.

THE most terrific storm known for years visited the New England coast on the 12th. Houses were destroyed, trees uprooted, and church spires blown down. A great many vessels were driven ashore or sunk, and it is feared that many lives were lost.

THE New York Synod of the Reformed Episcopal Church had a lively tilt on the hell question the other day. Gen. Stewart L. Woodford, Vice-President of the Synod, resigned his position, as he could not accept the orthodox teachings concerning hell.

AN excursion train was wrecked on the Old Colony Railroad, near Boston, on the 8th. Five or six of the cars were crushed to fragments. The total number of deaths from the accident is twenty-two. Four persons are missing, and there are one hundred and twenty-six suffering from their wounds.

The Influence of Christianity on Civilization.

Since man has to a considerable extent, in some portions of Christendom, emancipated himself from the thralldom of the Church, he has made unprecedented progress. The advocates of Christianity now absurdly claim that the advancement thus made is justly ascribable to their faith. As well might we ascribe the enlightenment of Spain from the ninth to the thirteenth century to the religion of the Koran. In those times the Mohammedan might have maintained the divine character and beneficent tendency of his religion by a comparison of Spain with the Christian countries of Europe with just as much reason and truth as the defenders of Christianity now argue in favor of the divinity and favorable tendency of their religion by comparing the Christian nations of to-day with pagan countries—with as much reason and truth as the Protestant endeavors to prove what the Protestant form of Christianity has accomplished by pointing to England and America and contrasting them with Spain and Mexico as they are to-day. It is not uncommon for the defenders of Christianity to refer to the fact that nearly all the universities of learning in Christendom are sustained in the interests of the Christian religion, and that science, philosophy, and literature have been chiefly encouraged and cultivated by those who have been reared under the influence of this faith. The Saracens of Spain in the centuries named could have said the same in defense of Mohammedanism.

The noblest universities in the world were Mohammedan institutions, and the cultivation of science and learning was brought up under, and indoctrinated in the Mohammedan faith. But the universities and learning of Spain were surely not the result of the religion of the Saracens. Neither are the learning and the universities of England, Germany, and America the result of any form of Christianity. Mohammedanism was less unfavorable to intellectual progress in the Middle Ages than Mediæval Christianity. So Protestant Christianity as it exists in England or America is far less injurious in its tendency than Catholicism as it exists in Spain and Mexico; but it is certainly absurd to maintain that the progress that has been made in the former countries should be put to the credit of Protestant Christianity. This form of Christianity, like Catholicism, has, in the past, opposed science, philosophy, and reform, and persecuted the pioneers of intellectual progress to the full extent of its power; but, happily, its power, never equal to that of the mother Church, has been growing less gradually, until now it is so weak that, in this country especially, it can oppose but feebly the discoveries and innovations which contradict its assumptions and threatens to destroy it entirely. The policy that it now adopts to get a new lease of life is to conform, with the best possible grace, to the teachings of science and philosophy, and to acquiesce, as far as possible, in the reforms of the day.

Hence it is now comparatively harmless in checking intellectual progress. Herein we see the liberalizing and elevating influence of those sciences and arts, and those pursuits of industrialism which have thus expanded the mind and enlightened the understanding, and, in consequence, shorn religion of its power, and forced it, in spite of its stubborn opposition at every step, to abandon many of its antiquated errors, and stop its cruel persecution of the benefactors of mankind. It is skepticism and Freethought, not religion, that have contributed to the progress which we have sketched. "For more than three centuries," says Lecky, "decadence of theological influence has been one of the most invariable signs and measures of our progress. In medicine, physical science, commercial interests, politics, and even ethics, the reformer has been confronted with theological affirmations which barred his way, which were all defended as of vital importance, and were all in turn compelled to yield before the secularizing influence of civilization" (Hist. Morals, vol. ii, p. 17).

It is frequently asserted that in the most Christian countries the people are the most intellectual, moral, and happy. But the fact is, that in those countries in which skepticism and Infidelity have acquired the greatest strength and influence, and in which Christianity has been modified to conform to the changed condition of affairs, the people are the most advanced. The Abyssinians have had Christianity at least 1500 years. Faith among that people is sincere and unquestioning. Skepticism is not encouraged or tolerated. Yet according to travelers who have visited the Abyssinians their condition is one that does not afford a very good illustration of the elevating influence of Christianity. Bruce, the Scotch traveler, who was at Gondar, the capital, says he seldom went out without seeing dead bodies lying in the streets left to be devoured by dogs and hyenas. Another writer who lived there several years says he was invited to a feast, at which raw flesh with warm blood was offered the guests. "We are told," says Goodrich, "that the people eat the flesh from the cattle while alive, and sometimes after a large piece has been taken out, draw the skin over it, and drive the bleeding beast on its way. Sometimes when a party are assembled for a feast, and are seated, the oxen are brought to the door, the flesh is cut off, and the meat devoured while the agonized brutes are filling the air with their bellowings. These horrid things are said to be less common now than formerly, but the manners of the people in other respects are barbarous in the extreme. Yet strange to say, they profess Christianity and have numerous churches." I do not ascribe the lamentable condition of this people to Christianity; but their unadvanced state, after this religion has had 1500 years in which to exert an influence on their character, serves to show that something besides Christianity is necessary to make a nation enlightened and great. Commercial intercourse with other peoples, a knowledge of the arts and sciences, mechanical improvements, with other secular agencies, will probably in the future, lift Abyssinia out of her present up to a higher and better condition. Increase of intelligence will be accompanied by increase of skepticism, and we may expect most reasonably that Christianity in that land will, as in all other countries, be improved to correspond with the intellectual and moral state of the people. And when they shall have become enlightened, through causes entirely secular, and Christianity among them shall have improved in a corresponding manner, their advancement will no doubt, by some minds, be ascribed to the Christian religion.

Look at those nations in which, it is universally admitted, skepticism and Infidelity are exerting a powerful influence on the people. Prominent among them is Germany. The Church Union says, "That there is more practical skepticism in Germany than in any other great Protestant nation, seems to us established almost beyond argument." Every one knows how strikingly our German immigrants are marked by religious unbelief. The scientific minds of Germany have, almost without exception, shown their opposition to the Christian system by attacking its assumptions, or their contempt for it by utterly ignoring its claims. The greatest and most influential minds among the theologians even, are Rationalists. Dr. Bellows, writing from Germany a few years ago, declared that educated men as a class had abandoned all belief in the miraculous portion of the New Testament. It has long been a saying, that of every three German philosophers, two are Atheists. The poetry of Germany is pervaded by the spirit of free thought, and its best literature is so full of Infidel sentiments that the clergy and the religious press discourage the reading of it by the masses.

England, too, is a country in which the Christian religion has lost much of its authority and influence. The most prominent authors in that country, like those of Germany, either openly combat its dogmas or oppose it by their silence. Darwin, Huxley and Tyndall, Spencer and Mills, Harriet Martineau and Marian Evans, Buckle, Grote, Lecky, with a hundred more of the finest intellects of England, are the authors of works hostile to the Christian religion, with its teachings about miracles and supernatural manifestations. The intelligent artisans and mechanics of England, as a class, no longer attend any Christian church. "Indeed," Lord Shaftesbury lately said, "not more than two in a hundred of the working-class go to any place of public worship." Charles Bradlaugh, the noble champion of the people and the uncompromising foe of churchcraft and priestcraft, addresses audiences among the largest that assemble in that country. The rapid progress of Infidelity in England is admitted and lamented by the advocates of Christianity. Some months ago, the "Christian Evidence Society" had an annual meeting in London. Lord Salisbury presided. In his speech, he said that "the intense importance of the prevalent unbelief pressed itself on the minds of thoughtful Christians and acquired new weight every day. . . . They were standing in one of the most awful crises through which the intellect of Christendom had ever passed. They could point to many distinguished intellects from which all that belief had gone, in which, until now, the highest minds coincided." Lord Shaftesbury, following him, said that "bishops, deans, men of science, the greatest minds in literature, all avowed Infidel principles. It was difficult, in fact, to find a man under the age of forty who would confess to a belief in anything at all."

In France, Liberal views are confined chiefly to the educated class, and the excellent results of Freethought in that country are seen in the intellectual contributions which France has made to the world during the past century. The masses are, and have been, with only an interruption more apparent than real, under the influence of the Church. In the revolution of 1789 the people for a short time sympathized with the Liberal leaders in their opposition to Christianity, because they had been robbed, impoverished, and almost starved by the nobility and the priesthood, and because they saw that the Liberals aimed to destroy political and social despotism, and to substitute a better order of things for the old regime. But, ignorant of the principles of the anti-Christian school, and under the influence of the teachings of centuries, the people soon settled back into their old faith. Napoleon III. ruled France through the priesthood, and the devotion of the French peasantry is well known. Yet every orthodox clergyman thinks it his duty whenever any misfortune happens France, to attribute it to "the Infidelity of the people," when the fact is the masses in France are largely under the influence of the Church, and Infidelity is found principally among the class that has made France great in all the arts and pursuits of peace.

The Darwins.

"I know we all feel glad for Emma, and glad for you, Rose, too, that your dear friend is once more so happy," said Sue. "And now, for my part, I'll tell you about my last news from my brothers; and it is pleasant news, too. They both have an increase of wages, and are still studying and improving themselves. Bill won the prize in algebra that was offered by Squire Brown, and severals schools competed for it, too. It was a large edition of Shakspere's writings; just what he had long been wanting. And Bill has the finest flower-garden in all the town; and what's better yet, he can tell the name, characteristics, etc., of every flower in it. They have joined a reading-club, and Mrs. Dean and the girls attend with them twice a week. They write that they are the happiest family in all the world. But I know they are not happier than Charlie and I are."

"Nor Norman and I," said Rose, laughing.

"And somebody else is happy enough," said Myra, laughing and blushing, as she thought of the hours spent with Willie Darwin. "And now it is your turn," said Myra to quiet, sensible Jennie Martin, who sat next to her.

"And I haven't much to say that will make a story," said Jennie; "but I will tell you of myself, and how I have progressed in the conversion of father. 'It is hard teaching an old dog new tricks,' says the proverb; and I find it only too true when one tries to change a whole lifetime of thought. I have coaxed him to read several good books—'Taylor's Diegesis,' 'The Sixteen Crucified Saviors,' 'Volney's Ruins,' and all of Paine's works; and one would think a careful perusal of these would convert any sane, honest man. But somehow he still seems to think real Christianity is a good thing, whether it is true or not. Last week I sent and bought D. M. Bennett's 'Champions of the Church,' and we are now reading it aloud together, and I can see that this book is making him wince harder than any one we have yet read. We have only got through with the Introduction, which comprises in itself matter enough for several large volumes; Jesus, who is handled without gloves; 'Paul and the Evangelists,' and the 'Early Fathers;' and are now in the heart of 'Constantine the Great'—and he was great in wrong and iniquity, and bold and unscrupulous in his means, when striving for power, honor, or fame. I can see father seems much shaken as we read of this man, who was 'the first Christian emperor'—the first who won and wielded the power that has made Christianity the law of the land. You have all read that this emperor was converted to Christianity by a vision of the cross—'by the appearance in the clouds of the grand imperial standard surmounted by a large Greek R, with a cross of certain Greek words which signified "By this sign thou shalt conquer."' Well, 'The Champions' says this vision is related by Eusebius, and if we have no better authority than this noted falsifier for this tale, it will not make many believers. I see father has lost faith in Eusebius and all his writings since he read 'Taylor's Diegesis.' He says as so much he wrote is doubtful, and we have no means of knowing the true from the false, he don't care to take him as authority at all. 'The Champions' calls this Constantine an 'imperial parricide,' and blames him for being one prime cause of all the horrors that have since been perpetrated under the name of the religion he established."

"Yes," said Myra, "he was a bad man; and you will find more horrible things in that book, enacted in the name of 'the religion of peace,' than in any volume you ever read. I have gone all through it, and I tell you I felt sometimes as if I wished I had hold of some of those old popes and inquisitors, and could give them a taste of the suffering aud torture they inflicted upon the poor victims who were in their cruel clutches. I tell you what, girls, if I was rich I'd have that book reprinted and illustrated with chromos of every horrid implement of torture and every great historical scene of war and bloodshed that Christianity has inaugurated, and I'd have the portrait of every 'Champion' made just when he was doing his vilest deed, and thus would I send them down to posterity as 'giving glad tidings of great joy' to the world. I would distribute the books gratuitously, and they would kill, at one single stroke, every feeling of love, respect, and veneration that still lingered in the mind of any good, true man or woman for Christianity as it really is."

"I believe it would," said Rose. "But as you are unable to do this big thing, and none of us can accomplish miracles, we will all do our littles; and as 'many littles make a mickle,' we will still do much good work in a small way. I propose, as one step, that we each set about it to liberalize all that we can, one individual in this place. I shall take Mr. Lusk, as I have been working on him some time and have made considerable progress, and the rest of you may each select whom you please, and give them all they will read of Liberal books, tracts, and papers, and offer to argue with them, by letters, the subject of Christianity. Tell them if religion be true it will stand all tests; and if false, no reasonable person should care to believe longer in it."

"Good!" exclaimed the girls in a full chorus.

"We'll try it," said Sue, "and in four months we'll report progress at this place."

"Or rather in Edith's room," said thoughtful Jennie, "as by that time it may be too cool for us to need the shade of this grand old tree."

"And now it's Edith's turn to amuse, interest, or instruct us," said Myra, who was usually the moving spirit of the little group.

"I think I'll sing for you a couple of songs from 'The Truth Seeker Collection,' to music of my own," said Edith "if that will fill the bill."

They all said they should be delighted, and so she went in and got the book and turned to "The Yankee Girl," page 559, which she rendered so beautifully and musically that they thought it the greatest treat they had had in a long time.

"I used to love those lines when I was a child," said Rose. "I've heard my mother sing them to us children so often, I never think of them but I seem to hear her voice and see her as she sat in her favorite corner, singing for us in the dear, mother-like, melodious sweetness that will never be forgotten while life lasts. I often think mothers should choose carefully the songs they sing for their little ones, for they make life-long impressions."

"That's so," said Edith, "for I never hear 'The Orphans,' commencing—

"'My chaise the village inn did gain,' but I think of mother. It was always her cradle-song for me, and for years she sang it over and over again, and, child-like, the better I knew it myself the sweeter it sounded from her lips."

"My father is no musician," said Jennie, "but he used to sing 'Robin Redbreast' to me, and I feel now as if I could engrave the lines in golden letters and always keep them hanging in my room, simple as they are, in sweet memory of the days of childhood."

"I don't think I ever heard them," said Sue. "If not too long, will you repeat them?"

"Gladly," said Jennie; and she sang as follows:

"Little bird with bosom red,
Welcome to my humble shed;
Daily near my table steal
Where I pick my scanty meal;
Doubt not, little though there be,
I will cast a crumb to thee—
Well rewarded if I spy
Pleasure in thy glancing eye,
See thee when thou eat'st thy fill,
Plume thy breast, and wipe thy bill.
Come, my feathered friend, again—
Well thou know'st the broken pane."

"I don't suppose any of you see much beauty in them," said Jennie, when she concluded the simple ditty; "but I assure you each word has a charm for me, and I can see the broken pane just as plain as can be."

"And now, Edith, for your other song," said Myra.

"Here it is, on page 577—'A Respectable Lie.'"

"I might have known you would select that," said Myra; "you are such a goosey about prevaricating and falsifying."

"Blessings on my good mother for it," said Edith. "She never told me an untruth or deceived me in any way, and taught me an intense love and admiration for pure, honest, unadulterated truth from my babyhood. So, you see, I should falsify my whole training if I did not speak the thing which is."

"Isn't it a blessing that there are so many good mothers!" said Rose.

"Indeed it is," said Myra. "I never knew mine, but father so often quotes her sayings, and has told me so much of her goodness, that I know she was just perfection itself; and I take after her, you see."

"In some things, no doubt," said Jennie. "But I see Edith is ready to sing, so your busy tongue may rest a bit."

Myra took the advice pleasantly, and all listened as Edith's musical voice gave melody to the excellent words of the song. There was a little demur at the evident Spiritualism embodied in the closing lines, but otherwise it was declared excellent, one verse in particular:

"The Day-star is shining on high,
And Science comes in with her conquering legions,
And every respectable, time-honored lie
Will fly from her face to the mythical regions.
The soul shall no longer with terror behold
The red waves of wrath that leap up to engulf her,
For science ignores the existence of hell,
And chemistry finds better uses for sulphur."

"We'll change soul to mind, and it's complete," said Myra.

The Doctrine of Filiation, or Descent-Theory.

BY PROF. ERNST HAECKEL.

Footprints are very instructive when we attempt to estimate the many accidents which so arbitrarily influence our knowledge of fossils; they are found in great numbers in different extensive layers of sandstone; for example, in the red sandstone of Connecticut. These footprints were evidently made by vertebrate animals, probably by reptiles, of whose bodies not the slightest trace has been preserved (with the exception of a single specimen of the bones of a foot, preserved in the cabinet of Amherst College). The impressions which their feet have left on the mud alone betray the former existence of these otherwise unknown animals.

The accidents which, besides these, determine the limits of our palæontological knowledge, may be inferred from the fact that we know of only one or two specimens of very many important petrifactions. It is not ten years since we became acquainted with the imperfect impression of a bird in the Jurassic or Oolitic system, the knowledge of which has been of the greatest importance for the phylogeny of the whole class of birds. All birds previously known presented a very uniformly organized group, and showed no striking transitional forms to other vertebrate classes, not even to the nearly related reptiles. But that fossil bird from the Jura possessed not an ordinary bird's tail, but a lizard's tail, and thus confirmed what had been conjectured upon other grounds, namely, the derivation of birds from lizards. This single fossil has thus essentially extended not only our knowledge of the age of the class of birds, but also of their blood relationship to reptiles. In like manner our knowledge of other animal groups has been often essentially modified by the accidental discovery of a single fossil. The palæontological records must necessarily be exceedingly imperfect, because we know of so very few examples, or only mere fragments of very many important fossils.

Another and very sensible gap in these records is caused by the circumstance that the intermediate forms which connect the different species have, as a rule, not been preserved, and for the simple reason that (according to the principle of divergence of character) they were less favored in the struggle for life than the most divergent varieties, which had developed out of one and the same original form. The intermediate links have, on the whole, always died out rapidly, and have but rarely been preserved as fossils. On the other hand, the most divergent forms were able to maintain themselves in life for a longer period as independent species, to propagate more numerously, and consequently to be more readily petrified. But this does not exclude the fact that in some cases the connecting intermediate forms of the species have been preserved so perfectly petrified that even now they cause the greatest perplexity and occasion endless disputes among systematic palæontologists about the arbitrary limits of species.

An excellent example of this is furnished by the celebrated and very variable fresh-water snail from the Stuben Valley, near Steinheim, in Würtemburg, which has been described sometimes as Paludina, sometimes as Valvata, and sometimes as Pianorbis multiformis. The snow-white shells of these small snails constitute more than half of the mass of the tertiary limestone hills, and in this one locality show such an astonishing variety of forms, that the most divergent extremes might be referred to at least twenty entirely different species. But all these extreme forms are united by such innumerable intermediate forms, and they lie so regularly above and beside one another, that Hilgendorf was able, in the clearest manner, to unravel the pedigree of the whole group of forms. In like manner, among very many other fossil species (for example, many ammonites, terebratulæ, sea urchins, lily encrinites, etc.), there are such masses of connecting intermediate forms, that they reduce the "dealers in fossil species" to despair.

When we weigh all the circumstances here mentioned, the number of which might easily be increased, it does not appear astonishing that the natural accounts or records of creation formed by petrifactions are extremely defective and incomplete. But nevertheless, the petrifactions actually discovered are of the greatest value. Their significance is of no less importance to the natural history of creation than the celebrated inscription on the Rosetta stone and the decree of Canopus are to the history of nations—to achæology and philology. Just as it has become possible by means of these two most ancient inscriptions to reconstruct the history of ancient Egypt, and to decipher all her hieroglyphic writings, so in many cases a few bones of an animal, or imperfect impressions of a lower animal or vegetable form, are sufficient for us to gain the most important starting-points in the history of the whole group, and in the search after their pedigree. A couple of small back teeth, which have been found in the Kueper formation of the Trias, have of themselves alone furnished a sure proof that mammals existed even in the Triassic period.

Of the incompleteness of the geological accounts of creation, Darwin, agreeing with Lyell, the greatest of all recent geologists, says:

"I look at the geological record as a history of the world imperfectly kept, and written in a changing dialect; of this history we possess the last volume alone, relating only to two or three countries. Of this volume, only here and there a short chapter has been preserved; and of each page, only here and there a few lines. Each word of the slowly-changing language, more or less different in the successive chapters, may represent the forms of life which are entombed in our consecutive formations, and which falsely appear to us to have been abruptly introduced. On this view, the difficulties above discussed are greatly diminished, or even disappear." (Origin of Species, 6th edition, p. 289).

If we bear in mind the exceeding incompleteness of palæontological records, we shall not be surprised that we are still dependent upon so many uncertain hypotheses when actually endeavoring to sketch the pedigree of the different organic groups. However, we fortunately possess, besides fossils, other records of the history of the origin of organisms, which in many cases are of no less value, nay, in several cases are of much greater value than fossils. By far the most important of these other records of creation is, without doubt, ontogeny, that is, the history of the development of the organic individual (embryology and metamorphology). It briefly repeats in great and marked features the series of forms which the ancestors of the respective individuals have passed through from the beginning of their tribe. We have designated the palæontological history of the development of the ancestors of a living form as the history of a tribe, or phylogeny, and we may therefore thus enunciate this exceedingly important biogenetic fundamental principle: "Ontogeny is a short and quick repetition, or recapitulation, of Phylogeny, determined by the laws of Inheritance and Adaptation." As every animal and every plant from the beginning of its individual existence passes through a series of different forms, it indicates in rapid succession and in general outlines the long and slowly changing series of states of form which its progenitors have passed through from the most ancient times (Gen. Morph. ii, 6, 110, 300).

It is true that the sketch which the ontogeny of organisms gives us of their phylogeny is in most cases more or less obscured, and all the more so the more Adaptation, in the course of time, has predominated over Inheritance, and the more powerfully the law of abbreviated inheritance, and the law of correlative adaptation, have exerted their influence. However, this does not lessen the great value which the actual and faithfully preserved features of that sketch possess. Ontogeny is of the most inestimable value for the knowledge of the earliest palæontological conditions of development, just because no petrified remains of the most ancient conditions of the development of tribes and classes have been preserved. These, indeed, could not have been preserved on account of the soft and tender nature of their bodies. No petrifactions could inform us of the fundamental and important fact which ontogeny reveals to us, that the most ancient common ancestors of all the different animal and vegetable species were quite simple cells like the egg-cell. No petrifaction could prove to us the immensely important fact, established by ontogeny, that the simple increase, the formation of cell-aggregates, and the differentiation of those cells, produced the infinitely manifold forms of multicellular organisms. Thus ontogeny helps us over many and large gaps in palæontology.

To the invaluable records of creation furnished by palæontology and ontogeny are added the no less important evidences for the blood relationship of organisms furnished by comparative anatomy. When organisms, externally very different, nearly agree in their internal structure, one may with certainty conclude that the agreement has its foundation in Inheritance, the dissimilarity its foundation in Adaptation. Everywhere we find, though the external forms are most different, the same bones, and among them the same number, position, and connection. It will perhaps appear very natural that the hand of man differs very little from that of the gorilla, and of the orang-outang, his nearest relations. But it will be more surprising if the fore feet of the dog also, as well as the breast-fin (the hand) of the seal, and of the dolphin, show essentially the same structure. And it will appear still more wonderful that even the wing of the bat, the shovel-feet of the mole, and the fore feet of the duck-bill (Ornithorhynchus), the most imperfect of all mammals, is composed of entirely the same bones, only their size and form being variously changed. Their number, the manner of their arrangement and connection has remained the same. It is quite inconceivable that any other cause, except the common inheritance of the part in question from common ancestors, could have occasioned this wonderful homology or similarity in the essential inner structure with such different external forms. Now, if we go down further in the system below the mammals, and find that even the wings of birds, the fore feet of reptiles and amphibious animals, are composed of essentially the same bones as the arms of man and the fore legs of the other mammals, we can, from this circumstance alone, with perfect certainty, infer the common origin of all these vertebrate animals. Here, as in all other cases, the degree of the internal agreement in the form discloses to us the degree of blood relationship.

Communications.

An Answer to The Index Criticisms.

BY T. B. WAKEMAN.

[The following was written for and sent to The Index, and a copy simultaneously furnished us by the author; which will explain its appearance in our columns at this time.—Ed. T. S.]

The editor of The Index has honored my speech at Faneuil Hall against the Comstock Postal Laws with criticisms now extended to about eleven columns. This reminds me that "it never rains but it pours;" and if in all this quantity of words some things seem to escape me, let it be charitably remembered that I cannot reply to every sentence. But I will be careful to meet the material points. This I will do cheerfully, for these criticisms are the first and only public objections that hav been presented to the positions taken in that speech. Otherwise it has received a very general and decided approval from those who seem to me most competent to judge.

But let no one suppose that those positions are particularly mine. They belong to the mass of the Liberals, and, I believe, to the mass of the people, of this country. They were embodied in the petition against the Comstock Laws, signed by some 70,000 citizens. They were approved by the officers and audience of the Indignation Meeting before which the speech was delivered in Faneuil Hall; they were deliberately approved and incorporated into the Resolutions of the great Convention of Liberals of every shade of belief held at Watkins; they hav been generally approved by the Liberal press, and also by distinguished Liberals in many speeches and letters, and of which one from Mr. James Parton was published as a specimen in the last number of The Index.

The editor also does the Liberals too much honor if he represents the position as peculiar to them. It is simply that of the Constitution and of the people at large, and only as such hav I presented it.

He also lays out the geography of the discussion in too much of an individual manner, as though it was a kind of triangular contest between Messrs. Heywood and Tucker, and myself, and himself; whereas the real question is simply whether we shall insist upon the free press and free post-office which the Constitution provided for us, or not.

On this question, which is the only issue, the editor and his personal friends stand against the mass of the Liberals, as I hav indicated, and will stand against the people of the country when their attention can be called to the issue.

Messrs. Heywood and Tucker do not differ from the Liberals of the country on this, the only issue before us. What the states may or ought to do about obscenity are questions as to the discretionary exercise of state powers. No question of that kind is now before the League or the Liberals of the country; and until the Liberals can get Mr. Heywood out of jail I do not propose to discuss with him how far or in what way the states should exercise a power which all must admit they possess. I do not believe in hitting a man who is down—not even Mr. Heywood. He is not to be held responsible for his opinions until he is a free man. As long as he is in prison, his extreme views as to the exercise of state powers are not to be wondered at, and are certainly excusable.

The question is, Shall the Comstock Postal Laws be repealed? The position of Congress and the people for one hundred years, i. e., until the Comstock Postal Laws were passed, was stated and defended in the speech referred to. It was substantially as follows:

"(1) That the Constitution of the United States confers upon Congress no power whatever to legislate upon this subject; that its attempts so to do in the Comstock postal laws are beyond even any 'implied powers,' and are plain usurpations, which break down the whole Constitution as the bulwark of liberty, and, in the words of Hon. Elizur Wright, leave it 'not worth two brass buttons;' that those laws are in substance a decoy and espionage system over the post-office; that they have been the source of great wrongs and injustice; and that they cannot be amended so as to be safe and constitutional, and should therefore be repealed.

"(2) That the power to suppress obscenity and indecency, together will all other crimes or offenses, is one of the general powers reserved in the United States Constitution to the people and the states, and that it should be exercised by the state legislatures and courts with the greatest caution, only in 'unequivocal and well-defined cases,' and plainly within the constitutions of the several states."

The speech in question is a defense of these positions from a constitutional, political, and moral point of view, as against a dictum of the United States Supreme Court. As this speech has never appeared in The Index, I must remind all concerned that no adequate understanding of this discussion can now be had without reading it, and the opinion of the United States Supreme Court annexed to it. I will cheerfully send both to any address, so as to do what I can to aid in the proper understanding of this subject. I offer to do this because I hav not time to answer the lengthy criticisms in detail, and because, after considering them carefully, it seems as though a careful reading of the speech itself would be the only answer to most of them really needed.

I say this not with any feeling of disrespect, but from the belief that if the editor had delayed forming an opinion until he "had thought out the subject in all its bearings," and had been free from unfortunate circumstances and controversies that, I fear, hav unconsciously influenced his judgment, he would hav stood bravely with us.

This view is confirmed by the nature of his objections, which, let me say once more, seem to involve no real difference of principle, but only (1) confusions and (2) misapprehensions, which he unfortunately seems to desire to magnify, as if in self-defense.

The discussion, so far as it has gone, has certainly developed important agreements, which I did not anticipate from the defiant manner in which the editor opened it. Let me call attention to these agreements, as the common ground between us from which we may hope to conquer the remaining differences.

I. The editor is entirely with us on the most important part of the subject—one that seems to me to involve in substance the whole. He agrees that the present Comstock Laws are unconstitutional; that they abridge the freedom of the press; and, therefore, that the Supreme Court is all wrong on this subject. He says:

"We entirely agree with Mr. Wakeman that the Comstock laws, as they hav been administered—nay, more, as they can scarcely fail to be administered, so long as they retain their present dangerous vagueness and indefiniteness—flagrantly violate the freedom of the press, and are certainly for that reason unconstitutional. His argument is powerful and unanswerable, so far as it relates to these laws in their present form."

The best thing to do with unconstitutional laws is to repeal them; that is the general impression. But the editor wishes to reform them. But he is certainly under a misapprehension in supposing that these unconstitutional laws can be made constitutional by being made more definite. That is a great difficulty, certainly, but not the greatest.

The trouble is, as the argument proves in the speech which he says is unanswerable, that no postal laws on this subject can be enforced at all without abridging the freedom of the press, because they involve espionage and decoy as the only possible means of their enforcement.

The poison is the very substance of them. Judge Field, in the Opinion of the Court, points out these inquisitions as the only means by which these laws can be enforced, and they are the only means that hav been or can be practically used. The Judge expressly says that the party "receiving the prohibited matter may complain," or "the officers of the postal service can act upon their own inspection" "in excluding the prohibited articles or refusing to forward them," and such official may also make the complaint, of course.

Now, the "unanswerable" argument goes to show that no power of this kind was ever dreamed of under the Constitution, and that its exercise is a direct violation of the freedom of the press, and of the freedom of property from seizure granted by the Constitution, and that it is a means of inquisition "utterly inconsistent with the genius of free institutions," as the League resolved at Philadelphia.

I hav repeatedly and respectfully requested the editor to draft a statute that shall be free from "vagueness and indefiniteness" and which shall hav any practical value without involving these very objections which hav made my argument "unanswerable." The general talk about "reform" is of no possible use in such cases as this; if the thing can be done, he is under the deepest obligation to show how it can be done. Until he gives us a reformed Comstock Law he is clearly guilty, not only of "vagueness and indefiniteness" himself, but is guilty of making a schism in the Liberal ranks without any sound, clear, or sure ground to go upon. Vague declarations about "reform" and "purity" and "principles" amount to nothing. Let us see the the unconstitutional law "reformed" into a constitutional one, or let us hav silence on this whole subject.

The editor intimates that the elements needed are certainty of definition, and inquiry into the "intention" of the sender. But "legal definitions of any crime" must be by acts, words, or things; and "obscenity" is neither, unless all of the acts, words, and things are described. Let the editor giv them! And, again, when it comes to "intention," what legal process can ever reach and determine that? Only one tribunal has sat upon the intentions of men, and that was the Inquisition itself!

Lawyers of the greatest skill hav given up the framing of such laws in despair. I hav tried far enough to appreciate their difficulty. As an introduction to this task let me ask the editor to reprint a remarkable letter of the great American jurist and perhaps our greatest codifier, Edward Livingston, found in his Life by C. H. Havens, p. 289 (Appleton, 1864) and which was reprinted in the Boston Traveler of July 15th and The Word of August last. But Livingston's difficulty, insuperable as he found it, was with the definitions only; he did not propose to discover and punish intentions too. By the time the editor has disposed of both difficulties I believe he will find that the only practical reform of the Comstock law is the Shaksperian cry, "Oh, reform it altogether!"

Another important agreement to be observed is that by the admission above quoted the editor has placed himself with the rest of the Liberals in direct opposition to the U. S. Supreme Court on this subject. It is merely inconsistent cruelty, therefore, for the editor to refer to the presumption of my "individual opinion" as against the Supreme Court. Though I am "merely an attorney," I hav as good a right to dissent from the moral and political and constitutional opinions of that court as the editor. But his position will help all Liberals to see the absolute necessity of such dissent; and that the grounds of the speech in that regard should be really and practically admitted by this position of the editor himself is a great step of progress.

II. Another agreement which the discussion has happily brought out is the abandonment of the second plank of the Card Platform upon which the editor required all Liberals to stand at Syracuse or suffer the terrible consequence of his indignant abandonment. In my former letter to The Index this plank was quoted by carefully (not carelessly, as the editor supposed) omitting the words in it relating to the state, so that its statement on the National or Postal Law question could be seen at a glance; thus stated it affirms: "The right and duty of Congress to pass, and the right and duty of the National Courts to enforce, laws to suppress the circulation of obscene literature, including the exclusion of such literature from the United States mails."

It will be seen at once that this all-important plank upon which the editor insisted we must all stand or go under, goes to the full extent of asserting the unlimited jurisdiction of the United States over the whole subject of suppressing the circulation of obscene literature, and that only as an item of that general jurisdiction he included the exclusion of such literature from the United States mails.

That this was the editor's former view is clearly evident from his editorial of September 26th, in which he argues at length for what is summed up in these words:

"The powers of Congress are nothing but the powers of the people itself as a whole; for Congress is only a representative body deriving all its powers from the people it represents. To limit its powers, therefore, is to limit those of the people."

Again, in his editorial of October 3d, he derives this general power and jurisdiction of the National Government from the nature and enormity of the "crime" itself. He says there is a moral justification for treating this business as "a crime, not only by state but also by national legislation." "It is in strict accordance with the spirit of the U. S. Constitution to interpret it as giving jurisdiction over all crimes which, from the nature of the case, cannot be brought under the jurisdiction of the separate states. The crime of counterfeiting is of this nature since the power of coining money is conferred upon Congress alone; and the crime of mailing obscene literature is of this nature, since Congress alone has or can hav the power to regulate the Post-office system."

Here we hav the repetition of the general jurisdiction doctrine of the Card with a vengeance! Because any act is very bad it is worthy to be "a crime," and if the states cannot reach it conveniently, then the Constitution authorizes Congress to create it into "a crime" and punish it! Thus Congress can acquire unlimited criminal jurisdiction from its judgment of the criminality of acts and the difficulty of the states in punishing them! Can this be seriously pretended? Is it possible that the editor wrote what is above quoted after he had "thought out the subject in all its bearings?"

It seems not, for by his own admission in the next editorial in the same paper, in reply to my letter, which pointed out the absurdity of this general jurisdiction plank, he says of that Card:

"It was not intended to force the jurisdiction of the whole subject upon the United States Government, nor do we think the wording at all suggests any such extravagant position. But we take this opportunity to state that the platform in the 'Card' is not proposed for adoption in form by the League; it simply states the principles of the signers, which will be fully 'approved' if the League in any manner adopts unequivocally, by a simple majority vote, the policy of seeking to 'reform' and not to repeal the Comstock laws."

Now, the foregoing is a frank and plain withdrawal of the very plank upon which the "reform" rested in the Card. We were expressly told that the right and duty to exclude was "included" in the right and duty of Congress to pass, and of the national courts to enforce, laws to suppress the circulation of obscene literature. Now, if this general jurisdiction claim is abandoned as an "extravagant" and ridiculous blunder, what becomes of the right of "exclusion" which was "included" in it? Why, of course, that falls with the right and duty in which it was included. The part goes down with the whole. What ground is left, then, upon which the editor demands that we must still vote for "reform?" He asks us to vote for reform upon, and as necessarily included in, a "great principle" which he abandons as soon as its "extravagant" nature is pointed out to him, and yet he insists that his "principles" will be approved if we will only vote for "reform," although the very ground he rested it upon has dropped from under it.

But after the bottom is gone, why are we still asked to stake our all upon a "reform" that all experience has proved to be impossible? Must we, simply as an act of faith in him, take it like a pig in a poke?—and that after finding that the very plank he provides for the reform to rest upon is so "extravagant" that it breaks with the first footstep. We are tempted to ask again, Has this editor "thought out the subject in all its bearings?"

By the admission above made, if he really means and understands it, he comes back to the old and safe grounds of the speech, which would end all differences at once, to wit: "The power possessed by Congress embraces the regulation of the entire postal system of the country" for postal purposes; but not for moral, religious, political, or any ulterior purposes.

III. But no sooner is the admission made than he goes to work to invalidate it; and that brings us to a third point. He tries to revive the notion that the power to create and to legislate against "the crime of mailing obscene literature" is "an incidental power" necessarily implied in the power "to establish post-offices and post-roads."

In the speech criticised this matter was so thoroughly disposed of that no reply is needed to those who will read and heed what is there said. It was there shown, in the words of Henry Clay, that the mere mailing of anything is not and cannot be made a crime, and can never be lawfully so legislated by Congress under the Constitution; that the post-office can never be made a source of criminal jurisdiction or means of detection for the purpose of punishing even the crimes which are named in the Constitution as within the jurisdiction of Congress, to say nothing of making new crimes which it has no right whatever to create. It was shown that any attempt to punish crimes by espionage or decoy laws could only detract from the use, income, and "conveniency" of the postal service; that, instead of being "appropriate to" postal ends, they were detrimental, expensive, and useless as such, and could hav no use or justification, unless attempts to use the post-office for supposed moral purposes, i. e., for "ulterior purposes," could be justified; that until a part could be greater than the whole, no justification for such purpose was possible under the postal grant of the Constitution.

The editor dissents, but makes no serious attack upon these positions—as, indeed, who can? They stand as they did in 1836 when Daniel Webster said in the Senate that he was "shocked" at the claim to the contrary, and that the prohibition of the mailing of anything on account of its meaning was "expressly unconstitutional," and the Senate agreed with him. The editor, however, refers to two items, really taken from the speech, which seem to him inconsistent with this position. One is counterfeiting, and the other postal cards. These seem to me amusing items to be brought forward by one who has "thought out the subject in all its bearings."

Counterfeiting is referred to in the speech as one of the crimes expressly placed by name within the jurisdiction of Congress (Art. viii, § 6, of the Constitution). Moreover, by § 10 of the same Article all of the other crimes which the United States are allowed to punish at all are declared to be "piracies and felonies committed on the high seas, and offenses against the law of nations." All other crimes are expressly reserved to the states, except treason, which is specially provided for and defined in another Article, so that Congress could not, by definition or pretended incidental powers, get further criminal jurisdiction of any kind.

Now, the editor argues that counterfeiting is really an incidental power under the express power "to coin money," etc., and that the newly made "crime" of mailing obscene literature is similarly an incidental power under the express power "to establish post-offices and post-roads." He therefore declares them both "to be of the same nature," and concludes that if one is constitutional the other must be.

The answer is that the Constitution has expressly provided that Congress shall punish counterfeiting, and has no word whatever that looks towards making a "crime" of mailing anything, or punishing obscenity in any way. It is true that to punish counterfeiting might be considered an incidental power under the grant "to coin money," etc.; but the editor will find that it was just for that reason that the authors of the Constitution dragged it out of any such possibility and put it in expressed words. They expressly, as the debates show, used every precaution to prevent the inference of criminal jurisdiction from incidental powers, and thus in this only case where it might hav been implied they even inserted a separate clause rather than hav it left to inference. Now the well-known rule of construction is that the expressed inclusion of one instance in a grant is the exclusion of all similar instances of power. The expression of this only instance of incidental criminal power excludes all other instances and means that they are not to be implied. It shows that the authors of the Federalist were entirely right in saying that this postal power "must, in every view, be a harmless power." By "harmless," the contemporary discussions show they meant free from usurpation and criminal jurisdiction. The editor would make mail-carrying the unlimited source of both!

(2) The next point the editor discovers is that the speech is inconsistent in regard to postal cards; but he is mistaken again.

The speech says: "With the meaning of the documents INCLOSED, the Post-Office has nothing to do; and if they hav not, Congress has no power to punish for sending them."

Again it says: "It's repeal [i. e., the repeal of the Comstock law of 1873], is justly called for upon both grounds in the petition referred to," that is, on the ground of its unconstitutionality and its impolicy, or wickedness. But in "thinking out the subject in all of its bearings," each clause of the Comstock law was considered, and the clause relative to postal cards was disposed of in this way in the speech:

"A post-office regulation, that all matter should be INCLOSED, and that postal cards should contain nothing that could be offensive to those to whom they are sent, or to the public, is all that is necessary. This matter of the postal cards is entirely in the power of the department as a NECESSARY POSTAL REGULATION." "It is evidently put in the law in question only to giv it the color of necessity. If it is thought best to retain the form of the law, it should be materially modified so as to be within the postal powers and purposes only."

Now the editor imagines that there is great inconsistency in these quotations, simply because he overlooks the all-important difference, expressly pointed out, that in the first case inclosed matter only is treated of, which differs entirely from postal cards in which publicity is compelled by law, and for postal reasons; in the latter case the same reasons compel that they should be inoffensive to the receiver and not exciting to the public, otherwise that part of the postal service could not be maintained at all, much less worked conveniently. As it is, we are told that this enforced publicity is the great objection to their general use and to their safe and punctual delivery. It is said and believed that often the real excuse for their tardy delivery or loss is that the postal employees and their friends hav not had time to decipher them. The postal reasons for reducing this disadvantage of the postal card service to a minimum are too apparent and practical for doubt, and such reasons hav dictated the restrictions wherever this new system has been adopted as the first and necessary condition of its existence.

Again, that this service is a new postal provision, not intended under the Constitution, may leave it under the discretion of Congress to provide how it shall be used as a condition of granting it at all, as in the case of the postal-carrying of dry-goods and parcels of merchandise. But letters, papers, pamphlets, and sealed packets were, and are mail matter under the Constitution, which Congress cannot interfere with.

There is no inconsistency in the speech, then, in suggesting that these regulations should be those of the Department only, and that they should be limited to postal purposes, and to ordinary postal fines in case of complaint, thus repealing the cumbersome penal laws, penalties, and proceedings which are not ridiculous on this trivial subject only because they are terrible.

But notice the further fact that even this postal interference is allowable only when enforced publicity requires it. It therefore excludes the conclusion that it can be rightfully allowed as to inclosed matter where there is no such reason for it. Where the reason ceases, the law ceases; and the inclusion of it in the one case, according to the rule above cited, necessarily excludes it in the other. So far from there being an inconsistency, the postal-card regulations, like the counterfeiting illustration, lead to exactly the opposite conclusion the editor supposed, and sustain the speech. Thus, when a "subject is thought out in all its bearings," truth is ever confirmed.

The above three points dispose of the constitutional and most important aspects of the subject; and as to them it is clear that the editor has admitted or confirmed the conclusions of the speech. His "reform" of the Comstock postal laws will, therefore, hav no legal basis to rest upon, even if he could make them safe to liberty, and practical, which he cannot.

IV. Here we might rest the discussion, but for some grave misapprehensions he is under as to the bearing and importance of the questions involved.

The first we will notice is a fatal misapprehension as to the legal and practical importance to liberty of preserving the constitutional provisions, clearly defining and limiting the Federal jurisdiction in criminal matters. It really seems that the editor has forgotten all about the Constitution and the wisdom and statesmanship that formed it. How else could he write in this way?

"So far as freedom of speech and of the press is concerned, he [Wakeman] must either deny the right of the states, or else concede the right of Congress, to suppress literature that is really obscene. Freedom is violated by any unjust restrictions, and it makes not a pin's difference by what authority the restrictions are imposed. The protest of principle must lie against the restrictions themselves. Mr. Wakeman destroys his own case by conceding the justice of the restrictions when imposed by state authority, and yet inveighing against them as tyranny when imposed by Congressional authority. In consequence of this radical and fatal self-contradiction, the view he presents of the whole subject is merely that of the attorney; he has not treated it either as a Philosopher or Statesman."

Again hear him:

"The fact is that Mr. Wakeman has not thoroughly thought out his subject in all its bearings; he has treated it in too narrow and technical a manner. The powers of Congress are nothing but of the people itself as a whole; for Congress is only a representative body, deriving all its powers from the people it represents. To limit its powers therefore, is to limit those of the people," etc., etc.

It seems to me incredible that a President of the Liberal League can write in this way. Talk of statesmanship! when the great labors of all the statesmen we hav ever had, hav been to prevent the establishment of a Federal tyranny. The safest way to be a Philosopher and Statesman is to follow in their footsteps. In every convention and meeting that passed upon the Constitution in its formation; in every administration that has shed glory on the Republic since then, the point was and has been to defend the states and people from the tyranny and usurpation of the General Government, backed when possible, by the Supreme Court. I pray the reader to continue the line of argument of the speech into the works and records of those who adopted the Constitution, and I will gladly leave the question of "statesmanship" to them. The very theory of our Government, as well as the traditions of liberty, are in danger of being lost when our Liberal teachers write in the mingled ignorance and indifference above quoted.

As Patrick Henry pointed out usurped power is "tyranny," and is irresponsible and unlimited. If Congress can create and punish crimes without regard to the Constitution, it is the end of all popular liberty. The only protection the Liberal party and Freethought can hav against the whim of a majority is gone. All that was said in the speech about the necessity of insisting upon the true position of the Supreme Court as simply a legal tribunal, and not an arbiter of morals, religion, or liberty, is the voice of statesmen, and derives strange force when it is found that the President of the Liberal League is ready to surrender "the Bill of Rights," which is the only possible protection of the free thinking minority. Suppose that Jefferson, Jackson, or Lincoln had done so, where would we hav been? It is clearly the first duty of a Liberal to stand by the Constitution and its Bill of Rights as the fountain of all our liberties. When that is frittered away by giving Congress the power to create and punish crimes, the temporary party majority is simply an irresponsible tyrant. It will wield a vast judicial and criminal system foreign to the people, and before it the individual will be as helpless as before a Russian Czar.

The great purpose of the Constitution was to "protect liberty" by keeping the individual before the legislature, judge, and jury of his state and vicinage, and under laws that he could hav some influence in making, executing, or changing. These are the very conditions of liberty, and the Federal Government can only protect them; it cannot supply or replace them.

These very Comstock laws are a practical illustration of this vital distinction. All of the outrages hav been under the United States laws and by Federal judges and officers. Under the state laws, even in New York, unconstitutional as I think they are there, no great wrong has as yet been consummated, and there is less danger now than ever, for the state officers and grand juries are recovering from their obscenity panic.

I am not now called upon to determine what restrictions the state should impose to suppress obscenity. I simply say that those which were in force before the United States usurped this jurisdiction were in fact found to be sufficient. That the evil was practically removed under them before these postal laws were passed, and to those state laws, or to others which the people may hav a rational knowledge and control of, I propose to return. I leave the matter to them. The editor has not shown how otherwise the Constitution and our liberties can be preserved.

V. The editor is under similar misapprehension in regard to the position of Liberals on the subject of obscenity. Because they do not deem it necessary to throw overboard the Constitution and all their liberties to get it punished, he represents them as in favor of it, and so has been the cause and source of unlimited misrepresentation, if not of slander. He says, for instance, in italics: "Freedom of the press covers and includes the legal right to pu'lish, circulate and mail real obscenity! This," he says, "is exactly what Mr. Wakeman's argument means so far as the mails are concerned."

Again, when I tried to show that the "principles" underlying the discussion were common to us both—viz., that both "were in favor of liberty and opposed to obscenity," and that the real object was to discover the true, lawful, and practical way to secure the first and to avoid or repress the other—he will hav none of it. He replies indignantly:

"He [Mr. Wakeman] is greatly mistaken in imagining that there is 'no material differences as to "principles."' He declares that 'all are in favor of liberty and opposed to obscenity.' It is true that all Liberals are in favor of liberty, but it is not true that all Liberals are opposed to obscenity. Can a man be said to be opposed to murder who demands the repeal of all or any of the laws which punish it? We certainly think not. The trouble with 'repeal' is that it would abrogate some or all of the laws which punish the crime of circulating obscenity, and thereby, no matter what the intention, does in fact protect and foster that crime. If there is any real answer to this, let us by all means hav it."

Certainly. You shall hav it; but it seems strange that any answer should be needed. Liberal people, and all sensible people, are not in favor of crimes because they want them discovered and punished constitutionally, by the proper authorities provided by law for that purpose, and by methods that will not work far greater harm to society than the injury of the crimes themselves. There is nothing so dangerous as a panic. The editor seems not to hav recovered from the obscenity panic from which the whole country was suffering as the result of a few sensational newspaper articles and some real cause in 1872, and which gave us Comstock and his laws after the real evil had been removed by the state laws and public opinion, as I believe will always be the case.

The editor condemns us upon a very amusing "principle." If, he argues, a thing is very wrong, then it is a crime, and then it has no rights anywhere, or when, or how; and anybody may punish it in any way, lawful or not; and if any one does not do so or favor doing so, then he acknowledges that the crime has "legal rights," and he favors and fosters it whether he intends to or not.

This feels to me like the logic of Judge Field's opinion, and I fear the editor has absorbed it from that source. Let us try it on. Libels are very wicked and villainous, and are generally circulated through the mails. An editor often on the mere word of a private correspondent abuses his tremendous power to charge evil acts, intentions, and even crimes that injure and often practically ruin and murder his victims. I believe such offenses are very wrong—are crimes that make obscenity itself appear white, and so the laws of all civilized countries declare. But shall we ask Congress, which has nothing to do with it under the Constitution, to go to legislating on the subject and to declare the mailing of a libel a crime, punishable with death, in the United States courts; and to be discovered by espionage of mail matter, and induced by decoy? Or shall we resort to lynch and mob law? Certainly not. We will hav the states make reasonable and sensible laws on the subject, and will try to have those laws reasonably and effectively enforced by the proper courts and juries of the vicinage. So we deal with forgery, treason, swindling, and many other crimes in the commission of which the mails are constantly used. Yet because we punish these crimes only through the states, do we favor or foster them?

So as to murder, to which the editor refers. Many excellent persons believe that society has advanced so far that the death penalty for it does more harm than good, and they ask its abolition; but are they therefore in favor of murder? Not long ago every felony was punished with death. The scaffolds were constantly hung with victims or red with blood. Civilization has been measured by the abolition of these penalties, and cherishes the memory of those who labored for their abolition. Now are we to be told that they did it all because they wished to favor and foster the crimes? or that they did so in fact?

When the editor recovers from his panic he will see the absurdity of all this, and will regret that he said that "all Liberals are not opposed to obscenity." Such charges should not be made upon mere inferences, for they are misunderstood. The editor began this discussion by saying that "we do not imagine that Mr. Tucker [Mr. Heywood's champion] is any more in favor of obscenity than anybody else." Certainly after that certificate he ought to give the rest of the Liberals a clean bill of health, even though, in the words of Mr. Parton, they do go for "immediate and unconditional repeal" of the Comstock Postal laws, "because they are unconstitutional and wrong in every way, and pernicious in many ways."

When the editor preaches on the enormity of obscenity, as he does so eloquently—I will not say that he does it "merely" as an ex-parson—I listen gratefully and reply only from the "amen corner;" and it is hardly fair for him to represent me as an obscenist because, "merely as an attorney" or otherwise, I try to explain to him what the Constitution, law, and common sense on this subject really are. When he is content to rest his zeal for purity upon them I shall be with him.

VI. The editor is under misapprehension, also, as to what the people expect of the Liberal party. It is not "sound in principle or policy" for a Liberal party to become the advocates of unconstitutional laws, pernicious espionage, or inquisitions, which hav been dictated by "religious" zeal or hypocrisy. To curry favor with an obscenity panic is business that can be better and safely left to Mr. Comstock and his friends. We hav no call to compete with them in such rivalry, and shall gain nothing but contempt for the attempt.

The "awakened conscience" of the whole people is in favor of constitutional liberty and common sense on this whole subject. The Liberals are the natural leaders of this sentiment and movement. If they know enough to advance them, they will become the vindicators of the rights of the people and of Man. They will stand forth as a moral and political power in the land. If they fail in this crisis they will hav no sufficient reason for their existence. They will struggle along scarcely worthy of the notice or of the contempt of their opponents. Let them take the watchwords, LIBERTY AND PURITY, NOW AND FOREVER, ONE AND INSEPARABLE! The future will then find in them the great, because the reforming, growing, and moral, influence of the country; for the free and the pure will certainly "inherit the earth."

Voltaire in Exile.

HIS LIFE AND WORK IN FRANCE AND IN FOREIGN LANDS.

BY M. GASTINEAU.

(Translated for THE TRUTH SEEKER.)

IV.—CONTINUED.

Voltaire had gone from Brussels to Anvers, in Holland, where he had embarked upon the canals. He took the name of Révol, and had his correspondence addressed to the care of MM. Ferney and d'Arty, merchants of Amsterdam. But he lived with Ledet, who printed an edition of his works, comprising the "Eléments de la Philosophie de Newton," uncompleted. Voltaire went to Leyden, where he chose his domicile with a banker named Rollen. In Berlin he saw the celebrated physician Boerhaave.

During this time, Madame du Châtelet imparts her mortal inquietudes to the Count of Argental, whom Voltaire called his good angel, and who was, indeed, all his life the type of the devoted and disinterested friend. In her letters dated from Cirey she entreats him to use all his influence upon his friend to dissuade him from incorporating the "Mondain" in the edition of his works, and to divert him from visiting Prussia.

"His sojourn in Prussia would harm him," says she. "The climate is horribly cold. The Prince Royal is not king. When he shall be king, we shall go to see him together. But until he is, there is no security there. His father knows no other merit than that of being ten feet high; . . . he is suspicious and cruel; he hates and persecutes his son; he keeps him under a yoke of iron."

The Châtelaine de Cirey has such a fear of Voltaire going to Prussia that she does not leave him time to complete the "Eléments de la Philosophie de Newton" at Amsterdam. She sends him letter after letter to recall him to Cirey, to the effect that Voltaire believes himself in duty bound to defer to her wishes. This recall to the gardens of Armida was not of long duration.

V.

Marc-Antoine du Châtelet, Marquess of Trichâteau, had just died, bequeathing to his cousin his properties situated in Flanders. This succession gave rise to serious litigation between the houses of Châtelet and of Hoensbroeck. In order to sustain a suit and to defend her endangered interests, the Marchioness du Châtelet unhesitatingly left Cirey, with her inseparable Voltaire, who was not sorry to breathe more freely abroad than in France, where he was ever disturbed, threatened, and forced to concealment.

Leaving Cirey on the 8th of May, 1739, the two travelers arrived at Brussels on the 28th, after having stopped four or five days at Valenciennes. Voltaire and the Marchioness scarcely touched land at Brussels. They went at once, passing by Louvain, to Bevinghen, whence Madame du Châtelet wrote to the Count d'Argental:

"Here we are in Flanders, my dear friend. I was visited and feasted in Brussels when I merely passed. Rousseau is no more spoken of there than if he were dead. All were eager to feast M. de Voltaire. I am actually within ten leagues of Brussels, on an estate of M. du Châtelet."

Then Voltaire sought the most quiet quarter in Brussels, and installed himself, with Madame du Châtelet, in the Rue de la Grosse Tour (Great Tower Street).*

She was a precious companion for a philosopher, this young and admirable woman, impassioned with science, possessing upon the ends of her fingers all the Greek and Latin authors, and translating into French the works of Newton. She had Koenig, her professor of mathematics, to follow her to Brussels.

Notwithstanding his resolution to isolate himself in order to be fully consecrated to his cherished studies and noble labors, Voltaire did not long remain secluded in Brussels. Rousseau had, the very first thing, let out his presence in the capital of Brabant. He went clamoring everywhere against the illustrious writer, repeating that he preached Atheism.

Jealous of Voltaire's fame, Rousseau had vainly sought to divert the Duke d'Aremburg from the society of the author of "Zaïre," whom he cavalierly styled a rimeur de deus jours, or "a forty-eight hour rhymer." Voltaire, to whom repartee was an easy thing, retorted by comparing Rousseau's poetry to the croaking of frogs.

All that Rousseau gained by his calumnies and hostilities against Voltaire was the loss of the pension generously given him by the Duke d'Aremberg, and expulsion from his house.

To conclude with Rousseau, let us say that, struck with apoplexy on his return from Hague in the month of October, 1740, he died in Brussels on the 17th of March, 1741, at the respectable age of seventy-one, and that his piety brought him the honor of being interred in the church of the Bare-footed Carmelites.

Pirou, who had the mania of epitaphs to such a degree that he composed his own—

> "Here lies Pirou, who naught could be,
> Not even Academician he"— also wrote Rousseau's epitaph. It has remained famous. We subjoin it:

> "Here lies the illustrious, unfortunate Rousseau;
> In Paris he was born, and in Brabant laid low.
> His life is in this epitaph
> Summed up: It was too long by half.
> For thirty years of envy worthy,
> For thirty more he was to pity."

The judgment of Pirou may be accepted as impartial, for the author of the "Metromanie" was the intimate friend of Jean Baptiste Rousseau, from whom he did not separate during his sojourn in Brussels in 1738 and 1740. In these two years Pirou did not see Voltaire. He was secretly jealous of him, and, blinded by his immense vanity, pretended to be his superior. "Voltaire works in marquetry," said he, "and I cast in bronze."

But let us retrace our steps and return to the year 1739.

Jean Baptiste Rousseau had vainly used all his venom-teeth against the finely-tempered file of Voltaire, whom the most distinguished personages of Brussels knew well how to appreciate, as well as to find his peaceful retreat in the Rue de la Grosse Tour; among others, the Prince of Chimai, the Duke of Aremberg, who became his friends, and the grandson of the illustrious pensionary De Witt, who put at his disposition his library—the richest in Europe. Desirous of requiting these courteous visits, Voltaire gave a feast, to which he invited the representatives of several great Brussels families. They responded with eagerness to his appeal.

"This is the country of uniformity," writes Voltaire to M. Berger, at the date of the 28th of June, 1739. "Brussels has so little activity that the greatest news of the day is a very small feast which I give to Madame du Châtelet, to Madame the Princess of Chimai, and to M. le Duc d'Aremberg. Rousseau, I believe, will have no share in it. It is assuredly the first feast given by a poet at his own expense, and where there was no poetry. I had promised a very gallant device for the fireworks, but I have had made some great and very luminous letters that say: 'I am for the jeu va tout!' That will not cure our ladies, who love the gleek a little too well. Yet I did it only to cure them."

This letter, by which we learn that the ladies of Brussels of the last century loved and played with frenzy the brelan, the jeu va tout, is followed, two days later, by another missive to Thiérot, in which Voltaire relates the tragic accident which had come to sadden the feast:

"I write you from a house from which Rousseau has been driven forever—a just punishment of his calumnies. I would say a good many things to you, but I am really sick from a shock which made me nearly faint when I saw fall at my feet, from the third story, two carpenters whom I had at work. Imagine what it is to see two poor artisans fall in this way and to be covered with their blood. I see that it is not for me to give entertainments. That sad spectacle corrupted all pleasure of the most agreeable journey in the world."

To chase away the impression of the terrible accident which had disturbed the sensibility of Voltaire, the Duke d'Aremberg had taken him, with Emilie, to his residence, d'Enghien.

If we believe Voltaire, the signification of the word utopia was absolutely unknown in Brussels during the last century. Ignorant of the word, they of course were ignorant of the thing. And truly, they have never been very utopian in Belgium. Here follows what Voltaire wrote to Helvetius on this subject:

"I admit to you with shame that I have never read the 'Utopia' of Thomas More. However, I took it in my head some days ago to give a merry-making in Brussels, under the name of the Envoy of Utopia. The feast was in honor of Madame du Châtelet, as a matter of course. But would you believe that nobody could be found in the town who knew the meaning of Utopia. It is not the home of belles-lettres."

* To-day the Rue du Grand Cerf (Great Deer street). A tavern exists yet to-day, bearing the sign: "A la Grosse Tour." In 1742 and 1743 Voltaire lived in Brussels, Place de Louvain, as is attested by the letter he wrote, in a pleasant Oriental style, to the Abbe Aumillon, in October, 1742, and ending thus:

"Written in my pigmy closet, Place de Louvain, afflicted with an enormous colic, the 8th of the moon of the 9th month, the year of the hegira 1122."

On the other hand, Madame du Châtelet was writing from Lille to the Count d'Argental, the 10th of October, 1743:

"I am going to Brussels as soon as a slight fever I have is over. Write me at Brussels, Place de Louvain."

Why the Hard Times?

BECAUSE OF THREE FRAUDULENT ACTS OF LEGISLATION, VIZ.: THE AMENDMENT TO THE LEGAL TENDER ACT, EXCEPTING DUTIES ON IMPORTS AND INTEREST ON BONDS AND NOTES—THE LAW OF 1866, AUTHORIZING CONTRACTION—THE SPECIE RESUMPTION ACT OF 1875.

[PRIZE ESSAY BY MISS C. A. BLODGETT.]

[Our readers remember Mrs. Elizabeth Thompson, of New York, offered some months ago, three prizes for the best articles explaining the cause of the present national distress. Of 400 Essays sent in the following took one of the prizes.]

MRS. ELIZABETH THOMPSON, Dear Madam: You ask the friends of humanity to contribute their "mite" toward the solution of the vexed problem of our financial distress. I have studied the subject from a woman's standpoint of observation, and with only a woman's powers of comprehension, but I do not hesitate to offer you as the result of three year's untiring application my honest convictions and carefully arrived-at conclusions.

Like yourself, I looked out upon the appalling situation, and my heart was touched for humanity. I said, "Silver and gold have I none, but such as I have will I give to the solution of this important question." I am confident that I have arrived at the truth. If other writers receive your munificent gifts I know it will be because they have told the same story in a better manner.

Early in the year 1861 the Federal Government found itself placed under the necessity of using a much larger volume of money than it possessed, or could by any possibility acquire in the accustomed way. It tried what is always the first thing to be thought of in an emergency, viz.: to borrow of its neighbors, and like a cringing parasite, this prince of nations went rapping at nearly all the doors of Europe, asking the loan of a little gold, of twelve per cent. But the foreign powers were all deaf to their entreaties, and our agents returned as empty-handed as they went away.

OFFERING THE SUICIDAL INTEREST

We had in the national capitol at that time too many loyal men with prolific brains to allow the nation to perish for want simply of gold, while we possessed every other possible source of wealth in abundance. As a result of their honest and earnest efforts was created. In July, 1861, $50,000,000 of treasury notes, payable on demand, were issued and paid to the soldiers of our army in place of the gold (?) that had been pledged them on enlisting. As it was exactly at par with coin, fulfilling in every particular the same functions, there was no ground whatever for complaint. On the 12th of February, 1862, $10,000,000 more were authorized to be issued, and in March all outstanding issues of this series were MADE FULL LEGAL TENDER.

THE GREENBACK CURRENCY

Concerning the bill as originally reported in the House, Thaddeus Stevens said, in his memorable speech before the Senate, that it had cost the committee months of patient labor and painstaking, and was the result of their most deliberate and comprehensive thought.

It was sent to the Senate and given into the hands of the Senate Finance Committee, of which Senator Fessenden was Chairman. After the usual deliberations the Committee reported it to the Senate for their final action, with the following amendment: "This money is legal tender for all debts, except duties on imports and interest on bonds and notes, which shall be payable in coin."

Here was sprung the first leak that began sinking the Ship of State.

Nevertheless, her pumps were so well adjusted, and so vigorously worked, as to keep her floating buoyantly until her keel was stove by that great rock against which so many a national bark has made shipwreck before, viz.:

SPECIE RESUMPTION.

It is time now that a beacon light was placed on that golden boulder, and the political mariner who cannot steer clear of it in the future should not be trusted even as wheelsman.

The amendment above noticed, which has proved the parent of such great loss to the people, was opposed so ably by eminent statesmen as to entirely refute the oft-repeated statement that we have no great men now-a-days.

Mr. Spaulding of New York, said: "I am opposed to all those amendments of the Senate which discriminate in favor of the holders of bonds and notes, by compelling the Government to go into the streets every six months to sell bonds at the market price to purchase gold and silver, in order to pay the interest in coin to the capitalist who holds United States stocks; while all other persons in the United States (including the army and navy, and all who supply them with food and clothing), are compelled to receive legal-tender treasury notes in payment of all demands due them from the Government.

"Why make this discrimination? Who asks to have this one class of creditors placed on a better footing than another? . . .

"Sir, it is a very respectable class of gentlemen, but a class of men who are very sharp in all money transactions. They are not generally among the producing classes. Not amongst those, who, by their labor and skill, make the wealth of the country; but a class of men who have accumulated wealth. Men who are willing to lend money to the Government if you make the security beyond all question and pay them a high rate of interest and make it payable in coin.

"The legal-tender treasury note bill was intended to avoid all such financiering, and protect the Government and the people who pay taxes from all such hard bargains."

Thaddeus Stevens closed the debate with the following brief, sincere, and convincing language:

"Mr. Speaker, I have very few words to say. I approach the subject with more depression of spirits than I ever before approached any subject in my life. I have a melancholy forboding that we are about to consummate a cunningly devised scheme, which will carry great injury to all classes of people throughout the United States, except one. With my colleague I believe that no act of legislation of this Government was ever hailed with as much delight throughout the whole length and breadth of the Union, by every class of people, as the bill which we passed and sent to the Senate. . .

"It is true there was a doleful sound came up from the caverns of bullion brokers, and from the saloons of the associated banks. Their cashiers and agents were soon on the ground, and persuaded the Senate, with but little deliberation, to mangle and destroy what it had cost the House months to digest, consider, and pass. They fell upon the bill in hot haste, and so disfigured and deformed it, that even its very father would not know it. Instead of being a beneficent and wise measure it is now positively mischievous. . . . It makes two classes of money, one for the banks and brokers, another for the people. It creates money, and by its very terms declares it a depreciated currency."

Despite the earnest entreaties of its friends, this bill passed the Senate mangled and distorted, as you see, and those who wonder why the greenback dollar is not, and has not always been, as good as the gold dollar, have only to look upon its back and they will find this explanation:

"Except duties on imports and interest on the public debt."

Upon its final passage the great heart of Thaddeus Stevens was so moved by the evils he foresaw must come to his countrymen through this act of legislation that he sat down in his Senate chamber and wept.

The result is well known. Gold advanced almost immediately to 185 per cent premium, which, of course, caused a corresponding advance in the price of all commodities bought and sold.

While coin was the standard at which all prices were rated the greenback currency was the money of the people. The Government paid it out in the place of gold, and received it back depreciated almost two-thirds. This terrible disparity was all occasioned by the Government creating a necessity for nearly three times as much gold to be paid annually as it could produce, and not, as was so generally believed at the time, because the perpetuity of the Government was doubted by all the powers of the world.

The war was carried to a successful termination, and all debts, except interest, of the Government, and ante-bellum liabilities were paid in this depreciated currency until more than two thousand millions of it had been put in circulation.

This scheme immediately took every dollar of gold from the channels of trade, and sent most of it into the hands of royalists, for it was now too expensive a luxury for our own citizens.

When the greenback currency had really become the money of the country, and we had adjusted our business to the sham of forty to sixty-five cents to a dollar, the foundations were again unsettled by the most gigantic political earthquake that ever shook the commercial world.

(The reason the first discrepancy did not work more damage than it did to our domestic commerce, was that in administering a dose of poison to the body politic the political doctors gave too much, and thereby destroyed its intended effect. Had coin continued to circulate to any considerable extent among one class of the people, and paper been used by another, the difference would have ruined any class in a very short time. But producers and consumers estimated the values alike in greenbacks, so that the exchange was nearly equal after all.)

CONTRACTION OF THE CURRENCY.

In the year 1866, Hugh McCullough, Secretary of the Treasury at that time, said, "The legal-tender act was a war measure, and not intended to remain in force a day longer than was necessary to prepare for a speedy return to specie payment."

"Is there an honest man or woman in the nation who believes that our greenback currency, bearing the image and superscription of Abraham Lincoln, was simply a fraudulent paper designed only to pay our soldiers with, and to buy of our merchants and farmers supplies for the army, and then to be destroyed when we had no further need of their services?

I appeal to you to say if you believe any such cunningly-devised scheme was intended by Abraham Lincoln, Salmon P. Chase, and Thaddeus Stevens when they gave their support to the legal-tender bill?

During the four years immediately preceding contraction, viz.: '63 to '66 inclusive, there had not occurred in the United States an average of seven hundred business failures per year.

After this they began immediately to increase until they reached the appalling sum of eleven thousand in our centennial year.

During the first three months of the present year they reached the enormous sum of 2,780, seven hundred more than during the four years immediately preceding contraction.

These are significant facts, and can by no possible contradiction be made to mean anything else than so much robbery of our own people.

Josephus Knew no Paul or other Apostles.

BY SCHOLASTICUS.

Josephus was born A. D. 37 in Jerusalem, where he livd until its destruction by Titus, A. D. 70. Few ancient historians wrote more fully and truthfully than he of the events of their time. Not more than eight years before his birth, unless all Christendom has been hoodwinked for seventeen hundred years, the most momentous drama in the world's history, the crucifixion of the Son of God, was enacted in the city where our historian was born. Surely his father, who, he says, "was in great reputation in Jerusalem," and his mother, as well as his elder associates, must hav often talked to him of that memorable event. But the all-searching historian is strangely silent concerning it, and his silence is the more unaccountable considering that learned churchmen, such as the distinguished translator of his works, Dr. William Whiston, have claimed him as an Ebionite or Nazarene Christian. But since Dr. Lardner proved that the passages in Josephus concerning Christ were forged, most Christian scholars no longer claim him as a witness, but rather denounce him as an enemy, because he ignored the very existence of Christianity, whose birthplace and center was his native city.

Bear in mind that Josephus was born about the time of Paul's conversion, which, according to Acts, occurred sometime between A. D. 30 and 38. That book describes five visits by Paul to Jerusalem, four of which were certainly in the lifetime of Josephus, to wit, about A. D. 44, 51, 56, and 58 or 60. Two of these were too important to hav been ignored, namely, that of 51 and 58 or 60. In 51 Josephus was fourteen years old, at which age, he says, he had made such attainments in learning that the high priests and principal men came frequently together to consult him on points of law (Life, sec. 2). How is it possible that so learned a youth should hav taken no notice of the meeting of the first Christian council in his own city?

But take the last visit of Paul to Jerusalem, when Josephus was twenty-one or twenty-three years old. We read in Acts that the apostle was joyfully received by James and all the elders. To avoid offending the Jews he observed some of their rites. In spite of this his appearance in the temple excited a riot, and he was dragged out and would hav been murdered but for the interposition of the Roman chief captain. Then he was permitted to address the crowd from the steps of the castle; but this did not appease their wrath, and he was taken within to save his life. The next day he was brought before the Jewish council, presided over by the high priest. Here, by an adroit plea, he gained the favor of the Pharisees, but such was the deadly hatred of the Sadducees that again the Roman captain had to rescue him from death. Then forty Jews took an oath not to eat or drink till they had slain him. Fortunately the apostle happened to hav a friendly nephew in the city who informed the captain of the plot, whereupon he was hurried away by night to Cesarea under a strong guard of soldiers.

All this exciting scene escapes the notice of the great historian.

Again, a few days later, Paul's case was heard before Governor Felix at Cesarea, in the presence of the high priest and elders, who came from Jerusalem with eminent counsel to prosecute the apostle. Paul's eloquence was such as to cause Felix to tremble and postpone his decision indefinitely; but what does Josephus know about this?

Again, after remaining a prisoner for two years, Festus succeeds Felix, and forthwith the Jews apply to the new governor to hav Paul sent back to Jerusalem. But yielding to the wishes of the prisoner, Festus orders a rehearing at Cesarea. Accordingly, after a few days, on the arrival of King Agrippa, Paul has another notable trial before Governor Festus, King Agrippa, his wife Bernice, and leading Jews from Jerusalem. On this occasion Paul makes his grandest oratrical display, almost persuading the king to become a Christian. But Josephus knows no more of this than of the former events.

It is now A. D. 60, 61, or 62, and Paul is sent to Rome, where he arrives in 61, 62, or 63, and where he remains "two whole years," if not longer, as is generally believed.

Now, mark a contemporary event in the life of Josephus. He says (sec, 3) that in his 26th year (A. D. 62 or 63) he went to Rome to intercede for certain priests sent there by Felix to be tried before Cæsar (Paul was held by Felix and sent to Rome by his successor, Festus). Josephus must hav arrived while Paul was there, or at the furthest, just at the end of his two years' confinement in Rome, where, as elsewhere, according to Acts, he discoursed pretty orthodox Pharisaism, such as Josephus himself professed. And yet the historian knows nothing of Paul at Rome.

Verily it would seem as if the writer of Acts had plagiarized this part of his story from Josephus, for the coincidence is remarkable in many respects, including the shipwreck which both so narrowly escaped.

It is scarcely necessary to notice the silence of Josephus concerning Peter, who is claimed by the Catholic Church to have been bishop of Rome from A. D. 42 to 66. The story about Paul is itself a sufficient refutation of that absurd tradition. He found not only no Peter at Rome A. D. 61–63, but no Christian church, if indeed any Christians.

In the marginal chronology of our Bibles Paul's arrival at Rome is dated A. D. 63, but Smith's "Bible Dictionary" puts it A. D. 61, and in Harper's "Cyclopedia of Biblical Literature," not yet completed, an attempt is made to fix it earlier, to wit, A. D. 56, by interpreting the "two years" of Acts xxiv, 27, to mean, not the term of Paul's detention, but Felix's term of office, and making it expire A. D 55. This is not only contrary to heretofore accepted authorities, but an acknowledged impeachment of Josephus, and the main, if not sole, support of this change of dates is the doubtful Annals of pseudo Tacitus. It is hardly possible that Josephus would go to Rome to intercede for friends who were sent there eight years before by Felix; therefore we incline even to the year 62 as the end of Felix's term, which would bring Paul and Josephus to Rome in the year 63. But even accepting the earliest date, 56, the silence of Josephus in regard to Paul and the Acts of the Apostles is no less unaccountable.

But so far as church chronology is concerned, there is no historical truth either in the Acts or Gospels. The evangelists wrote their drama from prior materials, of which our "Sepher Toldoth Jeschu" was probably a part. Jesus, Simon Kepha, and Paul lived and died before the reign of Tiberius. The Christ of Paul was not crucified under Pontius Pilate, but probably stoned and hanged, according to the inveterate practice of the Jews. The Romans omitted the stoning and impaled or tied their culprits on a stake. This stake was called in Greek stauros, and crucifixion *stauros*is. The earliest cross was a stake or tree. And it is remarkable that Peter twice charges the Jews with slaying Jesus and hanging him on a tree—xulon (Acts v, 30; x, 39)—elsewhere translated "wood," "staff." Here seems to be a footprint of the story of Jeschu, who was stoned and hanged on a xulon a century before.

In Josephus we read of the stoning of "James the brother of Jesus, who was called Christ" (Ant. xx, 9). Dr. Whiston in a note on this passage, assuming its integrity, disputes the fact of the death of James the Just at this time, about A. D. 62. And Dr. Lardner not only says that this manner of the death of James was unknown to the early Christians, but he and most other scholars reject as spurious the words "who was called Christ." It is plain enough, therefore, that nothing remains of the identity of the James of Josephus with "James, the brother of the Lord," mentioned by Paul in Galatians, much less with any mythical apostle of the Gospels and Acts, or any pretended first bishop of Jerusalem.

Now, therefore, can there be any reasonable doubt that James, Kepha, John, and Paul all lived before the Christian era? And, if so, is not this the most important literary discovery ever made?

The New York State Freethinkers' Association.

A MEETING OF ITS OFFICERS.

As many of the officers of the New York Freethinkers' Association will desire to attend the Liberal Congress, it has been thought best to call a meeting of all of them, to assemble at the parlor of the Syracuse House, in the city of Syracuse, Friday evening, Oct. 25th, for the purpose of devising means to prosecute the objects of the Association during the coming year. The following are the names of the officers and the post-office address of each:

Dr. T. L. Brown, President, Binghamton; E. M. Sellon, Recording Secretary, Buffalo; Amy Post, Treasurer, Rochester; H. L. Green, Corresponding Secretary, Salamanca.

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE.

VICE-PRESIDENTS.

Thomas Dugan, Albany; Samuel Latta, Friendship; T. B. Taylor, M.D., Binghamton; A. L. Barnard, Salamanca; Helen H. Mitchel, Aurora; E. Mitchell, Jamestown; Prof. J. V. Mapes, Elmira; John Shattuck, Norwich; Elder F. W. Evans, Mount Lebanon; William D. Hunt, Scott; E. C. Hotchkiss, Buffalo; Dr. Freeman Lyon, Bloomingdale; J. D. Richards, Alexander; W. J. Lewis, Ilion; William Estus, Cape Vincent; A. McAdams, Brooklyn; Thomas Bacon, Leyden; H. B. McNair, Dansville; Frederick S. Hammond, Bennett's Corners; Moses Hayes, Rochester; Prof. A. L. Rawson, New York; J. M. Harwood, Hess Roads; S. Hoagg, New York Mills; John W. Truesdell, Syracuse; John Peck, Naples; Henry Reynolds, Albion; W. J. Brast, North Hannibal; Isaac Sherwood, Manhasset; Gen. Robert Avery, Nyack; J. P. Armstrong, Ogdensburg; G. C. Hebbard, Watkins; E. W. Mitchell, West Junius; O. H. Kinney, Waverly; D. B. Marton, Groton.

It will be well for each member of the meeting to be prepared to suggest a plan for consideration. At 7:30 o'clock the roll of officers will be called, and it is very desirable that there be few absentees. H. L. GREEN, Cor. Sec.

TO TAKE a needed step in the spelling reform, we have acted upon the advice of the American Philological Association to the extent of dropping the useless final e in the words have, give, and live, except in such matter as is used in making books and pamphlets. It is hoped other periodicals will see the propriety of this step and act accordingly.

The Repealers and Modifiers.

BY B. F. UNDERWOOD.

MR. EDITOR: It is due to those who favor the modification of what is termed the "Comstock" law, to recognize the fact that they are opposed to the law as it now stands, and desire such a modification of it as will render impossible the conviction and punishment of any persons except those who send through the mails moral filth and nastiness; that they are as much opposed as the advocates of repeal can be to any law under which papers and publications can be excluded from the mails on account of their sentiments on scientific, social, religious, or any other subjects; that they condemn the methods employed by Comstock, and regard his continuance in office a disgrace to the Government.

It is due to those who advocate "repeal" to recognize the fact that they do not ask for repeal in the interest of obscenity; that they are, as a class, opposed to obscenity; that, with few exceptions, they are in favor of laws against obscenity; and they demand the repeal of the Comstock law because they think Congress has no authority to exclude any articles or publications from the mails on account of their moral character.

The advocates of modification think Congress, which alone has authority to regulate the postal system, has authority to exclude such literature as the common sentiment of the civilized world, including those who advocate repeal, condemn as a nuisance and an evil; and they think a law can be framed by which this moral filth can be excluded from our mails without interference with the rights or liberties of those who do not deal in it. Both parties are opposed to obscenity; are in favor of its suppression; are in favor of laws against it; are opposed to the Comstock law as it now stands, and are presumably sincere and conscientious in the position taken. Let these facts be kept in mind, and there may be less misrepresentation and denunciation than hav been indulged in the past few months.

REMARKS.—It must be confessed that Mr. Underwood has stated the matter very fairly. Both the repealers and modifiers of the Comstock law are doubtless honest and sincere; both are nearly equal in morality, and both are opposed to obscenity; both wish to be regarded as in favor of the good among men, and both wish to see the evil lessened. They are probably not agreed as to the amount of obscenity with which the country, and especially the schools, is being flooded; but when it does exist, nearly all are agreed that it should be duly punished. How to do it is the question which divides us. Shall it be done constitutionally or unconstitutionally? Shall it be left with the states, where the punishment of ninetynine-hundredths of the crimes belong, or shall the General Government engage in it and convert the postal department into a spying, detective-police organization for the purpose of bringing offenders to punishment? Shall the General Government discriminate as to the moral character of mail matter, and decide that some may pass freely, while others may not, and that the sender of the latter shall be sent to prison? These are the questions which divide us.

To some of us it seems no more the duty of the General Government to spy out, hunt up, and punish obscenity because it can be sent through the mails than it is to prosecute and punish libel, adultery, swindling, forgery, perjury, burglary, arson, and murder because letters and other written and printed matter aiding and abetting these crimes are daily sent through the mails.

Many a libelous letter, and many a libelous pamphlet and paper hav been sent through the mails; but for that reason shall the General Government hunt up the sender, prosecute him, and send him to prison? By no means.

Many letters and many printed papers and pamphlets are constantly being sent through the mails with a view to swindle the unsuspecting public—to obtain money without giving a fair equivalent. Shall the General Government, for this reason, busy itself at hunting swindlers and sending them to prison? Not at all; it is no part of its business.

Thousands of letters are sent through the mails with the view of both legitimate and illicit love making, and to bring about, possibly, illegal sexual intercourse or adultery. For this reason shall the General Government take it upon itself to ferret out such offenders and keep its courts employed at trying them and sending them to prison? No; the General Government has nothing to do with such cases.

Any quantity of letters are sent through the mails having more or less to do with the crimes of conspiracy, forgery, burglary, arson, and even murder. Shall the United States Government turn the postal system into a detective, police organization to search out all these cases and spend its time and resources in bringing such offenders to punishment? Certainly not. The province of the General Government is not in that direction.

The Constitution confers on Congress the right to establish post-routes and facilities for carrying the people's mail, but not the power to look into the moral character to see whether it is religious, orthodox, moral, decent, indecent, libelous, adulterous, dishonest, burglarious, incendiary, or criminal in any other respect. All the people of the country hav an equal right to use the mails when the requisite amount of stamps are attached, and the articles sent are mailable. The postal department has to convey all such matter to the place of destination, and it has no business to look into or pass upon its moral quality. The crime of obscenity consists in publisLing and selling it; not in sending it through the mails.

Thus, while Liberals generally agree that obscenity is a crime that ought to be duly punished, they differ widely as to the means by which punishment shall be inflicted. A certain portion who are so fearful lest Liberals may be deemed more or less favorable to obscenity are in favor of punishing it by any means, whether constitutional or unconstitutional. They would not only hav the municipal and state governments prosecute persons for sending questionable pictures and books by mail and otherwise, but they would hav the Government of the United States, in many respects the greatest government in the world, to not only employ itself in punishing offenses of this kind, but to engage salaried spies to hunt up such cases, and, by subterfuge, decoy letters, and espionage, to induce such crimes to be committed that the offenders may brought to punishment. A larger class are in favor of adhering to the Constitution and of leaving to the states the punishment of obscenity, the same as the other crimes mentioned. They do not think it is any part of the business of the General Government to resolve itself into an obscenity-hunting institution. They conceive it to be a species of mistaken zeal that advocates such a course, and are in favor of leaving that kind of business to the intolerant devotees of orthodoxy. They cannot see why Liberals should be in haste to join our bigoted opponents in this demand and advocate the surrender of our constitutional rights lest somebody judge us as being too lenient towards obscenity. This larger class of Liberals deem our personal liberties of too great a value to be relinquished or bartered away on any such pitiable pretext.

It is difficult to understand by what process an unconstitutional law can be made constitutional, but it is very easy to see how it can be repealed; and, believing that unconstitutional laws should not remain on our statute books, and seeing the great evil which has grown out of the same, they demand the repeal of the Comstock laws, and more especially when they find that the states are fully able to punish obscenity, and that by state laws the great bulk of obscene literature was suppressed and the offenders punished before these unconstitutional laws were enacted. The Comstock laws hav done little else than to be employed to harrass, annoy, persecute, impoverish, and imprison persons for opinion's sake who had no intention to be guilty of obscenity; hence the demand for repeal.

All laws authorizing the examination of mail matter to see whether it is moral or decent are clearly unconstitutional; and this opinion has been expressed by the ablest statesmen of which the country can boast. Webster, Clay, Cass, Wright, and others of their compeers placed themselves upon the record in this regard. Daniel Webster said, in the Senate of the United States, in 1834, that the prohibition of the mailing of anything on account of its meaning was "expressly unconstitutional," and he was shocked at the claim to the contrary. In this opinion the Senate fully concurred. It has only been since Comstock's time, and by his procuring, that laws empowering the examination as to the moral quality of mail matter hav been placed upon the statute books of the country.

It must be apparent to most minds that if the unconstitutionality of the Comstock laws is waived and obscenity is to be searched for in the mails and punished, how easy it always must be for the lines to be stretched, and rule that to be obscene which is not obscene at all, and to punish the innocent as well as the guilty. This tendency has been painfully apparent under the operation of the laws complained of, and it must inevitably be so. If the safeguards of the Constitution are removed, no bounds can be set, no limits can be secured. If detectives, prosecutors, courts, and juries are allowed to decide what is obscene, they hav only to take another logical step and decide what is indecent, what is improper, and what is immoral, whereby the liberty of opinion must be violated and destroyed. The composition of juries is from the majority—the advocates of sectarianism and creeds—and it is almost inevitable that they should decide according to prejudices and preconceived opinions. If the rule is granted that any class may decide what may be sent through the mails and what may not be sent, what is moral and decent and what is not, the postal liberties of the country must ever be at the mercy of the party in power. As the Christians are our law-makers and interpreters it would be but natural that they should decide that everything opposed to the system of Christianity should be condemned as immoral and not be allowed to pass through the mails. Should the Catholics obtain the power, it would be very easy for them to decide that whatever is opposed to the dogmas of the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary and the infallibility of the pope was immoral and unsound and must be suppressed. Should Atheists become numerous enough to be the administrators of the laws of the land, and decide what is proper to pass through the mails, it would be very easy for them to say that whatever taught the existence of a God is a species of superstition, that superstition is immoral, and hence must not pass through the mails. By the same rule Democrats, when in power, may decide that Republican documents are wrong, and should not pass through the mails; and vice versa when the Republicans are in power. If one set of men are allowed to decide what is admissible to be sent by mail by another set of men and what is not, there is no telling where the thing will end. To illustrate this evil tendency it may be mentioned that recent Canada papers bring us the intelligence that the authorities in the Dominion hav seized and confiscated some hundreds of volumes of Col. Ingersoll's lectures, on the ground that they are opposed to Christianity and hence immoral, and must not be allowed to pass. This is but the logical result of laws allowing one set of men to decide what another set of men may send by mail or otherwise. We know the sale of Paine's works has been forbidden and punished by imprisonment. It is no less true that Anthony Comstock has forbidden in this city the sale of the works of Paine and the lectures of Ingersoll, threatening dealers with arrest and imprisonment if they persisted in selling them. He doubtless would wholly suppress this kind of traffic had he the power, and this disposition was clearly shown by himself and the President of his Society for the Suppression of Vice in its last yearly meeting, when they gave the intelligence that Freethought and Freelove publications were in a fair way of soon being stamped out. This, we repeat, is but the logical result of the Comstock laws, and this was one of the objects to be secured by their passage. These facts ought to admonish us that there is no safety in tearing away the safeguards of the Constitution, and Liberals and unbelievers ought, of all others, to be the last to advocate it.

Allowing that obscenity is an evil that injures and contaminates the young and ought to be suppressed, does that argue that it demands the attention of good people, and especially of Liberals, more than other evils far more prevalent and far more destructive of public virtue? Let us take this city for instance. Scarcely a copy of an obscene book can be found from High Bridge to the Battery, except the stock that Anthony Comstock has on hand, while there are at least a thousand houses of prostitution and assignation in this city, ten thousand places where intoxicating liquors are sold, gambling hells, lottery offices, concert saloons, dance houses, and low places of amusement almost without number are known to flourish; extensive publishing houses where thousands upon thousands of vile, corrupting stories, under the name of "dime novels," and "Boys' and Girls' Own Papers and Magazines," Police Gazettes, etc., etc., are every week sent over the land. This state of things exists in a corresponding degree in the cities and villages all over the country, all of which does tens of thousands of times more harm to the morals of adults and of youths than is done by obscene publications; and yet Liberals do not seem to be especially disturbed at the alarming facts. Even the editor of The Index scarcely raises his voice against these gigantic evils which are doing so much towards contaminating the morals of the people. Why is it that such a special hue and cry should be raised against obscenity, which hardly has an existences, and he be not disturbed by these mammoth evils that are everywhere and on every side? Is there any consistency in this? Would it not be far more reasonable to direct our attention to the evils which hav an absolute existence and are flourishing in the face of everybody instead of working ourselves into a panic over almost imaginary evils; that we should advocate the surrender of our most valuable constitutional rights to accelerate the hunt after that which scarcely exists?

If it is necessary for Liberals, in order to be considered moral and decent, to hav it specially understood by our opponents that we are not in favor of obscenity, would it not be better for us to pass the strongest resolutions possible that we are not in favor of obscenity, and hav the same published in every paper in the country? and for each individual Liberal to wear a badge on which is printed in bold, conspicuous letters, I AM NOT IN FAVOR OF OBSCENITY, rather than to advise the violation of the Constitution? If it is a fact that our reputation in comparison with church-members is damaged in this respect, it would seem far more sensible to place ourselves right in some such way than to advocate the surrender and tearing away of the very bulwarks of American liberty, free speech, free press, and free mails.

The main trouble is that a portion of the timid and oversensitive Liberals of the country hav allowed themselves to be worked into a panic upon the obscenity question and hav suffered far more from fear and apprehension upon the subject than was at all necessary. When seventy thousand freemen of the country signed a petition, some ten months ago, asking Congress for a repeal or modification of the unconstitutional Comstock laws, an extra zealous stickler for cultured respectability raised his voice against the signing of the petition, giving all the aid and comfort in his power to the legions of intolerant enemies who opposed the Liberal forces, and in this way contributed not a little in defeating the prayer of the petitioners. This may hav done much towards defeating obscenity, which has mostly an ideal existence, but did far more towards crushing out the very principles of liberty. The best thing Liberals can do is to unitedly defend the rights which the Constitution guarantees to us and to demand the repeal of all unconstitutional laws, whose aim it is to break them down and to aid the vile powers of bigotry and intolerance.

The Heywood Petition.

Those who hav been getting signatures to the petition for the pardon of Mr. Heywood and hav not sent them in are requested to do so at once, as it is wished that a committee visit Washington and lay them before the President. They may be addressed to A. L. Rawson, President of the Defense Association, or to the editor of this paper.

Contempt of Court.

We hav received a private letter from Watkins which conveyed the announcement that Judge Hurd had said that, in view of the language we had used in reference to him, he would arraign us for contempt of court. We can hardly believe that he has made such a threat, though he may hav reason to think that our contempt of his rulings and prejudices is sufficient to justify the arraignment. We deem him a gentleman of too much intellect to think of sending a writ of posse comitatus, or anything of that kind, and summoning us to his court to answer for articles that appear in our columns. We are rather beyond his jurisdiction, and though he might hav the desire to punish us, he has hardly the power at present.

We hav no ill-will towards Judge Hurd. We are only sorry to hav occasion to believe that he is biased and prejudiced against Freethinkers and Freelovers. They are human beings, and hav the same rights in this country as those who ally themselves to orthodox creeds and sing the song of Moses and the Lamb. We could wish that he might be noble and grand enough to feel that unbelievers hav rights equal to those who hav unbounded faith; that no man should be sent to prison or be subjected to fine for not believing what he can not believe; and also, that it is wrong to punish in an unbeliever what would not be noticed in a believer. Who imagines that if half a dozen Christians had sold "Cupid's Yokes" at Watkins, in August last, they would hav been arrested and imprisoned? Who can doubt that it is because we are known to be an outspoken Freethinker and publisher of Radical literature that we were arrested, far more than because we had sold anything obscene?

We truly wish Judge Hurd was able to rise above the prejudices of sectarianism and to recognize the fact that professing faith in this or that creed really mal es a man neither better nor worse. The non-professor will in nearly all cases compare very favorably in point of intelligence and morality with those who make the loudest professions.

Judges, of all men, should be governed by fair and upright principles, and should be the last to show prejudice, bigotry, and intolerance when a man is brought before him who does not see things just as he does. The Sun, at the close of a very sensible article on the imperfections of judges, makes use of this sensible remark: "A swift witness is bad enough. A swift judge is to be abhorred."

John Morley's Challenge.

John Morley whose pen is one of the busiest in all England, has thrown down the gauntlet to the gentlemen of the clergy in the last number of The Contemporary. He fearlessly and truthfully charges the priesthood with so debilitating and dwarfing the minds of men and women by promises and dreams that many generations must pass before Christendom can throw off the yoke of superstition under which for centuries it has been groaning. But he promises that these shall be generations of struggle and active warfare. All honor to the man who has the perception to see the deformities that exist under the mask of religion, and has the courage to avow the truth. He talks thus to the priesthood:

"The growth of bright ideals and a nobler purpose will go on, leaving ever and ever further behind them your dwarfed finality and leaden, moveless stereotype. We shall pass you on your flank; your fiercest darts will only spend themselves upon air. We will not attack you as Voltaire did; we will not exterminate you; we shall explain you. History will place each dogma in its class, above or below a hundred competing dogmas, exactly as the naturalist classifies his species. From being a conviction, it will sink to a curiosity; from being the guide to millions of human lives, it will dwindle down to a chapter in a book. As history explains your dogma, so science will dry it up; the conception of law will silently make the conception of the daily miracle of your altars seem impossible; the mental climate will gradually deprive your symbols of their nourishment, and men will leave your system, not because they hav confuted it, but because, like witchcraft or astrology, it has ceased to interest them."

These are indeed strong and cutting words for the black-coated gentry to swallow, but they are none the less truthful. The pall of dark superstition has for many centuries been thrown over the intellect of the world, and the priests have ruled mankind with a tyranny the most onerous and oppressive the world has known. But a brighter day is dawning. The sun of science and truth is rising and is shedding its enlivening and happifying rays over the world and driving back the dark mists and fogs of error to ultimately be lost in oblivion. We hav much to encourage us.

To Those who hav Pledged.

The Executive Committee of the National Defense Association request that those who hav pledged various sums for the Defense Fund will be kind enough to remit the same to G. L. Henderson, the Treasurer of the Committee. Two able lawyers are engaged to defend the four of us who were arrested at Watkins, and other necessary expenses hav been incurred which it is desirable to liquidate. Besides, the Association wishes to send a committee to Washington to wait on President Hayes, and bear to him the petition of the thousands who hav asked for Mr. Heywood's pardon. All this requires money, and the generous-hearted are asked to remit at an early day.

Proceedings and Addresses at the Watkins Convention.

This fine volume of four hundred pages is now printed and ready to send to subscribers. It is really a valuable work, and is cheap at the price we ask for it. Many of the speeches it contains possess extra value. Let those who hav not already ordered a copy do so at once. It has cost a good deal of money to get up the work, and now we are anxious to sell all we can of them. It seems to us every Liberal in the country ought to hav a copy. Price, $1.25.

THE Rev. Mr. H. H. Hayden is again arraigned for the murder of Mary Stannard, the confiding girl whom he seduced. At the first examination, under the auspices of his ardent church friends, he was acquitted and pronounced innocent; but Judge Harrison, who assisted in the prosecution, was so well assured of the clergyman's guilt that he was instrumental in having him re-arrested. Mr. Hayden's case has this week been before the Grand Jury of New Haven county, where the evidence against him was of the strongest character. They undoubtedly easily found a bill against him, but as we are preparing for the press the intelligence is not received.

One thing is noticeable in this case of the Rev. Hayden. He assumes the utmost indifference as to the situation in which he is placed. He shows no more concern than as though he were attending a tea-party with the ladies of his church, and he chats and smiles with as much self-complaisance as though presiding at a church festival. This may be an indication of innocence, but to our view it is not so. A man capable of such stolid self-control and nonchalance under such an overwhelming charge is capable of planning the crime and of covering it afterwards. Innocence does not simulate indifference.

WE might as well tell our readers a little unpleasant fact which we are sorry to hav to mention, but we will not be timid about it. We are very short of money. We hav several debts to pay, and we hav not the funds to do it with. A pretty large number of our readers are in arrears, and we very much wish they would be kind enough to send it to us. If our friends will pay us what they owe us, we can pay what we owe and perhaps hav a little to meet our daily expenses, which are necessarily very heavy. Will not every one who knows himself to be indebted to us remit the amount, and if possible renew for another year? Volume V. is drawing to a close. To those who between now and the last of November will renew for 1879, we will send fifty cents' worth of tracks, pamphlets, or books of our publishing as they may designate. But let those who know themselves to be indebted to us remit at once. The tab on the paper tells how long it is paid to, so no one needs be at a loss to know when their time is out.

THE trial subscribers whose names hav recently been added to our list hav used up the late spare numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. We are compelled to substitute older numbers, or to let the term run into the year 1879. We hope hundreds of trial subscribers will still be added to our list. Every one shall receive the full time for which he subscribes. We hav added another book as premium. We will send THE TRUTH SEEKER to trial subscribers for three months for sixty cents, and send also a copy of the new "American Illustrated Pronouncing Pocket Dictionary," or Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason," or the "Holy Bible Abridged." Here is a fine chance to make choice in premiums. Let the names flow in.

THE attention of our readers is particularly called to the reply of T. B. Wakeman, on pages 660 and 661, to the criticisms of The Index, upon his Faneuil Hall speech on the Comstock laws. It is a little lengthy, but will well repay a careful perusal. We think our readers will agree with us that it completely answers the cultured editor's sophistry and special pleading, clearly showing the falsity of his position, and leaving him absolutely nothing to stand upon. The difference between false reasoning and true is made most apparent.

WE beg Deacon Skidmore's pardon for crowding out for the second time the remainder of the account of his church trial for heresy. The pressure upon our columns has been so great that his letter and many others had to be omitted. Let those who are anxious to read the continuation of his troubles possess their souls in patience till another week, when we hope to be able to continue his recital.

Will Public Opinion Protect Public Morals?

The following letter from a distinguished Liberal introducing an extract from one of the greatest jurists this country has produced, appeared in course of the past summer in The Boston Traveller, and as it bears directly upon the subject which is now engaging the attention of the Liberal public, we cheerfully lay it before our readers. It will be seen that the Hon. Mr. Livingston entertained views as to the proper way to deal with obscenity quite different from some of our Liberal purists, and it would be well could they occupy the truly Liberal position of that distinguished gentleman. We quote:

CONCORD, NEW HAMPSHIRE, July, 1878.

Editor of The Traveller, Sir: Inclosed is an extract of a letter from Hon. Edward Livingstone to M. Duponceau, on the question of penal enactments for what are termed offenses against public morals. It is found in Charles Haven Hunt's Life of Edward Livingston, Appleton edition, page 289, and will be read with interest at present, when so many citizens, women as well as well as men, are, or lately hav been, suffering severe penalties for what hav been construed as offenses against public decency and morality. Probably the name of Edward Livingston, as author of a "Code of Criminal Law and Procedure," is second to no Americam name.

Hoping you will be able to make room for the extract, I am truly yours, PARKER PILLSBURY.

. . . "I am in a difficulty, and as it is one arising out of a question of jurisprudence, I know no one to whom I can apply for assistance with so sure a hope of relief as from you.

In the revision of my criminal code, I hav now under consideration the chapter of offenses against public morals. This is intended to comprehend all that class which the English jurists hav vaguely designated as offenses contra bonos mores, finding it much easier in this, as they do in many other cases, to giv a Latin phrase, which may mean anything, rather than a definition.

I hav serious thoughts of omitting it altogether, and leaving the whole class of indecencies to the correction of public opinion. I hav been led to this inclination of mind (for as yet I hav formed no decision) from an examination of the particular acts which in practice hav been brought under the purview of this branch of criminal jurisprudence.

In the absence of anything like principle or definition, I was obliged to hav recourse to not only precedent, but to the books of precedents; and they strongly reminded me of some forms which I hav seen in Catholic church books, of questions which are to be put to the penitent by the professor, in which every abomination that could enter into the imagination of a monk is detailed, in order to keep the mind of a girl of fifteen free from pollution.

Turn to any indictment of this kind in the books, for the publication of obscene books or prints, or for indecency of behavior, and you will find the innuendoes and exposition of the offense infinitely more indecorous, more open violation of decency, than any of the works they are intended to punish and repress.

The evidence must be of the same nature, and hundreds will hear the trial who never would hav seen the book or print. This evil is inevitable, if such acts are punished by law.

There is another evil of no less magnitude arising from the difficulty of defining the offense.

Use the general expression of the English law, and a fanatic judge, with a like-minded jury, will bring every harmless levity under the lash of the law.

Sculpture and painting will be banished for their nudities; poetry for the warmth of its descriptions; and music, if it excite any forbidden passion, will scarcely escape.

On the whole, I am surrounded by difficulties. Help me to a definition that shall include what ought to be punished, and not giv room for the abuse I have pointed out.

Let me know how I shall decently accuse and try a man for indecency; or else fortify me in my opinion of letting public opinion protect public morals.

The Criminality of Belief.

The following article from the pen of Mr. J. A. J. Wilcox which appeared not long since in The Index hits the matter of Mr. Heywood's imprisonment, and the criminality of expressing one's honest opinion. We cannot do better than giv our readers the benefit of it. It is seldom we get more good sound sense in the same number of words:

MR. EDITOR: Filled with an indignation which forbids coherence of expression, I will yet endeavor to preserve a method in my madness, and be as mildly reasonable as if the outrage upon equal rights was not so flagrant as to provoke and justify the most vigorous invective.

A man sent to prison for two years as a common felon for saying "I believe!"

Nothing has occurred demanding so mighty a protest since Burns was remanded to slavery by the maladministration of an iniquitous law. Charles Torrey in Baltimore jail was nothing to it. I am not a little surprised, in conversation with several radical friends—men for whom I hav an unbounded respect and admiration—to find in minds exceptionally clear on most subjects such confusion on this.

The feeling which I manifest elicits little sympathetic response, and they say to me, in substance, "It is true, as you observe, that a man is condemned and punished for an expression of opinion; but you must remember that it is not purely speculative opinion, but opinion which has a vital, practical bearing upon the morals of the people; and society is justified in thus defending itself, and the individuals of which it is composed, against such assaults upon its well-being."

That is exactly what I do not forget, and upon which I lay the greatest stress—that the opinions so freely and boldly uttered are of a practical character, and more or less intimately connected with the moral welfare of society. Who cares much for purely speculative opinions? To defend the freedom of practical opinions is worthy of us—opinions which help to form character and regulate conduct.

Mr. Heywood himself would claim the practical nature of the opinions for which he suffers as his justification in persisting in giving them publicity. It is only because he believes, with an all-absorbing conviction, that the tendency of his opinions is towards a freer, truer, more perfect social life that he is willing to sacrifice so much for their dissemination. He is not alone in this conviction. It is shared by many, equally earnest and equally ready to suffer the odium which always falls upon the innovator.

Directly opposed in belief is another party, much the larger and older, to be sure, and possibly more sound in doctrine; but that is the question at issue, to be settled by free discussion or left unsettled. In either party, of course, is a moiety of insincerity, and some slight admixture of personal and selfish motive; but, for the most part, each is actuated by an honest desire to promote the best interests and welfare of the whole. One party, taking advantage of its power of numbers, has no right to proscribe and imprison the other, and in so doing makes confession of its want of faith in the power of truth itself.

"You shall not teach that which I do not believe" is a strange position for Radicals to take. What enormity of injustice may not be accomplished, if Radicals themselves so easily forget their obligation to the sacred principle of equal rights! That the doctrines set forth are false—if so be they are—is surely no reason for the incarceration of the one who utters them; that there is now and then, or still oftener, an expression which would not be sanctioned by the commonly accepted rules of good taste is no better reason; and that is the full head and front of his offending.

Zealots who would subdue error by main strength, strangely blind to the nature of the weapons which they use, are ever hurling boomerangs to their own destruction. The pamphlet which was made the excuse for this prosecution will now be read by ten where it was read by one before.

Although such attempts to muzzle the brain by abusing the body—the common practice of the dominant faction from time immemorial—hav always failed, and ever will, yet our sympathy and assistance are due to the one who is sacrificed in the maintenance of our right. I am not in full accord with Mr. Heywood in the matter of his special reform; but his right to advocate that reform is sacred, and should be defended by every emancipated tongue and pen.

A Fable.

[From Dr. Foote's Health Monthly.]

A Fable of the Bees and the Insects.

In a delightful garden, surrounded with fruit-bearing trees and filled with gorgeous and fragrant flowers of endless variety, was a large apiary inhabited by fat, sleek, busy bees, bent upon filling their hives with the richest of honey that could be gathered from the sweet flowers growing in the garden. These bees, it should be understood, were quite in the majority as compared with the other insects, and were consequently the law-givers of the insect community which inhabited the beautiful place. One dark night, when all the other insects were stowed away in the leaves of the bushes and trees taking their noctural naps, a venomous spider bearing on his broad, dark back a growth of dirty-white down, forming for all the world hieroglyphics which could be clearly interpreted as the letters A and C, crept stealthily up to the great central hive, and sought to form an alliance with these great and powerful insects. He begged their permission to spread a large web across the garden, saying that the moth that entered their hives and devoured their honey came from a species of moths that had wings, and if he were permitted to weave his web he would catch all these moth-millers, and the Hessian-flies that destroyed the wheat, and all other predatory winged insects. Notwithstanding the lateness of the hour the bees in the great central hive were as lively as at noonday, having under consideration some two or three hundred important measures for the pretended protection and welfare of the denizens of the garden. With a moment's pause, however, they were captured by the strategem of the spider, and gave their high official assent to his mercenary application. When daylight came an expansive web, fastened to a tree on one side of the garden and attached to a shed on the other, and extending from the very tops of the trees away down to the ground itself, was found to have been ingeniously spun. It looked as if even the bees could not fly through the air without becoming entangled in its meshes, and some of the influential bees and other well-fed insects who were popular with the insect tribes sought the spider and expostulated with him for making his web so large and its meshes so fine. But the spider, lifting his head from a struggling butterfly that was writhing in his grasp, assured them that the large and popular insects which should become entangled would be liberated, and that no harm would occur to them, a pledge which shortly after was shown to be faithfully kept, when an opulent insect which had presided with interest over the entire work of the spider, and which through alleged ignorance became entangled therein, was speedily relieved. The spider meanwhile was catching and sucking the blood of some of the most valuable insects of the garden—those which Prof. Gray in his botanical essays informs us are useful in fertilizing the blossoms and in making the trees and flowers fruitful. Finally the indignant insects of the garden gathered together at the great central hive in the apiary—assembled 70,000 strong—all hard-working and intelligent insects—to ask that the web be broken down and that the garden be enjoyed by all of them. But the wary spider, with outspread legs and gleaming eyes in the center of his great transparent web, beheld the movements of the insects and quickly followed them. He showed to the wise bees of the central hive how many of the bee-moths, the Hessian-flies, and other troublesome insects he had caught in his web, and how much he had done to rid the garden of these mischievous creatures. Hearing this, and ignoring the valuable work of his innocent victims, the bees concluded not to disturb the spider and his web. At last a hive of humble-bees who were supposed to have the wisdom and justice of an impartial tribunal were supplicated, and after the bumble-bees, before whom all complicated grievances were brought, examined the whole question they said that a web could not be justly spun across the great air if it prevented the freedom of circulation of the insects through the garden. But after examining the matter in all its bearing with their big, eyes and still bigger heads, they

THE PETITIONS TO THE CENTRAL HIVE.

In the winter of 1877-78 a monster petition, containing nearly or quite 70,000 signatures, was presented to Congress by Gen. Benjamin F. Butler and Senator Teller for the repeal or modification of the Comstock laws, but the "Agent" visited the Congressional Committee, accompanied by the President of the Society for the Supression of Vice, and the Committee reported adversely.

THE QUESTION REFERRED TO THE SUPREME COURT.

A test case having been carried to the Supreme Court of the United States in the spring of 1878, it was decided that regulations against the transportation through the United States mails could not be so enforced as to "interfere in any manner" with the freedom of the press, because "liberty of circulating is essential to that freedom;" therefore, when such matter is excluded from the mails, "this high court says its transmission in any other way cannot be forbidden by Congress!" That the mail laws can be made to exclude printed matter the circulation of which cannot be "interfered with in 'any manner'" sounds like supreme nonsense from the Supreme Court. But so it decides.

found that the web did not do this, for, said they, the insects who feel aggrieved can creep along the fences or on the grounds of the garden, or they can go outside of it, and that consequently the freedom of the garden was not in the least degree restrained, entirely blind to the further fact that stately webs had also been strung along the fences and grounds. The spider therefore continued to catch all the butterflies with beautiful wings, harmless white-souled millers, and hard-working insects which had heretofore been flying from flower to flower and fulfilling their mission, while the large and powerful bees flew through and through the web with impunity in collecting the honey with which to fill their hives from the fragrant and many-colored flowers of the garden.

The Liberal League Movement.

AN ADDRESS BY H. L. GREEN, CHAIRMAN OF THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE OF THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE, TO THE LIBERALS OF THE UNITED STATES.

LIBERALS OF THE UNITED STATES: We need for our protection, and for the advancement of the principles we profess, a great and powerful organization, in which shall be united every friend of secularism, or, in other words, all who believe in the entire separation of Church and State. There are few Liberals of any intelligence who are not convinced that the most important political question of the hour is the issue being more and more pressed upon us by the Christian Church, whether or not this is a Christian government or a secular government; and however much we may try to shirk the question, be assured that in a few years we shall be compelled to meet it, either at the ballot-box or on the battle-field. As the prophetic leaders of the Antislavery party declared, long before the late war, "there exists an irrepressible conflict between slavery and freedom that will sooner or later terminate in blood if not amicably settled," so far-seeing Liberals now declare that "there is existing an irrepressible conflict between the ecclesiastical power in this country and the principle of secularism that the founders of the government incorporated into the national Constitution that is sure to lead to the most disastrous results unless the conflict is soon adjusted in favor of liberty."

AND THE CRISIS IS UPON US.

Already we are compelled to pay enormous taxes to maintain this ecclesiastical power and the sixty thousand of its agents who are quartered upon the people. We are compelled to support public institutions of learning where superstition, known as religion, is taught in place of science to our children. Thousands of Christian ministers who never by honest labor produced a dollar for the general good hold stations of honor and emolument, at our expense, in the Army and Navy, in our prisons and legislative bodies; and this power has appropriated one-seventh of the time to its own use and benefit, and, wherever possible, compels us either to conform to its superstitious notions while out of doors or remain in doors on their "Lord's day."

And this is not all. This ecclesiastical power is making a bold and desperate attempt to put its religious creed into the United States Constitution, and thus to ostracize all who do not bow to its mandates. This power has already succeeded in ingrafting into our statute books laws that permit its adherents to fine and imprison good citizens for an honest expression of opinion.

Friends of Freethought, we are already slaves in a government founded by such apostles of mental freedom as Washington, Paine, Jefferson, and Franklin, and redeemed by those later "Infidels," Garrison, Lucretia Mott, and Abraham Lincoln. And in all sincerity I submit to you the question, Do we not need an organization for mutual protection and to rid this country of these despotic and unjust ecclesiastical encroachments upon our rights? Will we longer stand unmoved and be bound hand and foot? Some of our noblest brothers and sisters are already in the clutches of this Christian power, and its minions are at our very doors watching us as the tiger does its prey. We are liable at any hour to be cast into prison, have our property confiscated, and every right as an American citizen taken from us for the Christian crime of being faithful to our most sacred convictions. In view of all this, do we not need a NATIONAL LIBERAL PARTY?

Have we independence, manhood, and womanhood enough to unite and maintain such a party?

Two years ago, at Philadelphia, near the old Temple of Liberty where the Declaration of Independence was first proclaimed, on the first centennial anniversary of that declaration, such a party was instituted by a few brave Liberals. It was christened

THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

That organization is not as yet what it should be, and has not achieved many great victories. But it is young and has a future before it. It was formed for a noble purpose, and has at least inaugurated a political reform movement which, if successful, will make this country the freest and best-governed the sun ever shone upon. And what is necessary to make this new political and moral reform party a success? Only this, that the Liberal people of the United States make this Association their own, keep it in their own hands, and prevent its being loaded down with issues that are not germane to it and that have no connection with it.

The founders of the party should be honored and respected for their noble work, but the new party should belong entirely to the Liberal public without qualification or reservation.

LEADERS.

The National Liberal League requires good counselors and sterling workers, but no special leaders or dictators. The first thing that needs to be done is to deliver it into the hands of its rightful owners, the Liberal public, who should hereafter hav the entire charge of it. And I mean by the Liberal public the citizens of the United States who believe in the principles of the League and are willing to connect themselves with it and work for its advancement. And the next work to be done should be to educate the people generally up to the sublime height of our truly American platform, "The entire separation of Church and State."

ALL OTHER QUESTIONS MUST BE IGNORED

Until this one is settled. Our new party must not be loaded down with other issues. On every other subject each member should enjoy perfect liberty to believe and think as he or she pleases. We must be allowed to differ on financial questions, the question of capital and labor, the social question, temperance, and how to rid ourselves of the Comstock laws. To introduce any such question into our Conventions as tests of membership, or for the purpose of incorporating them into our Liberal League platform, is treason to our cause, and deserves the most severe condemnation. I care not what opinions persons may hold religiously, politically, or socially, if they are earnest friends of our special principles, I will extend to them the right hand of fellowship. As our Christian opponents say, "We know nothing but Christ; and him crucified" (which is too often literally true with them), we should say, "We will know nothing as Liberal Leaguers politically but State secularization" until our rights are regained and established.

WHAT WE HAVE HERETOFORE FAILED TO DO

Has been to interest the members of all the various branches of the Liberal people in the Liberal League movement. That must be done if we would succeed. And to do that we must convince them that it is no individual institution run for the special benefit of any party or class. The Christian and antichristian, the Materialist and Spiritualist, the Free Religionist and the no religionist, all of them who believe in our fundamental idea of the entire separation of Church and State should be made to feel perfectly at home in this party, and the same with all editors who advocate through their journals our cause. No distinction thould be made.

It will take time to disabuse the minds of a large number of Liberals of the opinion, for some reason many now entertain, that the National Liberal League is the property of a certain division of the Liberal public, but I am confident, from what I learn from various quarters, that this important work is to be energetically undertaken.

THE SYRACUSE LIBERAL LEAGUE CONGRESS.

As our Spiritualist friends often say, "I am impressed with the idea" that the National Liberal League at Syracuse is to take a new departure, and I urge it upon every friend of the cause who is not already an active member, and who can possibly do so, to be present at Syracuse and take part in the forward movement there to be made, and gain an inspiration that shall stimulate to renewed action in this grand warfare for liberty. And at the coming Congress, each Liberal should vie with the other, to see which will do the most to restore reconciliation in our ranks, and establish the reign of peace and good will among all classes of Liberals, for remember, in this conflict with ignorance and superstition, we need the assistance of every lover of freedom. Let our motto be, Union and Victory!

The Thoughts of Twenty Years.

BY B. F. GARRISON.

Thirty-five years of my sands of life have run out, twenty of which have found me a skeptic—like a certain Thomas spoken of by certain historical writers—doubting the correctness of many things that have come within the range of my observation. Confessedly I must say I do not know what my religious belief is. I cannot say that I have any settled or fixed conclusion, and, after twenty years of search and inquiry—vigorous, it may be said without exaggeration, though feeble because of my humble capacity—I am still on the "anxious seat" of inquiry, endeavoring with all the facilities at my command to reach a rational solution of the many vexed questions that have occupied and puzzled the minds of the liberal-thinking people of the country and no small proportion of the orthodox believers. Skepticism is perhaps the predominant element of my character; and being so constituted I thought it not out of place, in a society where all are Liberals, to give them my thoughts, that perhaps many of them would be able to shed some ray of light upon many of the questions that have so long perplexed my mind.

I believe it to be a rule that in order to convince a rational mind it must be addressed with reason, because reason is the guiding star of the human mind; and whatever we hear or read, if not within the range or bounds of reason, we hesitate, discredit, and ultimately disbelieve. There is, however, an exception to this rule, and it counts its hosts by millions, and for euphony they call themselves Christians. The Church does not permit you to reason about or question any of its creeds or any of the monstrous passages in the Bible, but you must believe all or be damned. If I am required to believe all of the Bible or be damned, then I prefer the latter, for the reason that if God created us with reason, put his work into my hands with so many things incredible and unexplained, and left me with the capacity to construe, and knowing that I would construe, and knowing that I could not believe all contained in it, he will damn me anyway, and I know of no way of escaping his vengeance.

But I am not hiding to escape his wrath, because I must first believe there is such a power; and never having been able to reach such a monstrous conclusion, I have no fears of such a supposed fiend.

I have long thought the Bible is not a work of divinity but is of purely human origin, and in this belief I feel content in the support of both science and reason. A work to be of divine inspiration certainly should be perfect, and to say that the Bible is perfect is a gross perversion of the truth, at least I think so.

There are a great many moral lessons to be learned from it, and were it in my power to work its total destruction, it would be the farthest from my thoughts; and I would blot out the mind that thought and palsy the hand that attempted it. It is a history that should be read and discussed the same as any other work, the subject of no more reverence than Plutarch's Lives or Macauley's or Hume's History of England. There is no argument or reason for giving to it any more credence than to the works of Josephus. If the Bible is of divine origin, then its translators were miserably deficient, for I believe the book itself will corroborate me in the assertion that no two of them agree upon any important event about which they claim to write. I believe no two of the apostles agree upon the chronological history of Christ; and Matthew and Luke, in their books, so widely differ in the genealogy of Christ that we are as uncertain as to its correctness when we finish their books as we were before we commenced. And if one or both are false upon that all-important subject, with what degree of consistency can we be asked to believe the remainder of their works? It is an utter impossibility for both of them to be right, but it is a reasonable deduction to conclude that they are both wrong. There are so many passages in the Old Testament that shock our sense of reason and mercy that we naturally become skeptical as to all, and lose entirely our belief in its divine origin. There is not a person within the sound of my voice that can conceive of a fiend so black and lost to all sense of mercy and decency as to have inspired the 109th Psalm. And yet we are told that God inspired it and looked with complacency upon its hellish execution. I am unwilling to believe that such is the fact—that a God possessing all the attributes of "love, mercy, and goodness" could be the author of such a prayer, or that a brute that would discourse of reason would answer it.

Can any sane being believe for a moment some of the laws of war given to his chosen people, as shown by the Old Testament—and that he actually commanded his generals to carry them into execution—are the works of God? No, such direetions could only have been given by an infinite fiend. An absolute edict issuing from a God to "save nothing alive that breatheth" is so horrifying to our sense of right, so infamously unjust, that we scorn to believe it. Yet the Church asks us to worship such a God. We are asked to stifle every sense of mercy, and to trample under foot every feeling of humanity, and fall upon our bended knees and pray with humble reverence to such a God. If such is the Christian God, the God of the churches, I despise and defy him. Such atrocions laws would put to shame the foulest fiend in all the annals of crime. And yet we are asked to justify those frightful passages, those inhumane laws, those atrocious commands and directions, because "the Bible is the word of God."

The Church will tell you all this was deemed necessary by God in order to command obedience to his laws. The plea of justification is nothing new to us, and as a reply it is but necessary to use a short quotation from one of the classics, which runs thus: "In religion, what damned error but some sober brow will bless it and approve it with a text, hiding the grossness with fair arguments."

Another reason for doubting the authenticity of the Bible is the manifest spuriousness of the five books of Moses, to wit: Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy. It is claimed that these books were written by Moses. I cannot believe it, for the reason that the Bible itself discloses the fact that Moses died 1450 years before Christ, and that these books were not written until several hundred years after Moses' death. I believe it is not a habit nowadays that dead men write books, and especially long and extensive histories, and therefore the conclusion must of necessity be reached that Moses was not the author of these books. Then the question arises, Who was the author of these books? You may search the Bible from beginning to end and you cannot find the author, but our orthodox friends say this is one of the strongest reasons why Moses is the author. We reply it is no reason at all, because the Bible sustains us in the assertion that Moses had been dead nearly four hundred years when these books were written, and know it is contrary to all law and reason that he could have written them.

If the Bible is the work of God, then it should have been adopted as he gave it, but we find the manner in which the Bible was adopted as the word of God was by calling a legislature for the purpose of voting as to whether it was so or not. Certainly if he inspired it, it was written according to the style and phraseology in which he directed it; and yet we find that councils met at Nice and Laodicea about 350 years after the time of Christ, and in convention assembled took the yeas and nays upon the books now composing the New Testament, as we now vote in our several legislatures upon the passage of laws; and in said councils, where all were finite beings, and the majority of whom did not claim to be inspired, a large number of books offered as the work of God were voted down. Can any sensible being believe that a Bible adopted by such means is a work of inspiration? If God inspired the translators then none others could have known that they were wrong, but this is the very strongest evidence that the New Testament is of human origin. It is simply a code of laws adopted by the few, and a council called to sanction their work.

According to the Bible the world is now not quite six thousand years old. This we know to be false, because the science of geology has demonstrated to an absolute certainty that the world is millions of years old. The Bible recognizes a beginning and an ending of the world; this we know to be false, because science has demonstrated that the world is composed of matter, and that matter is indestructible, and in order to bring about an ending it is necessary to utterly destroy all matter.

"The laws of God are inflexible, perfect, and unchangeable," and certainly should be consistent with reason, and yet we are told by St. Mark that the people in his day had the cheerful habit of eating deadly poison without manifesting any deleterious effects. The science of medicine has demonstrated that the internal administration of poison will produce death. If that was one of the laws of God, he certainly knew very little about the science of medicine, and for that reason would be an unsafe family physician in this age.

The Church commands the unqualified belief in everything contained in the Bible, and confessing that there are many things incomprehensible contained in it, yet say it is true because it is "the work of God;" that is to say, you must "shut up your reason and open the Bible." You must close the doors to all the avenues of your intelligence, stifle every element of your manhood, enslave your soul, barter away every liberty and right you have, and by "faith read and believe;" and refusing to believe, or asking the reason for this or that, you are shut off from the pale of the Church and numbered among the lost and damned. The Church claims the power of praying you into heaven or into hell just as they may choose, and for obedience to their creeds and an absolute belief in the Bible they will undertake the contract of saving you, but questioning the divinity of the Bible or doubting the salutary effects of some of their creeds, they assume the obligation of committing your soul to eternal perdition.

Thus the tyranny of the Church has enslaved the souls of millions of our fellow-beings, caused the slaughter of millions of men, women, and children, and soothed the bitter anguish of those who were so fortunate as to survive the struggle by the consolation that it was all for "God's sake." John Calvin, whose church prospers to-day and numbers its millions, was the cause of the shedding of more innocent blood than any ten other men since the beginning of time. The Church, as an organization, has been the primary cause of nine-tenths of the wars that have deluged the earth with blood. Intestine wars, fratricidal struggles, and financial ruin as a sequel, find their origin in the Church. The miseries of mankind have ever found an antidote in the shrewdest measures of taking a brother's life. We feel that for all their miseries and woes, for the oceans of blood that have been spilt, the anguish of widows and orphans, the Church must and of right ought to assume the larger share of blame. 'Tis true, I am glad to say, that the Church are growing more moderate, and within its folds there are a good many excellent people, but the Calvinistic arrogance still clings to it as an inbred inheritance. But the Church has lost in power in the past hundred years, and it will continue to do so just in proportion to the strides intelligence makes. The encroachments upon the dogmas of the Church are the cymbals that sound the liberty of mankind, and echoing far into the future, we need not have a very prophetic vision to see the little puny plant set out by Galileo and nurtured by Voltaire and Paine grow into a mighty forest whose branches will shelter the millions of hosts who gather under its banners as Liberals, and laboring as one grand body of patriots and liberty-loving people, extend to the Church, instead of the "flaming sword," the blessing of forgiveness and forgetfulness of their tyranny and wrong.

If you do wrong in this age. that is, question the Bible or Church creeds, you find yourself indicted by the Church, with no responsible tribunal to sit in judgment upon your alleged offense, no jury bound to render an impartial verdict and lean to the side of mercy, no witnesses with whom pity nearly wipes away the stern obligations of an oath, no council whose professional ambition lies in the acquittal of his client, no solemn or formal delivery of the fatal sentence, no prison of preparation and possible pardon, no religious press promulgating previous virtues and deprecating the rigors of inexorable justice, no lingering visits of unmoved friendship and affection, no consolatory assurances of the pitying priest, no gesturing and breathless multitude around the last scene, no reconciling tears of sympathy or half-formed threats of deliverance, none of those preludes and appendages which with us smoothe the way to a death of ignominy and cause the obituary of the hopeless victim to be read and wept over by commiserating millions. Save us from the fangs of the Church when once within its mighty grasp.

I do not write this essay with the vain expectation that it will shed any light essentially new upon the topics on which it touches, for science and learning have already exhausted their store on this theme, as well as pedantry its prattle. Every thing that has left behind the slightest token of its existence, the scientist has traced the lines of its original strength, existence, and beauty. All that I can say has been said a thousand times before, and better than I can say it, but we owe it to the millions of enslaved souls to constantly keep before them the objections of their deceivers and oppressors and the silly fallacies of their doctrinal creeds.

Ignorance is the foundation-stone of the Church, and blind faith its superstructure. Hell is the smarting whip that keeps them within the fold, and the ministry the masters who crack it. Recognizing nothing independent of or superior to nature, I am content to live as I have lived, extending to others the same liberties I claim for myself. I have no regrets for the past and no fears for the future.

LIBERTY to go wrong is a persuasion to the right. Let all the people try it, and the end is a permanent advantage. 'Tis a long way round, but the shortest way home.—Sidney H. Morse.

A Letter from Dr. Monroe.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: My mailing clerks assure me that your copy of Times went in the mail for New York as usual. We mail by a machine or machines that print one name at a time as fast as papers can be handled—print the name on the paper and they cannot miss. So I don't see how this particular number failed to reach you.

As to killing Mr. Bell, I hav no desire to injure him nor anybody. I think as much of Mr. Bell as you do, perhaps. What I object to in Mr. Bell's action is his assault upon me in a paper that reaches very few of my readers. If I had misrepresented him, his remedy was through the Times, to the readers of the misrepresentation. Selecting THE TRUTH SEEKER to make the assault—to charge me with "slander," with "infamous falsehood," with lack of respectability, and to sneer at my paper as a small, insignificant affair, led me to believe that the opportunity was seized to justify the commencement of a warfare against the Seymour Times. Don't you think Mr. Bell ought to have set himself right before my readers? Do you think it just in him to sneer at my paper, and to pronounce me an irresponsible falsifier and vilifier to your readers, who know comparatively nothing of me? Do you think your own personal allusions just or justifiable? You will perceive in answer that, although prostrated, and only able to write while propped up in my bed, and consequently irritable and unamiable, I hav avoided epithet and personality, and that I hav no remark against you personally or your paper. The doctrine of Freelove won't do for Freethinkers. I loathe it. Yet I do not set myself up as better or purer than they who approve and would practice it if they could. I am considering the matter solely with regard to the effect its advocacy would hav upon Liberalism. As to the doctrine itself, I don't want to discuss it nor allude to it farther, nor will I if I can avoid it. I simply say that its advocacy by Liberals who are in a position to speak authoritatively for Liberalism will be fatal to the Liberal cause in America. Individuals must be allowed to hold and to publish what opinions they hav, or think they hav, and I will defend their right to do so; but to set these up as the tenets of Freethinkers is a different thing.

What I object to in Mr. Heywood's pamphlet is its language. I recognize his undisputed right to print and circulate his doctrines. Much of the language he uses could hav been avoided, and its use and circulation ought not to be encouraged. Technically even Mr. Heywood is unjustly and illegally in prison; because I cannot perceive that the law defines any word he uses as obscene. It seems to leave all to the taste of the jury, always composed of Christly church bigots and zealots. I may deem his words obscene, while to you or to Heywood, or to any other equally sincere man, they may not appear obscene. Obscenity is much a matter of education and taste. But no man's liberty should be dependent upon this matter of individual taste and education. There are prints and books which it seems to me the welfare of society renders it competent for some power to suppress by statute. Their circulation among the youths of the country can certainly be productive of nothing but demoralization and the degradation of woman. But the detective system, as conducted by the bloody-minded bigot Comstock—the law that permits a fiend to invade the privacy of the mails and the sanctity of private rooms and papers, the whole law known as the Comstock law—is infamous beyond anything witnessed upon the earth since the downfall of the Inquisition.

As to Mr. Heywood, I sympathize with him. I think the law that imprisons him for what I or others may object to in his pamphlets, a monstrous crime against liberty. At the most, an offense so slight, an offense against what some regard as good taste merely, merits, and should incur, in a free country, no penalty more severe than the condemnation of those who object to it. So, my dear sir, you will perceive that there may not be so much to divide Rationalists on this subject, after all. What I want is to strengthen Infidelity (to Christ) before the moral sense of the world. I am, therefore, opposed to its becoming the advocate and champion of any of the isms of the day. Let us make a clean-cut line of demarcation between the religion of Jesus Christ, between the doctrine of blood atonement, of beliefs and faiths and petitions to and dependence upon the nonentities of the cloud regions, and rational free thought and enlightened morality. Let us fight it out on this line, and we will soon gather to our fold the well-informed, the good, and the great throughout the world.

You can assure Mr. Bell that I hav none but the best of feeling for him. I shall do all I can to secure him a hearing wherever I can. I see, as all must, the great necessity for the suppression of disputes and the ebullitions of temper. I don't think anybody can aggravate me into a quarrel or an angry discussion when I am well in body.

For the cause we hav at heart, I regret the spleen that bodily ailment betrayed me into in the issue I send you today, and also the remarks (originating in the same infirmity) that served as a pretext for Mr. Bell's personal abuse and for your editorial. No man more admires your writings than I do. No man is more willing to accord you the just meed of praise and admiration for your unwearied research, your unrivaled industry, and the sturdy blows you hav dealt and are dealing to superstition and priestcraft than is

Yours truly, J. R. MONROE.

Seymour, Ind., Oct. 6, 1878.

REMARKS.—We are pleased to witness the change that seems to hav come over Dr. Monroe's mind, and that he perceives that he has committed some errors. When the four of us were arrested at Watkins, and threatened with prison for handing out a few copies of Mr. Heywood's pamphlet, we regretted that the editor of the Seymour Times should join in with our Christian enemies, putting the worst possible face on the harmless transaction, and denounce Mr. Heywood and ourselves most bitterly. We were sorry to see that he so freely made false statements about our objects, motives, and wishes in the matter. We certainly did not want to sell anything obscene, and do not think we did; we did not expect to be arrested, and most assuredly did not wish to be.

We felt that his attack upon us was unjust and untruthful, and it was not singular that we gave some words of reply in our own columns. Mr. Bell being connected with us in the matter which Dr. Monroe so vigorously condemned, and being a personal friend of ours, it was but natural that he should seek our columns, as well, for justice. Besides, when a man is struck over the head with a club, it is hardly natural for him to rush into the arms of his assailant for aid and vindication. We cannot think our remarks were uncalled-for or unjust.

We were sorry to again see in the Doctor's issue of Sept. 28th so many untruthful and unfriendly flings about Eastern Liberals, Freelovers, etc. They evince anything but a fraternal spirit. We cannot see why the Doctor should allow himself to get so excited about Freelovers. They are not trying to injure him or anything that belongs to him. So far as we know, they are as amiable and harmless a set of people as the country contains. We are acquainted with several Freelovers, and we find them as peaceful, as law-abiding, as well-behaved, and as moral as any persons of our acquaintance, and we cannot see why their rights are not as real and as sacred as those of any other portion of the American people. We are no champion nor special defender of Freelovers or of their peculiar views. We hav never adopted their theories nor advocated them, but we accord to them the same rights we claim for ourselves, and shall, to the extent of our ability, defend them in their rights.

Freelovers are no more denounced by the Doctor, nor by those he seems to be co-operating with, than Freethinkers hav been for three hundred years. And a few months ago the Saint Anthony Comstock and Mr. Colgate, the President of his Society for the Suppression of Vice, in the yearly meeting of the Society, openly denounced Freethinkers and Freelovers in the same breath, and expressed the hope that both would be stamped out together. We are sorry to see Dr. Monroe joining his forces with them to carry out any part of their intolerant programme.

We think Mr. Bell and ourselves are no more Freelovers than is Dr. Monroe himself, and that we value our good name and character just as highly as he does his; and we cannot think it is kind in him to try to throw obloquy upon us or to injure us in the estimation of others. We are all mortals together; none of us are quite perfect, and we all need the aid and sympathy of our fellow-beings, especially those engaged in the same work with ourselves.

We are glad to learn, however, that the unkind things which Dr. Monroe has said about Mr. Bell and ourselves hav arisen from an unfortunate attack of illness. A frail, intoxicated woman, when she was picked out of the gutter, asked argumentatively, "Who can help sickness?" We are all liable to it, and should not asperse those who are subject to its attacks. We can only hope that the Doctor will not again hav an attack of such illness as causes him to say unkind, unfair, and untruthful things about those who are striving as earnestly as himself to do what is right and to maintain it. We certainly wish to be on amicable relations with the Seymour Times and with every other Liberal paper. We prefer not to quarrel with any of them, and only state the truth when we say that we hav attacked none of them, and hav not uttered a word against them, until they first commenced upon us, evincing a disposition to injure us in the estimation of the Liberal public, when we hav sometimes acted in self-defense. Let us now hope for an era of good health, good feeling, good resolves, and good work.—[ED. T. S.]

IN A GENERAL sort of way it is known that dynamite torpedoes of from 100 to 200 pounds will ignite one another if sunk in ten feet of water at intervals of 300 feet, when one of them is exploded. Gun-cotton torpedoes are considered to be somewhat less sensitive. It is upon this fact of the communicability of ignition from torpedo to torpedo that the method of clearing a channel of torpedoes is based. A pinnace taking along a bundle of insulated electric wires starts from a vessel to the place where the torpedoes are supposed to be laid. Near the first torpedo a charge of dynamite or gun-cotton, connected to the electric wires, is dropped from the pinnace, and when the pinnace has retreated sufficiently far the charge is exploded with the effect of discharging the submarine explosives in its neighborhood. Nothing very accurate has as yet been ascertained with regard to the influence of depth of water, character of the explosives, etc,, upon such countermining. The experiments at Portsmouth, England, on September 3d, were rather of the nature of a sham battle than a thorough test of the conditions under which a channel protected by torpedoes can be cleared and safely entered by a fleet. But, doubtless, less showy but more useful methods will, by and by, determine the exact value of torpedoes for defensive purposes.

THE authorities of the French Mint hav drawn up a statement of its operations from 1795 to the end of 1877. During that period the collective value of the gold coinage was as follows: Hundred-franc pieces, 44,346,400 francs; 50-franc pieces, 46,568,700 francs; 40 franc pieces, 204,432,360 francs; 20 franc pieces, 6,708,899,520 francs; 10-franc pieces, 1,013,614,610 francs; 5-franc pieces, 233,440,130 francs. Of gold coins 20-franc pieces only were struck in 1877, their value being 255,181,140 francs, and their number 12,759,057. The total number of franc pieces issued was 93 000 000, and of half-franc pieces, 89,000,000. The collective value of silver money coined from 1795 to 1876 was 5,510,000,000 of francs. In all the value of the bronze coins issued, comprising 10 centimes, 5 centimes, 2 centimes, and 1 centime is 62,702,785 francs and 40 centimes. The year 1795 was chosen to start from because in that year the first coins on the decimal system were struck.

Letters from Friends.

FLORENCE, IOWA, Sept., 9, 1878.

BRO. BENNETT: The Resolutions adopted at Watkins have the right sound—most of them. Nos. 1 and 2 contain a clear, concise, and cogent statement of the secularist's position upon the relations of State and Church. Nos. 3, 4, and 5 are more than great, they are grand; they are magnificent. They are a step in advance of any previous official utterance of the Secular party. They giv forth no uncertain sound; they do not compromise with falsehood and throw a sop to popular morality. I am sorry that I am compelled to criticise any portion of this, as a whole, incomparable platform, but planks 6 and 7 are weak in some respects. Of plank 6 I would say that the Convention was under no obligation to protest that "Cupid's Yokes" had only been sold to adults, and that it was sold that members of the Convention might be the better enabled to judge of the questions coming before the Convention. That resolution should have said that Miss Tilton sold that work because it was her right so to do, and that the Convention sustained her in such sale. I am aware that the latter part of the resolution did so declare, but the clearness and firmness of that utterance was somewhat obscured and weakened by the saving clause to which allusion has been made. I suppose that "Mills" resolution is the seventh, and I must say that it is, part of it, very weak. That lines 8 to 13, inclusive, are excellent and right to the point, I hav no wish to deny, but when Liberalism is put upon the defensive and compelled to protest that it is not in favor of obscenity, then, in the name of Freethought and freedom, I protest. Mr. Cabot was right, emphatically right. Liberals hav been charged with a tendency towards every kind of crime and immorality, but do we, in our official utterances and platform of principles, feel called upon to protest that we do not favor murder, arson, theft, rape, etc.? Certainly not, and no more should we permit ourselves to be roused about and put upon our defense by our enemies. Assume the offensive, and keep that position; strike straight from the shoulder, and when you see a "Christian morality," level it with the dust.

Resolution 8 is very timely; any Liberalism which does not join heart and hand with the common people in their warfare against their oppressors is unworthy of the name. There is one so-called Liberal paper in this land which has not one word of sympathy or encouragement for the struggling masses in their attempts to achieve their industrial independence, and when it quotes anything bearing upon the financial and labor questions, it is always for the subsidized mouthpieces of the bond-lords and gold-barons.

Resolutions 9 and 10 are right to the point. "Women's Rights" were born of Freethought and science, and it is right that we should, as a body, place ourselves squarely upon a woman suffrage platform. These resolutions and those recently adopted by the National Woman Suffrage Association indicate that these two bodies of reformers are beginning to understand their true relations toward each other.

Glad am I that your Convention adopted resolution 11, and thus sent a word of commendation and good speed to our noble English brothers and sisters. They are fighting a terrible battle bravely and unflinchingly.

The rest of the resolutions are timely and good, and especially is that suggestion shadowed forth in resolution 14 of great importance now.

And your arrest, and that of Bros. Bell and Mosher and the high-souled Josephine S. Tilton—who can fathom the depth of infamy of such outrages? Mr. G. L. Henderson's questions at Judge Hurd are grand in their terrible sarcasm, and well expose the hypocrisy of those who are always telling of what the "masses" must not know; of what will surely corrupt and demoralize the "people." They never belonged to the "masses;" they are not of the "people." Oh, no! They are of the saintly elect; of the pure in appearance and undefiled before the world; people who can wade through seas of filth and come out with garments untainted and hands upraised in holy horror should they chance to see an ungodly neighbor studying the beautiful mechanism and secret functions of the human body, or laying bare with the sacrilegious scalpel of caustic criticism the horrible inhumanities and foul tyrannies of our social life. Out upon such travesties upon humanity! Bury the old supernatural morality ten thousand fathoms deep beneath the waves of wrath and scorn surging upward and outward and onward from the hearts and brains of a great, free people. Asa K. Butts is right. At last the Freethought host of America has leaders worthy of the great cause, and martyrs to make the nineteenth century immortal in the annals of the world. Bennett, Leland, Wakeman, Green, Heywood, Henderson, Brown, Tilton, Butts, Bell, and scores more such as ye, heroes and martyrs all, I extend to you my hands in fraternal greeting. From your hands the banner of freedom will never trail in the dust of fawning or surrender. You are going on in that straightforward path which always leads to ultimate and final victory. It is the path trodden by Carlile and many another brave English heart contending for the right of free publication. It is the path of principle over which to-day, in England, Bradlaugh and Besant and Truelove are pressing forward the battle for liberty of conscience. There is but one underlying principle in every reform, and that is the principle of absolute justice. A morality not bottomed on justice is worthless; resting on that, it can defy all the cohorts of superstition, bigotry, prudery, and hypocrisy.

E. C. WALKER.

ROCKFORD, ILL., Sept. 23, 1878.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: There are many things whereof I would like to write to thee. Many subjects are constantly occurring to my mind which would most likely interest thy readers. There is the unhealthy condition of our finances, which hav been tinkered at and manipulated by unskillful, incompetent, or dishonest legislators, until they hav almost brought financial ruin upon the country. And it has been all brought about by trying to legislate in favor of the bankers and brokers and capitalists of the country to the detriment of all other classes.

If, when the government commenced issuing greenbacks, they had kept right on issuing them as the exigencies of the country demanded, and made them receivable for all demands, either of the government or of individuals, and had neither chartered banks nor issued interest-bearing bonds, but given every man a musket, and sent him to the front, we should not be in the financial muddle we are in to-day. But the question now arises, how are we to get out of the muddle. And here comes the rub. It is always a mighty sight easier to get into a bad scrape than to get out when once in. But there is one thing evident to every rational mind. We shall never get out by continuing to keep in office the same lot of salary grabbers and subsidy stealers, and drunken debauchees we hav been sending to our Congress for several sessions past.

There is little to be wondered at that the Comstock laws received so little attention when the petition signed by 70,000 good honest American citizens was presented to our last session of Congress when we take into consideration the scenes of its closing session. It is the rule everywhere that bad men or bad women are always more afraid that somebody else is going to do something bad than honest, truthful, and virtuous men and women are. So it is not to be wondered at that the last session of Congress did not repeal or modify the obscenity laws. If the masses of our people were as corrupt as some of our law-makers, and some of those who hav the power given them to enforce the laws are, I am not certain but that it would be well to continue the obscenity laws in force, or abolish these and enact others which were constitutional, and make them stronger. But I hav digressed from the subject on which I intended to write, for when I get to thinking or talking on this finance question, it almost makes me mad, or about as mad as I am ever in the habit of getting. Although I hav been a Republican ever since the organization of the Republican party, yet I must say that we hav had some of the most abominable legislation on the question of finance within the past fifteen years, that ever any nation on the globe was cursed with, and it has been all done in favor of capitalists and money sharks. But even now if we can only get honest men to man the old Ship of State, it may not be too late to weather the storm.

There was another matter that I was minded to write to you about in this letter. It is the marriage relation on the paternity of children. As I deem it right that every child born into the world has an equal right to call some man father, and as old forms and creeds are loosing their hold on the people, this question of what should constitute marriage is being pretty freely discussed. We are losing faith in the old dogma that marriages are made in heaven any more than any other kind of human contracts are made in heaven. And it is coming to be about time that we quit bothering that high court with such matters, as there are being entirely too many children ushered into this world without a legal claim to call some man father, which is to say the least, a great act of injustice to the children. Now, Mr. Editor, we think that every child born into this world has a right to call some man father. The world has advanced too far in science to longer admit of their claiming the paternity of gods or angels, and they most certainly should hav the right to claim paternity somewhere, and in our humble judgment, we think that wherever and whenever it can be proven that a man is the father of a child, that child should hav all of the legal claims on that father that it would hav were it born under the sanction of the most binding form of wedlock, and no agreement or settlement made between the parents should invalidate the child's claims. We know that in its infancy it is not capable of establishing its rights, but its rights should not be sequestered on that account, and the mother should hav no power to sequester the child's claim any more than the mother now has to sequester the title of a legitimate child to the real estate of the father, and our laws should be so amended as to protect the rights of children born out of the marriage relation.

And we would further suggest the propriety of making laws to the effect that where no previous or prior marriage relation exists with either of the parents, the fact of paternity should be considered sufficient evidence of marriage, and in this manner make it impossible for illegitimate children to be born into the world. These are only suggestions thrown out for the consideration of our lawmakers. Yours for truth and right living, F. F. Follet.

Salina, Kan., Oct. 3, 1878.

D. M. Bennett, Dear Sir: I would be pleased to receive a sample copy of your paper, and also a complete list of your tracts. I am endeavoring to ascertain all I can, and am always ready and willing to learn more of the question that is causing the petrified Presbyterians and Methodist mummies to tremble in their boots.

The whole Church—Catholic, etc.—is a worse humbug, in my estimation, than the whiskey ring or Tweed ring, and the sooner it's broken the better. I am trying to lift the mantle of darkness in this burg, and am rewarded with such complimentary phrases as idiot, hypocrite, blasphemer; and the general supposition is that the royal ruler of Hades has two mortgages on my soul. Send me a list of tracts. I want light. Truly, etc, H. W. Berks.

Hinspale, N. H., Oct. 9, 1878.

D. M. Bennett, Dear Sir: I am in favor of every man having all the rights to which he is entitled. Unwittingly five years since I fell into the clutches of that unmitigated scoundrel, Anthony Comstock, and I am well aware that no one is safe so long as the law remains as it is. I therefore pledge to the Defense Fund $10.00, and will send it when needed. I also ask you to add my name to your "Declaration of Rights." I hav read "Cupid's Yokes." I propose to keep the copy I hav, unless Anthony Comstock seizes it (which is not improbable), for while I do not by any means indorse said book, yet I firmly believe that any one has a perfect right to buy, read, possess, and believe, if they see fit, not only this book, but any other. I hav never claimed to be or been called an Infidel, but if I am thankful for anything it is that—though brought up under the shadow of the orthodox Church—I hav thus far been able to live without becoming a hypocrite, and there are very few members of that Church that are not hypocrites, and worse. I know Anthony Comstock to be a heartless villain, a scoundrel of the deepest dye, and any honest and decent man needing help to defend himself from that despicable rascal can hav it so long as it is in my power to giv.

Respectfully, Henry E. Hunter.

ANOTHER CHALLENGE TO MOTT.

Kirksville, Mo., Oct. 7, 1878.

Mr. Bennett: I inclose thirty cents for two copies of "Cupid's Yokes," both to be sent to my address, one for myself, the other for O. B. Milliken, who wishes his name, as also do I mine, attached to the declaration of rights; and we pledge, each, five dollars, if needed, to the Defense Fund. We hav of late been reading "Letters from the Devil," and hav not as yet, in our judgment, become contaminated, and will risk our discernment upon the pamphlet which has caused and is causing so much agitation.

I see in The Truth Seeker of October 5th a challenge to Mr. Mott from Ella E. Gibson. I will make him a better offer. I will not require a materialized form, so called, to come out of the cabinet. The seance may progress as usual; the cabinet door may be closed, but not locked; I shall hav the liberty to go to the opening and view the spirits, so called, as I hav done heretofore; and when there, viewing what is claimed to be a spirit form, will make an effort, and if I fail to detect deception, will giv as an apology one hundred dollars. I shall be at liberty, at the time of making the demonstration, to immediately enter the cabinet if I choose, and make such search as I see fit. I will agree during the time to do Mr. Mott no harm, and he must agree to do me none. Living in an adjoining county near by, the test may take place in his own house and cabinet; and I will agree to deposit beforehand the amount for the purpose in one of the banks of his own town.

I hav attended several of Mr. Mott's seances, both here in Kirksville and at his own house in Memphis, and hav watched things closely; and while at first inclined to believe that real phenomena were taking place through him, the more I investigated the more skeptical I became. I hav learned this, that no test will be allowed that would, if fraud were being practiced, lead to detection. I visited Mott's on one occasion with Prof. Jamieson, and he (Mott) gave us, that is, the audience present, to understand that he had been put through many tests and would submit to no more, and, should it be proposed, he would take it as an insult. This, I thought, was a hint thrown out to Mr. Jamieson, knowing that he had exposed a fraud sometime before in Chicago. However, we will see whether he accepts the offer. Wm. Hart.

Snedekerville, Pa., Oct. 14, 1878.

D. M. Bennett, Dear Sir: I send you five more trial subscribers. Cannot you add the "Holy Bible Abridged" to your list of premiums, as some prefer it to the Dictionary or "Age of Reason"?

As some of my correspondents do not write you, permit me to quote what they say about The Truth Seeker:

"What glorious reading The Truth Seeker contains! I wish everybody had access to it."—Ruth A. Howland, Barre, Mass.

"The Truth Seeker, with all its noble writers and correspondents, is, in my opinion, pre-eminently ahead of all other papers to stir up the cesspool of orthodoxy, as already seen cropping out through Anthony Comstock and others. This man Comstock seems to be a tool used by others to oppress all those who are opposed to their particular creed. I must confess I loathe this man Comstock beyond degree, and still the worst punishment I would inflict upon him would be to compel him to read a chapter in his new Bible (lately dedicated to him) every morning in his family, especially if he has grown up daughters, then close with a long prayer thanking God for his Holy Bible. He should be compelled to do this during his natural life."—R. Parkinson, Oshkosh, Wis.

Don't get discouraged over the arrests and trial. Thousands of people are being interested who never heard of Comstock or his law till within the last three months, some of whom were ignorant of his or its existence till within the last three days. Here, in this scattered population, from whence I send you these five subscribers, all but two or three knew not these facts. Six lectures in twelve days by your earnest correspondent had opened their eyes and induced them to subscribe, that they may know the end through reading The Truth Seeker.

I have received numerous letters from friends and strangers expressive of approbation in regard to my "Mott Challenge," and Mr. John Flint, of Webster, Mass., adds his name and $100.00 to the fund, and others also, whose names I will not mention, and I doubt not the sum will swell up to a thousand dollars, provided the parties can all be present and witnesses. The sum of $300.00 is also offered in The Investigator to Mrs. Thayer and other mediums of a similar character for about the same privileges required by myself. Now, will not the spirits and mediums step forward and avail themselves of the chance to prove beyond a doubt the presence of a materialized spirit, and relieve us of all this painful uncertainty that is holding in suspense so many really honest and patient investigators.

The Watkins Democrat contains this paragraph: "Mrs. Colman of Syracuse, a prominent Woman's Suffragist, made several of the boys quit the noxious weed during the session of the Freethinkers. Mother Colman is a regular brick!" Who will question the judgment of the editor of the Watkins Democrat after reading her excellent letter in The Truth Seeker of Oct. 12th, though the language is more expressive than elegant?

Yours truly, Ella E. Gibson.

Campbell Hill, Ill., Sept. 30, 1878.

D. M. Bennett, Please add my name to the declaration made by Elizur Wright and others; and I furthermore declare that if the question of human rights cannot be settled on the forum and at the ballot box, I am ready to do one man's part to settle it by force if necessary. I did one man's part to settle the questions of states' rights and slavery; and before I die I want to see absolute universal mental liberty enthroned wherever the star spangled banner floats. I am, dear sir, fraternally yours, A. R. Swortzcope.

A LETTER TO E. H. HEYWOOD.

Columbus, Kan.

Dear Brother: "Silver and gold hav I none"—am pinched with poverty; but I am rich in truth and sympathy and a life-long experience of persecution and prosecution for opinion's sake. When I think that you, who hav spent your life in doing good and uttering truth to humanity, are now imprisoned by the minions of Church and State in violation of all manhood, and justice, and the national Constitution, I feel that "Resistance to tyrants is obedience to God."

My good brother, "all these things must needs be, but the end is not yet." Twenty-three years ago, when my life was in peril, and I knew not what to do, the spirits said to me, through a medium, "The world must be saved by the means it hates."

You and I are a part of those means, and your present crown of thorns shall giv you a crown of glory. "The good can never be unfortunate."

Our nation is in bonds and bondage, political, religious, and social; and truth, humanity, and freedom are struggling into growth, development, and, I trust, ultimate supremacy.

Church and State too often co-operate to oppress, repress, and suppress all natural, free, spontaneous growth, evolution, enjoyment, use, and expression. In this, the freest (?) country on earth, orthodoxy, with its long use and abuse of power, talks and acts as though Infidels were not human, and their rights should not be respected or protected. I hav faith that our Liberal, inspiring, saving truth will in the end giv us the victory, dark and discouraging as it often looks. I trust that your vile treatment, and that of the trio at Watkins, will awake and inspire the Freethinkers to use all the intellectual and moral power they hav to resist and destroy this great abuse of power on the part of our enemies. Your persecutions will make patronage for your paper and books and otherwise illustrate the law of compensation; and thus the curses of your enemies will be more than balanced by the resulting good. Be of good cheer, brother.

"One self-approving hour whole years outweighs
Of stupid starers and wild huzzas;
And more true joy Marcellus, exiled, feels Than Cæsar with a senate at his heels."

J. H. Cook.

THE CHURCH AND WOMAN.

Osceola, Iowa, Oct. 3, 1878.

Mr. Editor: It is admitted that except for the earnest support of woman the prestige of the Christian Church would be gone. In return for such disinterested support, what kind of acknowledgment does woman get from her church? The Church has always degraded her, kept her in ignorance, and treated her cruelly from Hypatia's time until now.

I wandered, once upon a time, over the ruins of a large abbey at Bath, England, and the moldering skeleton forms of women were there recently displayed to view. They were nuns who had broken their vow of chastity, and the authorities of the Church had them placed in niches of the wall and solid stone masonry built up. No form of friar or monk was there; the Church, of course, could not believe a holy friar would break his vow.

Tell me not that the times and the Church are changed. The Church, if it dared, would treat Miss Tilton as cruelly as it did Hypatia or the nuns. F. J. Emary.

Wyandotte, Kan., Oct. 12, 1878.

D. M. Bennett, Dear Sir: Am an advocate of Freethought and a subscriber to your most excellent paper published in the name of freedom and happiness. Inclosed find report of money collected here for fever sufferers. I copy it from the Kansas City Journal:

"Wyandotte, one of the thriving towns of eastern Kansas, stands thus on the fever question: Kansas Pacific workingmen, $148 00; box at post office, $3.45; M. E. Sunday-school, $1.79; Episcopal church, $0 65. The churches put in the prayers, and humanity puts in the money. Many individuals subscribed liberally, but did it in the name of charity, and not in the name of so-called religion."

E. Donovan.

West Winfield, N. Y., Oct. 4, 1878.

Much Esteemed Brother: Your paper was received at noon, and I have been reading it for two hours with the utmost satisfaction. Your article, "The Freeman's Birthright," has the right ring. Long may you live unfettered and free to continue truth telling as in the past. "The Purity and Godliness of Sex"—how much truth is contained in that article! My soul says amen to each and every word. The writer will confer a favor to one at least by giving their residence and true name appended to their next article. I am so much pleased with T. C. Leland's writings; and such true manhood is stamped upon H. L. Green's productions that it does one good to read them. How I wish I were able to send you money for your paper to be sent to a hundred friends who do not have the privilege of reading it. I have no fear of the result at your trial next December. A friend, Mrs. H., of Watkins, writes to me that the Judge will lose many friends there, and that there was much excitement about the indictment. I think they will be heartily ashamed of themselves before the trial, and find no cause for action. Yours truly, Mrs. R. Scott Briggs.

Syracuse, N. Y., Oct. 8, 1878.

Dear Brother Bennett: I received "The Champions of the Church some time ago from you, for which you receive my heartfelt thanks. I have read it all through carefully, and pronounce it one of the most telling works against the Christian superstition and folly ever issued from the press in this nineteenth century. Your exposure of Anthony Comstock, that abortion on humanity, is worth all you ask for the work, setting aside all the other infamous characters that were leaders in the different ages of the world's history, both Catholic and Protestant.

There is a spirit of candor and fairness in treating of those abominable characters all through the work that is perfectly admirable. It is written in a style that makes it interesting to the general reader, and it ought to be in the library of every Freethinker in the world, and every Christian, both Catholic and Protestant, ought to be obliged to read it and ascertain the facts in the case that can read the English language on the face of the globe.

Now, Mr. Editor, I want you should send me "Cupid's Yokes," so I can see what a mass of obscenity there is in that little pamphlet that our courts are making such a fuss about. I don't think it will do me much hurt after reading the Christian Bible through three times from Genesis to Revelations, which I hav done very carefully. I think, Brother Bennett, you did perfectly right in publishing the obscenities of the holy Bible, so the wayfaring man need not err therein. I say success to you forever and ever. Amen and Amen. From your brother in the cause of humanity, Isaac Van Schoick.

P. S.—I send you a cordial invitation to come to my house and make it your home while you are at the coming L. L. Congress; it shall cost you nothing for lodging and board. I. V.

Hastings, Mich., Oct. 12, 1878.

Bro. Bennett: I received and read "Cupid's Yokes," and out of curiosity passed it around amongst a large number of intelligent people, requesting their opinion as to its "obscenity." Although most of them could not indorse the author's views, all agreed that its "obscenity" existed only in Judge Hurd's and Anthony Comstock's eyes. In regard to the "scrapes" and "quill fighting" in which you are at present involved, rather than deem an apology from you necessary (as a recent correspondent seems to hav done), I would say, Fight it out; hang on like a yaller dog, and sustain yourself against the false charges of The Index, of which we all know you to be innocent.

I inclose 50c. for the Holy Bible abridged.

Yours, George Wood.

B. F. Underwood will lecture at West Liberty, O., Oct. 18th, 19th, and 20th; Naples, N. Y., 23d and 24th.

The Present Crisis.

BY ELLEN M. BOLLES.

Superstition hateth progress.
And it fights with bitter z al
Every cause which seeks the increase
Of our human weal.

For it still regards as sacred
Institutions gray with years,
Though they fill the heart with anguish
And the earth with tears.

Persecution still awaiteth
Those who dare to think and speak
Of the many wrongs yet suffered
By the poor and weak.

Even now a friend of justice
Occupies a felon's cell:
And his crime is loving freedom
And the right too well.

For this cause he dared earth's hatred,
Striving on, though under ban,
Finding joy in constant labor
For the rights of man.

Meagre pay his toil hath brought him,
But old customs, hateful grown,
Trembled at his stern rebukings—
Shrank before his frown.

Fear and hatred, twin-born children
Of oppression, in their might Smote him with a vengeful anger
For his love of right.

Thus in himis Freedom menaced,
And its banner traileth low,
While our future fate dependeth
On our action now.

Lo! behold! our path of duty
Lies before us clear and plain;
We must raise aloft our banner
And its cause maintain:

While our shouts of indignation
Loudly ring from vale and hill,
Proving us to be a people
Freedom-loving still.

We must let no shackles bind us,
Speech and press must still be free.
For on these depend the safety
Of our liberty.

And the future generations
Ask it of us now and here
That we save for them the freedom
Which hath cost so dear.

First Love.

Down under the hill, and there under the fir-tree
By the spring, and looking far out in the valley,
She stands as she stood in the glorious Olden,
Swinging her hat in her right hand dimpled;
The other hand toys with a honeysuckle
That has tiptoed up and is trying to kiss her.
Her dark hair is twining her neck and her temples
As tendrils some beautiful Balize marble.

'O eyes of lustre and love and passion!
O radiant face like the seashell tinted!
White cloud with the sunbeams tangled in it!"
I cried, as I stood in the dust beneath her,
And gazed on the goddess my boy-heart worshiped
With a love and a passion, a part of madness.

"Dreamer," she said, and a tinge of displeasure
Swept over her face that I should disturb her;
"All of the fair world is spread out before you:
Go down and possess it with love and devotion.
And heart ever tender and touching as woman's,
And life shall be fair as the first kiss of morning."
I turned down the pathway, was blinded no longer:
Another was coming, tall, manly, and bearded.

I built me a shrine in the innermost temple—
In the innermost rim of the heart's red center—
And placed her therein, sole possessor and priestess,
And carved all her words on the walls of my temple.
They say that he woo'd her there under the fir-tree,
That he won her one eve, when the katydids mocked her.
He may hav a maiden and call her Merinda;
But mine is the one that stands there forever,
Leisurely swinging her hat by the ribbons.

They say she is wedded. No, not my Merinda,
For mine stands forever there under the fir-tree
Gazing and swinging her hat by the ribbons.
They tell me her children reach up to my shoulder.
'Tis false. I did see her down under the fir-tree
When the stars were all busy a-weaving thin laces
Made red with their gold and the moon's yellow tresses,
Slow swinging her hat as in days of the Olden.

Joaquin Miller, in Harper's Bazaar.

Past Finding Out.

How often we hear the adage repeated that the Creator takes especial care of the good and the brave. On the contrary, it seems as though Deity were somewhat indifferent to estimable people, so often do they come to grief. Solomon said: "I hav heen young and now am old; yet never hav I seen the righteous forsaken nor his seed begging bread." All that can be said with reference to such a statement as this is that Solomon must hav been very unobservant, or that Providence conducted things differently then from what he does now. Nothing is more common in the modern world than to see righteous people forsaken and their children starving and in rags—and in some cases the children eminently deserve it. It would be more correct to say that the laws of nature are no respecters of persons, that those who cannot and will not take care of themselves must expect to suffer; and that even those who do the best they know how and sacrifice themselves for the good of humanity fall victims in various hideous ways. Dr. Lindley, for instance, who voluntarily put himself in quarantine, has just died; and Dr. Kibble, who introduced his crib and water treatment for the cure of yellow-fever, died of the disease for which he thought he had found a universal remedy.—Telegram.

Civilization and Clothes.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: It is with a goodly degree of trepidation that I hazard a reply to Mrs. E. Wheelock and H., in their profound (?) criticisms of my article on "Civilization Without Clothes." But as they are determined not to leave even the minutest remnant of a ghost's shadow of myself, I shall, perforce, endeavor to scatter their logic to the four winds, knowing that the foundation upon which they wish to construct their theories of moral philosophy is as unstable as are the sands of old ocean.

That the sexual functions of man and woman were purposed for a nobler object than the mere gratification of animal desires, no intelligent person will deny; but those desires are continually relegating themselves to the grosser promptings of nature that hav obtained from the earliest history of man. This being incontrovertible, and to which may be ascribed the equilibrium of the sexes, how are we to teach those who hav arrived at the age of puberty, much less children, those principles of morality so much desired by my critics, or restrict them in the gratification of impulses that are as natural as they are just? It is as futile as was the effort of a certain eastern potentate, who, to educate his son in profound ignorance of sex life, excluded him from all knowledge of womankind, to learn ultimately that the impulses of nature would burst the bonds of restraint, for they asserted their full power upon the first appearance of a beautiful female in that youth's room.

The assertions, "Children are taught that clothing is worn for the purpose of concealing something about the person which is degrading," and "the idea prevails that human sex organs are vile," paving the way for immoral and lustful practices, are without foundation. With equal propriety we could assert that the mammary glands are vile and degrading because of their concealment, which we know to be otherwise. Even orthodox Christians do not sanction such statements, and custom has instituted this as a precedent that clothing not alone adorns and is a healthful protection to our persons, but that it is a great fulcrum in elevating our morals to a higher eminence of perfection than would otherwise obtain, and to advocate the reverse is to undermine the chastity of society. A French philosopher has pertinently stated that children under ten years of age are wanting in sex; consequently E. W. and H.'s arguments resolve themselves into a farce, for it is folly beyond measure to advocate the teaching an infant mind an idea it cannot comprehend. Reformation in morals can never be attained by such logic as they adduce, and the tenor of their articles will effect more in retarding the advance of Liberal thought than all that Comstock & Co. could do in a lifetime.

We can look upon the nudity of innocent childhood with feelings devoid of immodesty, or view the sexual organs of the lower animals with scarce a passing thought, because such objects are beyond the power of exciting our passions. It is not so with the vigorous and fully-sexed man and woman when they come into mutual contact. This power to reciprocate a passion awakens new impulses which flood the brain with magnetic thrills. Man, under such influences, will seek the silent shades of the forest to bask in the beautiful imagry of his newly awakened emotions—picturing woman the beau ideal of angelic perfection. But when sexual congress is complete, he finds his angel has lost her golden-hued wings, in that she is blood and bones the same as himself. This view of the subject is not very exalting, yet it cannot be obviated by "teaching our young, in a natural, commonsense way, all that we know about the mystery of sex," for they know a great deal too much in reference to it already. The established modes of life, which no ten, nor a thousand families, can reform; the wines, highly seasoned condiments, and banquets extending late into the night are great promoters of lascivious conduct. And until other and better customs are established, we cannot expect our children to be any better in the future, as men and women, than those by whom we are at present surrounded.

I hav been informed by physicians who make gynecology a specialty, that frequent professional contact with females produces a contempt bordering upon entire obliteration of sexual desire. Herein can Mrs. Elmira Wheelock and H. take courage, for if familiarity through frequent contact will breed contempt for "native purity of sex," why may not frequent personal observation produce a like result, and consequently an entire human family of Adam's and Eve's? Then let us hav, by all means, a civilization without clothes, and hail with shouts of gladness the great moral reform of "sex holiness."

Whether Mrs. Wheelock's position is true or false, the spirit of the times is only too eager to seize her standard and place it in the van of the onward march of licentiousness. The fact is, in her school it would be as common to speak of the transient ailments of the genitals as it is now to refer to the itching of the nose. Here is the reductio ad absurdum of her system of "true education concerning sex." Truly, it is more ennobling to accept biblical precepts wherein they command us to clothe our nakedness in all humility, than to debase ourselves by such practices and expressions as those which would be the natural outgrowth of Mr. Leland's, Mrs. Wheelock's, and H.'s ethics of morality.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK, HIS CAREER OF CRUELTY AND CRIME. By D. M. Bennett: New York.—The "villain of the piece," as portrayed in this story, is an anomaly in this American republic. It has been supposed that such creatures could exist only under old world despotisms and in the Dark Ages. But here he is a living reality, and clothed with authority in the democracy of to-day. Here he is, a remainder of the Inquisition not yet fossilized; acting as a specimen torturer right before our eyes. We read the histories of England, old and new, and wonder that there ever could hav been a time when the race of English-speaking men and women could hav believed in witchcraft, and could hav burned, drowned, and in other cruel ways persecuted witches. This we find hard to believe; but here are similar outrages occurring in New York, Boston, and the very centers of intelligence of the Eastern States. Here is Comstock, the counterpart of Matthew Hopkins, the old witch-finder; and the arrests, fines, and imprisonments, under the form of laws which he himself has procured to be passed, are only paralleled by the old witch trials and punishments of two centuries ago.

But what is this new craze founded upon—what is Comstock's excuse for being? A pretense of obscenity. Not obscenity, in fact—not real obscenity; but, making use of the public abhorrence of anything obscene, he selects for his victims editors of radical and reform journals, druggists, doctors, healing mediums, and people generally who hav a little money, entraps them by various lying pretenses to commit some irregularity, buy or sell some contraband article, send something through the mail, and then hauls them before the courts, and swears to anything he pleases, protected by his power as a detective; and the persons he pounces upon hav no chance.

This little book is an expose of his proceedings; and all who wish to exercise the vigilance which is the price of liberty, will do well to procure it.—Browne's Phonographic Monthly.

A Monument to Spanish Patience.

The King of Spain has decided on having an immense basilica raised over the remains of Queen Mercedes. The sum of 1,000,000 reals will annually be deducted from the Civil List for its construction till the building is completed. The Duc de Montpensier and the Princess of the Asturias hav promised to furnish yearly 200,000 reals in aid of the work. Lastly, the Duc de Montpensier has brought to Paris with him a letter from the King to Queen Isabella, asking her to join in the project by handing over for the purpose the diamonds and jewels deposited in the Cathedral of Atocha which belong to her, and represent a sum of 15,000,000 reals—more than $600,000. The Queen at once telegraphed as follows in reply:

"MY SON: The Duc de Montpensier has just handed me your letter. I see that, like a Catholic King and a gentleman, you seek consolation in God, and think of Mercedes in doing good to the capital. You are going to place her beloved remains at the feet of the Virgin beneath a magnificent temple. Your mother, my child, not only permits the jewels of Atocha to be sold, but she blesses you and joins in your project—a project worthy of a King, a Christian, and a good husband. For this and everything, count always, Alfonso, on the immense love, the support and co-operation, of your mother, who wishes it to be known that, although at a distance, she is and always will be the same for Madrid, for Spain, and for her King."

Spain is probably the only country in the world where a Catholic King and gentleman could seek consolation in God and display his love for his dead Queen by placing her remains at the feet of the Virgin beneath a magnificent temple, reared at the expense of an impoverished and church-ridden people. Spain is to-day the Spain of the Middle Ages in all that pertains to superstition and feudal tyranny. Spain is accursed of its church. The traveler, passing through this priest-ridden, ignorant, impoverished old Spain, sees the most abject misery, the most hopeless poverty; he sees villages where half the people live in holes and caves, in huts and hovels—sees distress on every side; land tilled with crooked sticks for plows; rags, filth, destitution, and poverty. Yet in every town, village, and city, a gorgeous cathedral rears its spire to the heavens—a cathedral rich in marbles, paintings; and gorgeous upholstery; in every village and town, sleek, fat, and oily priests, with broad-brimmed sombreros and robes of velvet. We attribute these grand edifices to an earlier age, but semper eadem seems to be the motto of the Roman Church, that allows a Catholic king in the name of religion to rob the poor—to build at the expense of millions of reals a monumental cathedral over the remains of a dead girl who was for five months the Queen of Spain.—S. F. Argonaut.

CHRONIC DISEASES,

Embracing those of the Blood and Nerves, the Diseases of Men, the Diseases of Women, and the various causes, physical and social, leading to them, are plainly treated by that plainest of books, PLAIN HOME TALK, EMBRACING MEDICAL COMMON SENSE—nearly 1,000 pages, 200 illustrations—by DR. E. B. FOOTE, of 120 LEXINGTON AVE., NEW YORK, to whom all letters from the sick should be addressed. In its issue for January 19, 1878, Mr. Bennett's TRUTH SEEKER thus speaks of DR. FOOTE and his medical publications: "We know him (Dr. Foote) personally and intimately, and we say, with all the assurance that knowledge imparts, that he is a man of the highest incentives and motives, whose life has been spent in instructing and improving his fellow-beings by giving such information as is well calculated to enable them to be more healthy, more happy, and to be better and more useful men and women. His medical works possess the highest value, and have been introduced and thoroughly read in hundreds of thousands of families, who, to-day, stand ready to bear willing testimony to the great benefit they have derived from the physiological, hygienic, and moral lessons which he has so ably imparted."

THE

Creed of Christendom;

Its Foundation Contrasted with its Superstructure.

BY W. R. GREG,

Author of "Enigmas of Life," "Literary and Social Judgments," &c.

One vol. Crown, 8vo., with Complete Index. Cloth, $1.50.

"Some twelve years ago, in a London drawing-room, one of our most eminent men of science said: 'Why do not the bishops answer Mr. Greg's Creed of Christendom? They are bound to answer it—if they can.' In the lifetime of the present generation the earliest work at all similar was that of Mr. Charles Hennell, which, in various respects, had great merit; but Mr. Greg, coming later, had the advantage of access to many able German researches, and his work continues the most complete on all sides; to it one may most confidently appeal when assailed by eager Christians with the current commonplaces of their warfare. Since bishops, deans, learned canons, and academic divines do not reply formally to so thorough, clear, and learned a treatise, which has been so long before the public, we have the best of proof attainable that this historical argument—occupying precisely the ground which English academicians have chosen as their own—is unanswerable" (F. W. Newman, on "The New Christology," in Fortnightly Review).

Sepher Toldoth Jeschu;

THE BOOK OF THE GENERATION OF JESUS.

WITH PREFACE AND NOTES BY SCHOLASTICUS.

First English Translation

Of the ancient Jewish story of Jesus, who was born at Bethlehem about 106 B. C., being the son of a betrothed maiden named Miriam (Mary) by Joseph Pandera. By the power of a charm stolen from the Holy of Holies he cured lepers, raised the dead, and wrought other miracles. Wherefore he was arrested by the elders of Jerusalem, scourged, crowned with thorns, and by order of the Sanhedrin stoned to death and hanged on the day before the Passover and the Sabbath, in the reign of Queen Alexandra, about the year 75 B. C.

Death of Simon Kepha on a tower in the city of the Nazarines about 69 B. C. How and why the Romans changed "Kepha" to "Petros."

Startling evidence that Paul flourished before the middle of the first century B. C., contemporary with the aforesaid Kepha.

AGENTS are informed that the best thing to sell to make money on, and also to benefit mankind, is this book. It explains and advocates the only harmless and practical means of avoiding the evils of celibacy, on the one hand, and of overburdened parentage on the other. It advocates more and earlier marriages, and increase of family only when health and pecuniary means will permit, but it most efficiently opposes abortion, prostitution, and all undesired and inconsiderate procreation. It contains the latest medical researches and results of science. The medical directions are easy, plain, explicit, though chaste and delicate. No married couple should be without it.

Christianity and Infidelity

A JOINT DISCUSSION BETWEEN

REV. G. H. HUMPHREY, Presb't'n Clergyman

OF NEW YORK, AND

D. M. BENNETT, Editor of The Truth Seeker

It was conducted in the columns of The Truth Seeker, a letter alternately from each contestant appearing each week, beginning April 1, 1877, and closing Sept. 29, 1877, thus continuing just six months, giving thirteen letters from Humphrey and thirteen replies by Bennett.

The subjects discussed were as follows:

PART I.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to American Liberty.

PART II.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to Learning and Science.

PART III.—Is there a stronger probability that the Bible is divine than that Infidelity is true?

The discussion has excited a large share of interest, both among believers and unbelievers; and as both sides are fairly presented, it is suited to readers of all shades of opinion.

The New York Advocate, a paper having a very extensive circulation, in speaking of the volume, says, "Perhaps a more able and exhaustive presentation of both sides of the great questions which have agitated the civilized world for centuries has never been made. At any rate, in this volume will be found a perfect magazine or storehouse of arguments, pro and con, which every intelligent man and woman should peruse with candor and with an earnest desire to arrive at sound conclusions on themes of the highest importance to all mankind. . . Light is what we need. Let the controversies proceed. Let the blows descend upon the error-dispelling anvil. Let the sparks fly in all directions from the heated steel. The truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, is what the people demand on all the great questions of the day, whether of Finance, Science, Politics, or Religion, and discussion will elicit it." Let every person who feels the slightest interest in theological questions, whether on one side or the other, read the Humphrey-Bennett Discussion."

DR. LYON'S Hygeian Home is at Springfield, Mo. See adv. in May Nos. TRUTH SEEKER. 13'25 Resp'y. J. S. LYON.

The distinguished physician for all PRIVATE CHRONIC and SEXUAL DISEASES, is without any exception the greatest living practitioner of the age. The thousands of cures he is performing annually substantiate this fact. He has patients in every State of the Union and in the British Provinces. Every reader of this who has any affection of the Head, Throat, Lungs, Heart, Stomach, Liver, Kidneys, Bladder Bowels, Womb, Genital Organs, Rheumatic or Neuralgic Difficulties, or Eruptions of the Skin, Blood Impurities, Tumors, Cancers, or any Nervous Affections or Diseases of the Eye or Ear, are invited to write to Dr. Fellows, whose charges are extremely low, so that those in most humble circumstances in life can avail themselves of his valuable services. The Doctor's crowning medical achievement has been in the discovery of an EXTERNAL or OUTSIDE APPLICATION for the permanent cure of SPERMATORRHŒA and IMPOTENCY, as the result of self-abuse in youth and sexual excesses in mature years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Powers, etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy. Dr. Fellows has prescribed his EXTERNAL REMEDY for 1,100 cases without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the Insane Asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others on the verge of Consumption, while others again had become Foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

Address, with stamp, Vineland, New Jersey, where Dr. R. P. Fellows is permanently located, and obtain his PRIVATE and other CIRCULARS, with cures SWORN TO, which is irrefutable testimony to the Doctor's unprecedented success in treating all the diseases here named. TERMS EXTREMELY LOW IN ALL CASES. WRITE YOUR ADDRESS PLAINLY.

(From the Rock Mountain Herald.)

"Dr. Fellows is a successful specialist for all the diseases which he claims to cure, such as chronic and sexual complaints. His wonderful skill and success are bringing him hundreds of cases weekly, by letter and otherwise, from all over the United States."

ALL our actions take their lines from the complexion of the heart, as landscapes their variety from light.—W. T. Bacon.

MAN is an animal that cannot long be left in safety without occupation; the growth of his fallow nature is apt to run to weeds.—Hilliard.

THE whole duty of man is embraced in the two principles of abstinence and patience; temperance in prosperity, and courage in adversity.—Seneca.

THE art of being able to make a good use of moderate abilities wins esteem, and often confers more reputation than real merit.—Rochefoucauld.

TEMPERANCE and labor are the two best physicians of man; labor sharpens the appetite, and temperance prevents him from indulging to excess.—Rousseau.

ABSENCE, like death, sets a seal on the image of those we hav loved; we cannot realize the intervening changes which time may hav effected.—Goldsmith.

TO CULTIVATE sympathy you must be among living creatures, and thinking about them; and to cultivate admiration you must be among beautiful things and looking at them.—Ruskin.

IT is hard to personate and act a part long; for where truth is not at the bottom, nature will always be endeavoring to return, and will peep out and betray herself one time or another.—Tillotson.

NO MAN is so foolish but he may giv another good counsel sometimes, and no man so wise but he may easily err if he takes no other counsel than his own. He that was taught only by himself had a fool for a master.—Ben Jonson.

BETTER that we should err in action than wholly refuse to perform. The storm is so much better than the calm as it declares the presence of a living principle. Stagnation is something worse than death. It is corruption also.—Simms.

THE abilities of a man must fall short on one side or the other, like too scanty a blanket when you are a-bed; if you pull it upon your shoulders, you leave your feet bare; if you thrust it down upon your feet, your shoulders are uncovered.—Sir W. Temple.

THERE is nothing so terrible as activity without insight, says Goethe. "I would open every one of Argus' hundred eyes before I used one of Briareus' hundred hands," says Lord Bacon. "Look before you leap," says John Smith, all over the world.—Whipple.

MAN is born for action; he ought to do something. Work at each step awakens a sleeping force and roots out error. Who does nothing, knows nothing. Rise! to work! If thy knowledge is real, employ it; wrestle with nature; test the strength of thy theories; see if they will support the trial. Act!—Alcuisius.

GARNER up pleasant thoughts in your mind; for pleasant thoughts make pleasant lives. Strive to see all you can of the good and the beautiful, so that bright, cheerful pictures may be impressed upon memory's tablets, and give you materials of which to think sunny and lovely thoughts.—Mrs. E. D. Slenker.

IN the material universe as a whole, we must hav all, potentially at least, that any of its parts, or all of them, may become, on the maxim that the whole must be equal to all the parts. Or, to use another illustration, if it is true that the fountain cannot rise higher than its source, it must also be true that there shall actually be a source behind the height to which it does rise. In man nature is raising intellect, as she raises the rice and the rose. We are rising slowly to the altitude of our source, and are doing for ourselves nothing more nor less than what it is the eternal necessity of the universe that we must do while we are as we are.—Charles Ellis.

THE religion of one age is often the poetry of the next. Around every living and operative faith there lies a region of allegory and of imagination into which opinions frequently pass, and in which they long retain a transfigured and idealized existence after their natural life has died away. They are, as it were, deflected. They no longer tell directly and forcibly upon human actions. They no longer produce terror, inspire hopes, awake passions, or mold the characters of men; yet they still exercise a kind of reflex influence, and form part of the ornamental culture of the age. They are turned into allegories. They are interpreted in a non-natural sense. They are invested with a fanciful, poetic, but most attractive garb. They follow instead of controlling the current of thought, and, being transformed by far-fetched and ingenious explanation, they become the embellishments of systems of belief that are wholly irreconcilable with their original tendencies. The gods of heathenism were thus translated from the sphere of religion to the sphere of poetry. The grotesque legends and the harsh doctrines of a superstitious faith are so explained away that they appear graceful myths foreshadowing and illustrating the conceptions of a higher day. For a time they flicker upon the horizon with a softly beautiful light that enchants the poet and sends a charm to the new system with which they are made to blend; but at last this too fades away. Religious ideas die like the sun; their last rays, possessing little heat, are expended in creating beauty.—Lecky.

Watchmaker.—"What did you giv for it?"

Customer.—"A swat over the head."

A CUNNING juryman addressed the clerk of the court when administering the oath, saying: "Speak up; I cannot hear what you say." "Stop; are you deaf?" asked the judge. "Yes, of one ear." "Then you may leave the box, for it is necessary that jurymen should hear both sides."

THE CATHOLIC LORD'S PRAYER.—Our Father which art in the Vatican, infallibility be thy name. Thy temporal sovereignty come, thy will be done here in America as 'tis done in Spain. Give us this day our tithes and titles, and grant us plenary indulgences as we pay penitently for them. Lead us not into thinking, but deliver us from the scientific, for thine is the crozier, the keys, and the tiara. Rome without end. Amen.

WHEN the triangle had called the meeting to order, Brother Gardener arose with his usual sleekness and said:

"Gem'len, if it wasn't for de wheels on a waggin the waggin wouldn't move. When de wheels am on, den what?"

"Grease," solemnly exclaimed the old man Toots."

"K-rect!" whispered the president, softly rubbing his hands together. "We haz de waggin and de wheels. We now pass de hat aroun' for de grease.—Detroit Free Press.

NEGRO LOGIC.—Old Pompey came down to the village the other day with a big brass watch-key prominently displayed from a shoe-string chain.

"Whar's your watch, Uncle Pomp?" asked a young nigger.

"Dun got none,"

"You ain't?"

"No chile."

"Den what fo' you 'kerry dat yere watch-key roun' so conspicuous?"

Old Pompey chuckled.

"Look here, chile," he said, "youse ain't no logician—got no head for de scientific side of matters. Do youse s'poze dat if I come down here a-totin' of a stable door dat it would be any sign dat I owned a hoss? De two cases am prezactly parallelogram, sah."

KING CHARLES AND HIS FOOL.—This good fellow's influence was so great that Charles, king of France, once remarked to him he thought that they had better change places. As Jean did not look well pleased at this proposal, Charles asked him if he were not content at the idea of being a king. "O, content enough," was the reply; "but I should be exceedingly ashamed at having such a fool!" It was this fool who once tried his master's nerve by rushing into his room one morning with the exclamation: "O, sire, such news! Four thousand men hav risen in the city!" "What?" cried the startled king. "With what intention hav they risen?" "Well," said Jean, placing his finger upon his nose, "probably with the intention of lying down again at bed time!"

"WHAT makes that noise?" asked a little boy in a train the other day.

"The cars," answered the mother.

"What for?"

"Because they are moving."

"What are they moving for?"

"The engine makes them."

"What engine?"

"The engine in front."

"What's it in front for?"

"To pull the train."

"What train?"

"This one."

"This car?" pursued the youngster, pointing to the one in which they sat.

"Yes."

"What does it pull it for?"

"The engineer makes it."

"What engineer?"

"The man on the engine."

"What engine?"

"The one in front."

"What's it in front for?"

"I told you that before."

"Told who what?"

"Told you."

"What for?"

"O, be still! You are a nuisance."

"What's a nuisance?"

"A boy who asks too many questions."

"Whose boy?"

"My boy."

"What questions?"

At this point the train pulled up at a station. The last that was heard, as the lady led the youngster along the platform, was: "What's tickets?"

THE TRUTH SEEKER

DEVOTED TO SCIENCE, MORALS, FREE THOUGHT AND HUMAN HAPPINESS

Vol. 5. No. 43. { PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT. } New York, Saturday, October 26, 1878. { SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY. } $3 per Year

Notes and Clippings.

A FRIEND of education—the free-knowledgist.

BARDWELL SLOTE sampled 1,600 bottles of wine in six days, and rested on the seventh.—Boston Post.

A WOMAN in Nebraska suffocated her baby by rolling over upon it in bed. What is home without a s-mother?

AFTER all, John Sherman is a pretty tough individual for a man that doesn't preach the gospel for a living.—Puck.

"FROM the spire of the Congregational church at Pawlet, Vt., 125 pounds of honey were recently taken."—Comb, now, that's a steepl-ittle story.—Puck.

IT was so dry in some parts of Japan last month that one of the governors knelt "a whole hour in prayer" for rain—and yet failed to break the drought.

EDISON has taken out 150 patents, but only 20 are considered by him to be of much importance. The rest were obtained to give added security to them.

THE youth who can eat a fifty-cent dinner every day on a two-dollar per week salary is the fellow who succeeds in life and sends his sons to college.—Puck.

INGERSOLL chooses very warm subjects for his lectures. Last year it was hell, this year it is Burns, and next year he will probably tell us something about the Skalds.—Norristown Herald.

IT is said that no Infidel works are published in the Welsh language, and that in no land is there so great a reverence for the Jewish Bible as in Wales. So much the worse for Wales and the Welsh. They hav much to learn yet.

THE chaplain of the Auburn Penitentiary denies that there are any clergymen among the prisoners at that place. Alas! is it any wonder that people exclaim that there is no justice in this country?—Philadelphia Kronikle-Herald.

A BOY of ten and a girl of eight eloped from Brookline, Mass., and went to Boston, where they soon got lost in the crooked streets. Their expectation was to get married and live in a fine house somewhere. The reality was a spanking.

PRUDENT ministers will make pastoral calls in the next few weeks. The cool season is upon us, and a minister is liable at any time to come upon a man who is putting up a stove, and surprise him in the midst of unorthodox remarks. —Breakfast Table.

THERE are charges of immorality against the Rev. W. M. Parry, of the Worcester (Mass.) Tabernacle, and his church has begun an investigation; but Mr. Parry has in several meetings insisted on presiding, and his rulings on points in his own case are declared to be not free from bias.

THE Rev. R. W. Rawson has been committed for trial at Peterborough Quarter Sessions, England, for stealing an overcoat, value £2, from a refreshment house, where he had obtained lodgings. He was not seen to take the coat, but he pledged it at a pawnbroker's in the city for 10s.

BROTHER MOODY says that during the coming winter he will giv six hours a day to study. If he should make it eight or ten he would not then hav any more information than thousands of his fellow-countrymen. It would be well for him if he would study works of science and truth, and giv theological absurdities a wide berth.

THE American Board of Foreign Missions has spent about $5,000,000 in its various missions in the Turkish Empire. It reports some conversions from some of the different sects in Turkey, but it is said that it has not yet reported the conversion of a single Mohammedan. That investment of $5,000,000 is probably one of the worst investments ever made.

A LIVELY discussion is now going on in several of the religious papers as to the moral standing of the young men who are at the theological seminaries preparing for the ministry. This was started in the columns of the Christian at Work by an article written by a clergyman to the effect that a sad proportion of these young men were no better than they ought to be, and, indeed, were as much addicted to ungodly practices as any of the college boys.

A CORRESPONDENT of a Paris journal informs his readers that thieves and murderers are often elected to the American Congress. He might also have written very truly that superintendents of Sunday-schools, and even preachers of the Gospel, not infrequently here become thieves and murderers, though the same is not generally supposed to interfere with their final "election."

THE Illinois Wesleyan Methodist has denounced the innocent game of croquet as a sin, and says that "the practice of it detracts from the glory of God and the salvation of souls." It would seem, then, that God ought to be the one to make complaint about the game, or those whose souls are lost by it. Probably if the game could only by some means be made to help pay the preacher's salaries it would be held up as the brightest of virtues.

IN the Congregational Association of Chicago a report was made that "a number of ministers' families are in distress bordering on starvation." Something ought to be done by our Christian friends for these suffering people. Preacher are now so poorly paid, and so many of them are now unemployed, that their wives and children are bound to suffer. Would it not be well for them to learn a better and more remunerative trade?

IT is said that this year's wheat crop will reach at least 400,000,000 bushels, while the corn crop will not fall far short, if any, of 1,300,000,000 bushels. Yet men and women will go hungry this winter in New York and in smaller American cities; some of them will starve to death in spite of the big crops. It is not a pleasant thing to think of that this should be possible in a country overflowing with plenty. Some day, perhaps, it will not be possible.

DISTURBANCES at funerals are becoming more common in England and more disagreeable. The latest is at Grimstone, a little village in Leicestershire. The corpse of a laborer's wife was refused admission to the churchyard for the reason that she had been a Methodist. The ritualistic rector who had excluded the body brought on himself a storm of disapprobation. On the following Sunday his church was almost deserted, and a crowd of villagers followed him on his way to and from the sacred edifice, making objectionable noises on tin kettles and other utensils.

AN educated Chinaman, Kwang Chang Ling, is writing letters to California journals, in which he contradicts many current ideas about China. He says that the population is only 100,000,000 or 120,000,000, instead of 450,000,000; that the country has reached the limit of agricultural development; that the population and prosperity hav been decreasing since 1761; that unless improved machinery and methods are adopted the people will not be able to support themselves; that the wealth of the empire is in the hands of the few, and that with a diminishing population and increasing wages at home, there can be no great tide of emigration to this country.

THE lighting of East Liverpool, Ohio, with natural gas from wells has been often briefly mentioned. The fact is, that the plan has been for many years in successful operation. The gas comes continuously and in large quantity from several deep wells, and is available not only for light, but for heat. For light it requires no preparation, but burns readily with great illuminating power. The flames in the street lamps are not put out in the daytime, because that would cost something, and the gas does not. Pipes carry the gas into grates and stoves, where it is used for heating and cooking. The first gas well was opened twenty years ago, and its supply is not yet in the least diminished.

WHAT happened at the negro church at Lynchburgh, Wednesday evening, is liable to happen in any one of fifty New York churches before the winter is over. With cold weather the revival season begins. As the meetings increase in interest, the congregation overflows from the pews into the narrow aisles and the open spaces around the pulpit and the doors. As a rule, the churches which are most densely thronged at these seasons are the smaller and cheaper ones, in which accidents are most likely to happen, and in which the means of exit are not of the best. Let an accident occur, or let a false alarm be given, and unless the preacher is a man of great presence of mind and has a controlling voice, loss of life is inevitable. Keep the aisles clear. Better turn tardy saints or sinners away from the church doors than expose them and the earlier comers to the risk of a horrible death inside.

THE earliest notice of yellow fever is that of Ligon, in his "History of Barbadoes." He there states that it broke out early in September, 1648, and that before the expiration of a month "the living were scarcely able to bury the dead." Thereafter it did not attain any very remarkable severity until 1793, when it destroyed not less than 6,000 men of the garrison of Port Royal in the course of a few months. In 1804 it was brought to the south of Spain, and visited Cadiz, Malaga, and Carthagena. But its greatest force fell upon Gibraltar, where, out of the civil population of the town, amounting to nearly 14,000 persons, only twenty-eight escaped attack.

THE American Home Missionary Society is nearly $30,000 in arrears to its missionaries. The receipts in the financial half year closing Sept. 30 were $13,000 less than in the corresponding period of 1877, there being a large falling off in legacies. A card from the Secretaries and the Treasurer makes urgent appeal for immediate cash relief, and says that if it does not come disaster to the cause will ensue. This card adds: "All the missionaries are put to serious inconvenience, some to actual suffering. More will suffer if not paid before winter opens. In some of the fields that will be in less that a month. The good name of many is imperiled by reason of debts incurred for the food and clothing essential to life." Some of these unpaid missionaries hav already been forced to leave their fields of labor, and others inform the officials that they cannot hold out longer than a few weeks if not relieved.

A VAST LAYER OF HUGE BONES.—A party of laborers under the superintendence of C. A. Currier of this city were engaged in making a large excavation upon the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad, about one and one-half miles west of Denison, Ga., in obtaining gravel for the purpose of making extensive repairs of the road near that place. They had reached a depth of about fifteen feet, when they came upon a vast accumulation of bones, which, as the work proceeded, they continued to find along the entire line of the excavation for a distance of nearly 2,000 feet. The bones lie in a bed of gravel, and the strata in every direction seem to be full of them. Some of them, particularly the teeth, are in an excellent state of preservation; others, upon being exposed to the atmosphere, quickly crumble and fall to pieces. They are all of remarkable size, and could hav belonged to no animal now living. Some of the teeth which hav been found weigh over eight pounds and measure over a foot in circumference. No effort has been made to collect the bones with a view to their preservation, and no scientific investigation has been attempted to determine their character.—Chicago Tribune.

THE care of the eyes is urged by Arthur Chevalier in a new French work. The use of the eyes, he says, should be regulated by their strength, and they should never be overtaxed. A habit of resting them often during work is recommended. Thus in reading or writing stop from time to time and allow the eyes to wander over surrounding objects. To persist in working after symptoms of fatigue appear is foolish. As soon as the eyes begin to itch, or grow red, or any pain is felt in the eyeballs, work should be discontinued and cold water applied. Do not pass suddenly from darkness into bright light. Artificial lights are all injurious. The author adds: "If a person cannot tear himself away from close work, he can at least vary his occupation. Let him close his eyes from time to time, and take a turn around his room, or, what is better, take a walk in the fresh air; this, even if it be but for a few minutes only, will do him a great deal of good. Let him who once becomes convinced that he is putting too much confidence in his eyes take care to abstain from all confining work immediately after rising, after meals, or by artificial light. Let him wash his eyes often during the day with cold water—a remedy which, although simple in itself, never fails in every case to produce good effects. Baths of tepid water are injurious to the eyes."

LORD DUFFERIN, ex-Governor General of Canada, has sailed for England.

THE firm of Stagle Brothers, of Greenfield, Ohio, has failed for $120,000. Assets, ten per cent.

BY a railway collision in England, on Saturday last, twelve persons were killed and twenty injured.

TOBIN, the condemned soldier, has had his death-sentence commuted by the President to five years' imprisonment.

TWELVE persons were killed in a church panic at Lynchburg, Va., on the 16th, and twenty or thirty others will die of their injuries.

THE Rev. Mr. Kraemer, of St. Stephen's church, Newark, has lost his easy job in the pulpit; cause, being drunk and disorderly.

THE rinderpest has broken out among the cows in the vicinity of Washington, and the epizootic has made its appearance in Newark, N.J.

THE Russian Government is making preparations to try 340 Nihilists at Odessa. This society appears to grow stronger through persecution.

THE principal American officials connected with the Paris Exposition hav received the decoration of the Legion of Honor from the French Government.

ONE of the irrigating canals of the Nile gave way recently, flooding 80,000 acres of land and destroying fifteen villages. Ten thousand men are at work building a new one.

A PARTY of twenty-five Indians crossed from Mexico into New Mexico, several days ago, and killed three ranchmen and an expressman between Silver City and Globe City.

AT last the early frosts hav made their appearance in the South, and it is hoped that that divine or devilish infliction of a loving God, the yellow fever, will soon be at an end.

THE late gales played havoc on both sides of the Atlantic. Many vessels were wrecked on the British coast and the Channel islands, and quite a number were dismasted or sunk at sea.

ADMIRAL PAULDING, the last surviving officer of the battle of Plattsburg Bay, died on the morning of Sunday, the 20th. He was a son of John Paulding, one of the three captors of Major Andre.

AT a wedding feast at Azalia, Indiana, one night last week, ten of the party were poisoned by partaking of food in which strychnine had been placed, it is supposed, by a disappointed suitor of the bride.

KEYPORT, N. J., has a church war. Part of the congregation of the Reformed church hav seceded—on account of trouble between the pastor and an elder—and gone over in a body to the Presbyterian faith.

THE Edison Electric Light Company has been incorporated in this city. It will make use of Edison's recent inventions for lighting streets and buildings. The gas companies begin to tremble at the prospect.

A CHRISTIANIZED Chinaman recently entered a Chinese temple in Portland, Oregon, and proceeded to despoil one of the sacred images of its ornaments. He was promptly hatcheted and shot by the enraged Celestials for his impious sacrilege.

THE managers of the defunct City of Glasgow Bank hav been arrested on the charge of fraud and are now in prison. The whole loss, $30,000,000, falls on the stockholders. One of the swindlers is President of the Glasgow Young Men's Christian Association; another presented many thousands of dollars to the Church, all of which was stolen; another of these rascals was so pious that he would not read a newspaper that was printed on Sunday, and endeavored to hav the strictest Sunday laws enforced; and, in fact, they appear to hav been a lot of pious, ultra-religious, Christian thieves, and they piously divided their plunder with the Church. The question now is, Will the Church return the money received from these "followers of the Lamb," now that it is proved to hav been stolen?

"Yes, and now it's your turn," said Rose. "And I've only a reply I wrote to a reverend who sent me a sharp article (as he thought) concerning some of our dead Infidel heroes," said Myra.

"I do think it is real mean of Christians to get up such falsehoods about Infidels as they do in the pulpit and in their pious papers. They turn and twist the most innocent actions of good men, and then color them up and add untruth here and there till an awful crime against morality is made to appear; then it is tracted, preached up, and fulminated from every church organ in the country. It does seem hard that a man must be made to appear vile and criminal simply because he cannot believe what to him seems incredible. And if we Infidels go to work and hunt up evidences, proofs, and facts, and kill all these scandals dead, it will be but a few years, or may be months, ere they are again resurrected by some one who is more zealous than wise or scrupulous, and again the story is published and sent on its rounds, only to be again refuted, nailed, and killed. There are few living Infidels who have not suffered from misrepresentation and wilful slander, but they can live it down, or bring living witnesses of its falsehood, while our dead heroes must have their bright records stained, tarnished, and blurred all over with foul slimes, and we able to do so little to defend them. The pulpit has aptly been called "the coward's castle." And pious publications know too well that Infidel defense once admitted to their columns, few chances would be left for sensational incidents concerning Infidels; and they realize also that hell destroyed, and Infidels really moral, would knock the props from under godology at once.

"But girls, I'll get my breath again and then read you what has so excited me; here is the article in The Christian Review—Bro. Franklin's pious Ohio paper. And this stuff is about as true as were his tales of converted Infidels that he used to rehearse to his hearers when he was at this place a few years ago, and the author carefully hides his identity under the general name "A Disciple." Of Hume he can only say that the old philosopher gives utterance to this sentiment: 'Doubt, uncertainty, and suspense of judgment appear the only result of our most accurate scrutiny concerning this subject,' i. e., the future life. And this is certainly fair and honest reasoning. Had Hume lived till to-day, he would have advanced into pure Atheism, and felt that 'one world at a time' was enough. And one was all that it needed man to know of. Of Rousseau he writes: 'He eulogized Christ,' and said 'The life and death of Jesus were those of a God.'

"This may be true, and if it be, it only proves the man was not a real unbeliever when he said it, and perhaps at no time. Many are Infidels in the eyes of the pious who only doubt certain points of doctrine and yet accept a God, and even the son of a God as real identities. Hobbs says, 'I am about to take a leap in the dark.' Is not that what every Christian does? All who are not certain in their own minds concerning the future, 'take a leap in the dark.' Those who are certain, may be all wrong, but yet not feel that they are 'in the dark.' Fancy and feeling are all the difference. Two travelers are journeying towards an unknown island. One believes it to be a perfect paradise, the other thinks it only a common, every-day world, while a third comes from the opposite direction, and believes there is no island at all. A pilot-boat (Death on board) meets them, blindfolds each in turn, then takes them shoreward. The first leaps from the boat full of faith, hope, and belief; he finds what? According to his belielf a heaven. According to the belief of No. 2, a world similar to this; and No. 3 ends all in eternal oblivion. It is really 'a leap in the dark' for them all, though in fact the Infidel has philosophy, reason, common sense, and negative proof all on his side. The world has been measured, its oceans explored and thoroughly canvassed, till scientific research proves there is really no room for such an island (a heaven), and no place in all the wide domains where such a vast region could be located.

"The dying Paine said to his female attendant, 'If ever the devil had an agent on earth, I have been one.' And when this woman was asked what she thought of the 'Age of Reason,' she answered, that, 'from a conviction of its evil tendency she had burned it,' and Paine replied, 'I wish all its readers had been as wise.' Now all this is pure calumny. The real friends of Paine deny it, and prove that women were hired and bribed to tell these lies. Living witnesses can swear to this as a fact. And if Paine ever called on the Lord or Jesus in his death agony to help him, it may have been done as many now call upon Jupiter, and swear by that heathen deity; though why should not Paine call upon God when he did believe in a wise, kind, beneficent creator? He was no Atheist, but a pure Deist, who reverenced his God too highly to believe him guilty of all the vile actions and deeds the Bible writers ascribe to him. Again, when a man is crazed with pain or insane, he might use the 'played-out' expression of his youth from weakness or loss of reason. The dying often babble of childish things, and are, in fancy, once more children in thought and feeling.

"As to all this tirade about Madame Bonneville, they are proved lies. She went to law about the calumny, and got damages too, though the judge himself 'thought the lies were useful though false,' 'on account of the religious opinions of Paine, which were thus discouraged.' If a Christian judge can in this way prejudice a jury against known facts because he thinks the false statements will advance the cause of Christ, what may we not expect from penny-a-liners all over the world? But the day has come when all beliefs are being tested in the crucible of science, and only fact and truth will come out victorious and triumphant."

"I guess your pa has not made much off of you this time," said Edith; "but come in, girls, mother signals that supper is ready."

CHAPTER XVI.

"December comes! The last, the worst,
The latest of the twelve is here;
I list its moan, I hear its shriek—
The requiem of the dying year.
Ply well the fire—peace dwells within—
And hearts of friends are closer knit,
As gath'ring in bright festive groups
Around the cheerful blaze they sit."

THE four allotted months have passed away and once more our lively, cheery little band of Liberals have met together according to promise, at Rose Hill Mansion, and are seated by the cozy, cheerful fire of the open grate in Edith's pleasant little sitting-room. Social, kindly greetings have been exchanged and bits of neighborhood gossip discussed, and at last came a lull in the chatter of busy tongues, and Edith brought in a great pan of rosy-cheeked apples and a plate of pears. When these had done full duty toward satisfying the healthy young appetites, Myra spoke up and said, "Now, Rose, please give us your experience as disseminator of facts vs. fiction and reality vs. myths, and let us know how you have succeeded in converting Mr. Lusk from the error of his ways."

"Well," said Rose, smiling, "I think I have no reason to be dissatisfied. Four months is not long to work in, but as I told you before, I had already prepared the way by lending him TRUTH SEEKERS and tracts, and so after our agreement I went at it in good earnest and got him to read 'Graves' Crucified Saviors,' Bennett's various discussions, and 'Volney's Ruins,' and by that time he did not need any more help. He has improved rapidly since he has had time to study, and all his family have gone along with him. He subscribed for THE TRUTH SEEKER last week, and one year of that will eliminate the last particle of theology and mythology from his mind that is now remaining in it. But I did not stop with Mr. Lusk, for I started up a correspondence with a lady and a gentleman besides. The latter is a preacher, and so my correspondence with him is really improving to me, as he is well posted on his side, and can therefore all the better comprehend my arguments, and see when his are demolished. I will give you just one page of my reply to his last letter for a sample as to how our correspondence is progressing and what we talk about. You will see that I use Quaker phraseology somewhat, having been used to writing that way more or less all my life." And thus saying, Rose read as follows:

"Friend David, thee says: 'You laud "Tom Paine," and yet he can surely be convicted of knowing deception, if not of downright lying from his own book.'

"Now if this be so, will thee please tell me where it may be found?"

"I have always believed Mr. Paine to be better than the average of men—purer, nobler, and far less selfish. I have esteemed him as one who scorned to lie, and who was willing to sacrifice much for what he believed to be truth."

"If I can be convinced by any proof of thine that he was not morally good and true, I shall cease to praise his character henceforward and forever. True, that will not affect his statement as regards the Bible or religion, but it will go far to show that he was quite fallible in his own person; still I doubt very much thy ability to do what thee offers to do, that is, 'show this to be so.' Thee says, 'If Paine be a liar or deceiver, why do you praise him?"

"'If,' there is the point. I think it is all, and nothing else, so I wait for proof. I would no sooner indorse the character of a bad Infidel than I would that of a bad Christian, and I believe I would sooner see the former go to the wall from very shame of having snch ones found in our ranks. I never indorsed or in any way encouraged Mr. Wilbur after I believed him guilty of falsehood. I admired his ideas upon some subjects, but despised the man. I am personally acquainted with some Infidels whose lives are not moral or good; and I have no more charity for the shortcomings of these than I have for those of Christians who do not believe theologically as I do."

The Influence of Christianity on Civilization.

In the United States the growth of Liberal opinions during the past fifty years has been very rapid, and their influence is generally felt. The orthodox churches are made up largely of members that are ashamed of the written creed of their denomination. The connection of no small number in the churches everybody knows is from motives of policy and prudence. A Christian congregation of this day is not such as the clergy spoke to a few years ago; but, as Rev. George Gilfillan remarks, "An assembly, part of whom have come to sleep, another part to recreate their eyes by staring, a fourth part perhaps to reap benefit, and another fourth to enjoy the refined sensuality of listening to eloquence, or the still dearer luxury of finding fault. Taking audiences and ministers as a class, they are both far happier to part than to meet" (Christianity and our Era).

The Church is a conventional standard of "respectability," and it offers certain social advantages not elsewhere to be found in our present transitional stage of belief. This consideration, with many minds long since freed from the trammels of theology, makes them give their influence, more or less, to sustain church organizations. And this will continue until Liberals, by organization, show their strength and offer as many social advantages as the Church possesses. In time, I have no doubt, the churches will drop their creeds and their senseless ceremonies, and be still sustained with all the good features that they now possess. There is to-day, perhaps, about as much Infidelity in the Church as outside. Many of the orthodox clergy keep their theology to themselves, knowing that the people are tired of it. But comparatively few believe now all that the Bible plainly teaches. The most revolting portions of the Christian theology have been generally abandoned.

Liberal views have assumed a variety of phases. In the past, Universalism, an inconsistent though amiable form of Christianity, has been to thousands a stepping-stone from the evangelical theology to the position of the Infidel. With such representatives as Rev. Dr. Miner, of Boston, it has, however, ceased to be a Liberalizing agency. The orthodox denominations are progressive; Universalism has become fossilized, and its growth and development are no longer possible. Unitarianism is a "mild type of Infidelity," and its talent and culture are all on the side of the army of progress. Modern Spiritualism has contributed to destroy confidence in the old theology. Its teachings have gone into the pulpit and pews alike, and thousands who do not relish the name have, in reality, accepted the thing. The Free Religious Movement, led on by cultivated and earnest minds, like Frothingham, Abbot, and Higginson, is gaining strength rapidly, and shows how dissatisfied the people are with the creeds of the churches, and how ready they are to accept more advanced religious views. Materialism, which recognizes no other god than Nature, no better worship than work, no better religion than morality, no "other life" than this, is the belief of no small number in this country as well as in Europe, and it is making its influence felt among thoughtful minds of every class. It has among its friends some of the most profound and cultivated minds of the age. The masses, although they can give but scanty attention to scientific and philosophical questions, have caught the spirit of the age, and are thinking less about God and more about themselves, inquiring less as to what they shall do to be "saved" in another world, and asking more how they can add to their comfort and prosperity in this world.

Our literature is comparatively Liberal. Indeed its Infidel tendencies are the lament of the pulpit and religious press. The best magazines in the country are objects of frequent attack by the evangelical press for the heterodox character of many of their contributions and editorials. The secular press is chiefly in the hands and under the control of men who have outgrown the whole Christian theology. If they show it respect it is not because they have any love or sympathy for it, but because it has been sanctioned by the faith and piety of millions, and because it is yet nominally the religion of the people for whom they write. The great majority of professional men are undoubtedly Freethinkers. Rev. Theodore Cuyler, some time ago, raised the query, "Why is a lawyer rarely seen at a prayer-meeting?" Physicians, as a class, are Infidels. And as the Scotch minister Gilfillan says, "When a scientific man is at the same time a babe at the feet of Christ, he is judged an exception to the general rule, and stared at as a prodigy." The public advocates of Freethought now speak in the best halls, and to larger audiences in the West than the clergy can get to hear their sermons. And the Liberal cause is gaining strength every day.

A few years ago the N. Y. Evangelist had the frankness and candor to admit that, "among all the earnest-minded young men who are at this moment leading in thought and action in America, we venture to say that four-fifths are skeptical of the great historical facts of Christianity. What is told as Christian doctrine by the churches claims none of their consideration, and there is among them a general distrust of the clergy, as a class, and an utter disgust with the very aspect of modern Christianity and of church worship. This skepticism is not flippant; little is said about it. It is not a peculiarity alone of Radicals and fanatics; most of them are men of calm and even balance of mind, and belong to no class of ultraists. It is not worldly and selfish. Nay, the doubters lead in the bravest and most self-denying enterprises of the day."

Rev. Dr. Newman, of Washington, in a recent address, reported in a secular paper, said: "Within the next decade, ay, within the next five years, Christianity will be tried as it has never been tried before. There are men in England and America to-day who will bring to the assault a ripeness of scholarship, a power of intellect, and a breadth of view unequaled by the past, and there are men and women before me to-night who are destined to have their faith terribly shaken."

Thus we see the nations, which are accorded the first rank as regards enlightenment and prosperity, and the comparatively elevated condition of which is so frequently mentioned to prove that Christianity and progress go hand in hand, are the very nations in which Christianity has suffered the greatest decline, and in which unbelief is now the most widely diffused.

The friends of Infidelity have reason to feel proud of the influence which their principles have exerted. "The first nation in Europe," says T. W. Higginson very justly, "that abolished slavery in the colonies (France in 1793) did in the same session abolish Christianity, and when Christianity was restored slavery came back also." Freethinkers generally supported the antislavery movement in this country long before it became popular, and when the clergy and Bible believers were quoting Scripture in its favor. When no pulpit in Boston was open to Garrison for an antislavery speech, and when he had tried in vain to get a hall, Abner Kneeland, the honored founder of the brave old Boston Investigator, opened his hall to the distinguished Abolitionist and told him to occupy the desk. The cause of Women's Rights was "cradled in Infidelity." Those who are now interested in this just and noble movement, and who are encouraged by the indications of its ultimate success, should not forget the names of Mary Woolstonecraft, Frances Wright, and Earnestine L. Rose, the fearless pioneers of the cause, who with a few others were pointing out the disadvantages and disabilities under which women labored when the clergy were everywhere quoting St. Paul to show that submission is woman's first duty, and that the measures which were advocated by the persons named were Infidel in their character and degrading in their tendency.

Nearly twenty years ago the N. Y. Independent said: "To the shame of the Church it must be confessed that the foremost in all our philanthropic movements, in the interpretation of the spirit of the age, in the practical application of genuine Christianity, in the reformation of abuses in high and in low places, in the vindication of the rights of man, and in practically redressing his wrongs in the intellectual and moral regeneration of the race, are the so-called Infidels in our land. The Church has pusillanimously left, not only the working oar, but the very reins of salutary reform in the hands of men she denounces as inimical to Christianity, and who are practically doing with all their might for humanity's sake what the Church ought to be doing for Christ's sake; and if they succeed, as succeed they will, in abolishing slavery, banishing rum, restraining licentiousness, reforming abuses, and elevating the masses, then must the recoil on Christianity be disastrous. Woe, woe, woe, to Christianity when Infidels by the force of nature, or the tendency of the age, get ahead of the Church in morals, and in the practical work of Christianity. In some instances they are already far in advance. In the vindication of truth, righteousness, and liberty, they are the pioneers, beckoning to a sluggish Church to follow in the rear."

Rev. J. W. Carter, vicar of All Saints, Stratford, England, says, in a recent number of Lloyd's Newspaper: "The Republican and Infidel walk hand in hand, sowing broadcast the seeds of their pernicious doctrines. . . . Some in high places openly advocate Republican principles and sneer at the theory of a constitutional monarchy in this Liberal, enlightened nineteenth century, as an anachronism. Privileged classes, they advise, should be abolished, and the power of government delegated to the people. Faith is to give place to intellect, God to man. Is it a matter of surprise that many of our lower classes imitating the fashion of their betters, should be deeply imbued with this false teaching, and inclined to skepticism of stronger flavor? When some in authority hear with approving ears Rationalism delivered from the pulpit, and read with pleased attention, of science subverting all gospel truths, can we wonder at the uneducated cordially embracing the socialistic tenets of communism."

The Doctrine of Filiation, or Descent-Theory.

BY PROF. ERNST HAECKEL.

CHAPTER XV.

PEDIGREE AND HISTORY OF THE KINGDOM OF THE PROTISTA.

By a careful comparison of the individual and the palæontological development, as also by the comparative anatomy of organisms, by the comparative examination of their fully developed structural characteristics, we arrive at the knowledge of the degrees of their different structural relationships. By this, however, we at the same time obtain an insight into their true blood relationship, which, according to the Theory of Descent, is the real reason of the structural relationship. Hence, by collecting, comparing, and employing the empirical results of embryology, palæontology, and anatomy for supplementing each other, we arrive at an approximate knowledge of the "Natural System," which, according to our views, is the pedigree of organisms. It is true that our human knowledge, in all things fragmentary, is especially so in this case, on account of the extreme incompleteness and defectiveness of the records of creation. However, we must not allow this to discourage us, or to deter us from undertaking this highest problem of biology. Let us rather see how far it may even now be possible, in spite of the imperfect state of our embryological, palæontological, and anatomical knowledge, to establish a probable scheme of the genealogical relationships of organisms.

Darwin, in his book, gives us no answer to these special questions of the Theory of Descent; at the conclusion he only expresses his conjecture "that animals have descended from at most only four or five progenitors, and plants from an equal or less number." But as these few aboriginal forms still show traces of relationship, and as the animal and vegetable kingdoms are connected by intermediate transitional forms, he arrives afterwards at the opinion "that probably all the organic beings which have ever lived on the earth have descended from some one primordial form, into which life was first breathed by the Creator." Like Darwin, all other adherents of the Theory of Descent have only treated it in a general way, and not made the attempt to carry it out specially, and to treat the "Natural System" actually as the pedigree of organisms. If, therefore, we venture upon this difficult undertaking, we must take up independent ground.

Four years ago I set up a number of hypothetical genealogies for the larger groups of organisms in the systematic introduction to my General History of Development (Gen. Morph. vol. ii), and thereby, in fact, made the first attempt actually to construct the pedigrees of organisms in the manner required by the theory of development. I was quite conscious of the extreme difficulty of the task, and as I undertook it in spite of all discouraging obstacles, I claim no more than the merit of having made the first attempt and given a stimulus for other and better attempts. Probably most zoologists and botanists were but little satisfied with this beginning, and least so in reference to the special domain in which each one is specially at work. However, it is certainly in this case much easier to blame than to produce something better; and what best proves the immense difficulty of this infinitely complicated task is the fact that no naturalist has as yet supplied the place of my pedigrees by better ones. But, like all other scientific hypotheses which serve to explain facts, my genealogical hypotheses may claim to be taken into consideration until they are replaced by better ones.

I hope that this replacement will very soon take place; and I wish for nothing more than that my first attempt may induce very many naturalists to establish more accurate pedigrees for the individual groups, at least in the special domain of the animal and vegetable kingdom, which happens to be well known to one or other of them. By numerous attempts of this kind, our genealogical knowledge, in the course of time, will slowly advance and approach more and more towards perfection, although it can with certainty be foreseen that we shall never arrive at a complete pedigree. We lack, and shall ever lack, the indispensable palæontological foundations. The most ancient records will ever remain sealed to us, for reasons which have been previously mentioned. The most ancient organisms which arose by spontaneous generation—the original parents of all subsequent organisms—must necessarily be supposed to have been Monera—simple, soft, albuminous lumps, without structure, without any definite forms, and entirely without any hard and formed parts. They and their next offspring were consequently not in any way capable of being preserved in a petrified condition. But we also lack, for reasons discussed in detail in the preceding chapter, by far the greater portion of the innumerable palæontological documents, which are really requisite for a safe reconstruction of the history of animal tribes, or phylogeny, and for the true knowledge of the pedigree of organisms. If we, therefore, in spite of this, venture to undertake their hypothetical construction, we must chiefly depend for guidance on the two other series of records which most essentially supplement the palæontological archives. These are ontogeny and comparative anatomy.

If thoughtfully and carefully we consult these most valuable records, we at once perceive what is exceedingly significant, namely, that by far the greater number of organisms, especially all higher animals and plants, are composed of a great number of cells, and that they originate out of an egg, and that this egg, in animals as well as in plants, is a single, perfectly simple cell—a little lump of albuminous constitution, in which another albuminous corpuscle, the cell-kernel, is inclosed. This cell containing its kernel grows and becomes enlarged. By division it forms an accumulation of cells, and out of these, by division of labor (as has previously been described), there arise the numberless different forms which are presented to us in the fully developed animal and vegetable species. This immensely important process—which we may follow step by step, with our own eyes, any day in the embryological development of any animal or vegetable individual, and which, as a rule, is by no means considered with the reverence it deserves—informs us more surely and completely than all petrifactions could do as to the original palæontological development of all many-celled organisms, that is, of all higher animals and plants. For as ontogeny, or the embryological development of every single individual, is essentially only a recapitulation of phylogeny, or the palæontological development of its chain of ancestors, we may at once, with full assurance, draw the simple and important conclusion, that all many-celled animals and plants were originally derived from single celled organisms. The primeval ancestors of man, as well as of all other animals, and of all plants composed of many cells, were simple cells living isolated. This invaluable secret of the organic pedigree is revealed to us with infallible certainty by the egg of animals, and by the true egg-cell of plants. When the opponents of the Theory of Descent assert it to be miraculous and inconceivable that an exceedingly complicated many-celled organism could, in the course of time, have proceeded from a simple single-celled organism, we at once reply that we may see this incredible miracle at any moment, and follow it with our own eyes. For the embryology of animals and plants visibly presents to our eyes in the shortest space of time the same process as that which has taken place in the origin of the whole tribe during the course of enormous periods of time.

Upon the ground of embryological records, therefore, we can with full assurance maintain that all many-celled, as well as single-celled, organisms are originally descended from simple cells; connected with this, of course, is the conclusion that the most ancient root of the animal and vegetable kingdom was common to both. For the different primeval "original cells" out of which the few different main groups or tribes have developed, only acquired their differences after a time, and were descended from a common "primeval cell." But where did those few "original cells," or the one primeval cell, come from? For the answer to this fundamental genealogical question we must return to the theory of plastids and the hypothesis of spontaneous generation which we have already discussed.

As was then shown, we cannot imagine cells to have arisen by spontaneous generation, but only Monera, those primeval creatures of the simplest kind conceivable, like the still living Protamœbæ, Protomyxæ, etc. Only such corpuscles of mucus without component parts—whose whole albuminous body is as homogeneous in itself as an inorganic crystal, but which nevertheless fulfils the two organic fundamental functions of nutrition and propagation—could have directly arisen out of inorganic matter by autogeny at the beginning (we may suppose) of the Laurentian period. While some Monera remained at the original simple stage of formation, others gradually developed into cells by the inner kernel of the albuminous mass becoming separated from the external cell-substance. In others, by differentiation of the outermost layer of the cell-substance, an external covering (membrane, or skin) was formed round simple cytods (without kernel), as well as round naked cells (containing a kernel). By these two processes of separation in the simple primeval mucus of the Moneron body, by the formation of a kernel in the interior and a covering on the outer surface of the mass of plasma, there arose out of the original most simple cytods, or Monera, those four different species of plastids, or individuals, of the first order, from which, by differentiation and combination, all other organisms could afterwards develop themselves.

The question now forces itself upon us, Are all organic cytods and cells, and consequently also those "original cells" which we previously considered to be the primary parents of the few great main groups of the animal and vegetable kingdoms, descended from a single original form of Moneron, or were there several different organic primary forms, each traceable to a peculiar independent species of Moneron which originated by spontaneous generation? In other words, Is the whole organic world of a common origin, or does it owe its origin to several acts of spontaneous generation? This fundamental question of genealogy seems at first sight to be of exceeding importance. But on a more accurate examination, we shall soon see that this is not the case, and that it is in reality a matter of very subordinate importance.

Repeal! Repeal! Repeal!

It is clear that the editor of The Index sees, as never before, the force of the adage that there is a point at which forbearance ceases to be a virtue. When, soon after the arrests of Messrs. Bennett and Heywood, the earnest agitation for the repeal of the obscenity laws began, Mr. Abbot attempted first to pass it by in silence, and then to discourage it by warning the Liberals of the damage which their reputation for morality would suffer at the hands of the conservative classes if they ventured to oppose laws for the protection of the people's purity. But the agitation has gone on, nevertheless, developing an alarming strength, until Mr. Abbot has discovered that competitors hav entered for this race of human progress of fleeter foot than he, and that he must either cripple them or be distanced and counted out altogether. And so, at last, the Liberal League is to face the issue. A call has been published for its second annual Congress, to be held at Syracuse on the 26th and 27th of October, urging the election of delegates with especial reference to this obscenity question; President Abbot and three other prominent officers publicly offer themselves for re-election on a platform which asserts the right of the United States Government to inquire into the moral character of the matter deposited in its mails; the New York members of the League hav been indicted at the bar of Liberal opinion for conspiracy and treason, simply because they desire to place the League under new and better guidance, by the regular methods prescribed in its Constitution; and the heaviest guns of The Index artillery hav been brought into position, and are being fired at weekly intervals into the camp of the repealers, and all this under a new banner, bearing the alluring but delusive watchword, "Reform." The campaign is opened, and promises to be "short, sharp, and decisive;" but it is one in which we, unfortunately, can take no part. We hav never been able to join the League, for the very reason that its platform, from the start, has contained planks every whit as hostile to liberty as the new one now proposed. For ourselves, looking at the matter from the standpoint of consistency, we know of no reason why an organization which favors compulsory taxation and compulsory education, should not favor compulsory morality and purity as well. But, as a matter of tendency, we heartily sympathize with that wing of the League which desires the elimination of absolutism even from one department of public affairs.

Still, as an outsider, and in view of the fact that Mr. Abbot has cited us as representative of the "clear," "self consistent," and "logical" repealers, we may, without meddling, examine some of his positions. And, first of all, it occurs to us to ask him why, in attacking the repealers, he devotes so many columns to exposing the fallacies of the "inconsistent" party, and only one or two short paragraphs to dislodging the unterrified repealers from their main position. His course is intelligible only on the hypothesis that he cares more about his re-election to the Presidency of the League than about substantiating his opposition to the repeal of the obnoxious laws. But, be this as it may, the only argument which he addresses to us is one which we hav answered already. After quoting the platform which we keep standing at the head of these columns, he comments upon it as follows:

"The 'freedom of the press' must share the limitations of all other freedom; namely, that no man shall use his freedom so as to infringe upon the equal rights of others. Hence libel is forbidden by law, without any violation of the freedom of the press, because libel is a crime against the personal rights of the person libeled. We hold it to be no less a crime to mail really obscene literature to school children—a crime at once against the children, their parents, and society itself; and we therefore hold that to punish criminals of this disgusting class involves not the slightest violation of the freedom of the press."

This passage indicates plainly that Mr. Abbot neglected to read the explanation and defense of our platform which accompanied its first publication. We reproduce it from our August number, and submit that, until it is satisfactorily answered, the repeal position remains unimpaired.

"Advocates of the repeal of obscenity laws are often met with the remark: 'But there is a limit even to freedom of speech.' Certainly, we answer; and a very clearly defined limit too. Under that theory of government which restricts its province to the protection of persons and property from invasion and direct injury, there are only three offenses of tongue or pen of which the law can properly take cognizance—slander, perjury, and forgery. These, being direct encroachments on personal rights, are punishable; but we can imagine at this moment no other offense, capable of being committed by tongue or pen, which can be placed, with any show of reason, in the same category. Indecent utterances and the advocacy of immoral doctrines certainly cannot. Injurious to public morals these may be, and doubtless are; invasive of individual rights they are not, and cannot be. Protection of public morals is not one of the functions of government. The true corrective for the evils of obscenity does not lie in necessarily ineffectual attempts at legal suppression, but in such education of the youthful mind as will fortify it against the corrupting influence of indecency in all its forms. These are the considerations which lead us to stand squarely on the platform announced at the head of our editorial columns."

Subsequently, Mr. Abbot makes an unsuccessful attempt to paraphrase our platform by calling it the negative statement of the following affirmative proposition:

"Freedom of the press covers and includes the legal right to publish, circulate, and mail real obscenity—the legal right of moral monsters to thrust the most nauseating, abominable, and pestilential filth upon the public, at all times and in all ways, yet with absolute impunity."

If our interpreter had stopped at the end of the first clause, we should not hav objected to his statement; but when, for "publish, circulate, and mail," he dextrously substitutes "thrust upon," we protest decidedly against such rhetorical legerdemain. We hav long admired Mr. Abbot as a skilful editorial gymnast, and an agile ground-and-lofty tumbler; but we prefer to see him turn his somersaults upon other premises than ours. To "thrust" anything upon anybody, be the article thrust obscene or not, is an invasion of individual rights, and punishable as such; but to "mail" is not to "thrust upon." If it is, then Mr. Abbot should be punished whenever he mails an unrequested sample copy of The Index, or a circular advertising the same; if it is not, then the law should not interfere with the detestable obscenity-venders of Nassau and Holywell streets. The crime consists, not in the obscenity, but in the thrusting.

Lest some readers of The Index may be led by Mr. Abbot's statements into the mistake of believing that we do not accept the grounds on which Mr. T. B. Wakeman (Mr. Abbot's chosen representative of the "inconsistent" repealers) bases his opposition to the obscenity laws, we desire to say that we regard his Faneuil Hall argument, from a constitutional point of view, absolutely unanswerable. His point, that Congress cannot constitutionally exclude matter from the mails except for postal purposes and reasons, Mr. Abbot does not venture to dispute, but only affects to disdain it in view of the counter-decision of that august tribunal, the United States Supreme Court. How long since respect for authority, regardless of reason, became a cardinal point in the Radical creed? Will Mr. Abbot presume to say that, if the Supreme Court is in the wrong, it will not ultimately be declared so? If he will, nothing else is needed to justify his deposition from the presidency of any organization that assumes to represent the Liberal thought of America. Mr Wakeman's position is not the trifling technicality that Mr. Abbot would hav us believe it to be, but, on the contrary, is of vital importance to the preservation of our liberties. While, therefore, we prefer to guide our individual efforts by the broader and more uncompromising platform which we hav adopted, we yet are glad to aid Mr. Wakeman and his friends in all possible ways; for, though it would not be a final and decisive victory, the repeal of the United States laws would drive the bigots who are plotting for the suppression of free thought into closer quarters, and deprive them of many advantages over us which they now possess.

But Mr. Abbott thinks that the repeal position is not only wrong in principle, but foolish in policy; that its advocates are unintentionally playing into the hands of the Young Men's Christian Association; that they are confusing the public mind upon the distinction between obscenity and free thought; and that Mr. Comstock must secretly chuckle at seeing this confusion deepened and spread by Mr. Heywood's own friends. We do not imagine that Mr. Comstock, having just been turned out of court by a New York judge for daring to prosecute three girls whom he had decoyed into exposing their persons, is in a chuckling mood just now; but, if he were, the object of his secret merriment would undoubtedly be the editor of The Index, who is innocent enough to imagine himself a dangerous enemy to Mr. Comstock. Why, the whole country would be dead to the issue, Mr. Heywood would be languishing in jail without a protest from any one, and Mr. Abbot himself would be absolutely dumb, had not the repealers made the efforts that they hav to arouse the people to a sense of their danger. It may be foolish to repeal the law, but it is certainly useless to reform it. Does Mr. Abbot suppose that he or any other person can frame a law on this subject that Comstock and the courts could not twist to suit their purpose? If so, let him try it. We warn him of his difficulty by quoting to him in advance the opinion which one of the most eminent members of the New England bar recently expressed to us: "I knew, five years ago, when the law was first passed, that it was wrong, for it did not define the offense against which it was directed; and I knew, further that it could never be made right, for it was directed against an offense which is legally undefinable."

Some idea of the accuracy of Mr. Abbot's statements regarding this law may be formed by reading the following extract from a recent Index editorial:

"It was not 'orthodoxy' which enacted the Comstock laws, though 'orthodoxy' may now gladly avail itself of them for purposes of its own: the real author of those laws was the people's conscience, outraged by the crimes which the laws condemned. Not to see this clearly, not to comprehend the tremendous significance of the fact, is to be smitten with almost fatal blindness. The 'repeal' position takes no account whatever of this great fact, though it is one of the chief elements of the situation; the 'reform' position alone rates it at its full value, and is wise enough to heed it."

Contrast the foregoing with this extract from the speech of Mr. Wakeman, who has thoroughly investigated the matter:

"These laws were, in effect, passed surreptitiously. The mass of the people never heard of them until they were being enforced. They therefore hav no weight as deliberate laws of the nation or of the state. They are the private laws of the society which obtained them to be put upon the statute books without the knowledge of the rest of the community. In all cases affecting the people generally, the Referendum, or, at least, public notice and discussion, is necessary to make the laws in any proper sense the acts of the people or the nation."

We hav the statement, from a reliable source, that the law was passed in the closing hours of the closing session of a drunken Congress, when many of the members knew not for what they were voting; and that the President hurriedly signed the bill, without even reading its title. So much for this "tremendously significant fact" about the "people's conscience."

But, says Mr. Abbot, "The repeal position is most disastrous to the Liberal cause," for he who deliberately favors it "has no right to complain if he is set down by the public as a man who is utterly indifferent, at the very least, to public purity. . . . The world will certainly believe that party to be an enemy to morality whose actions practically tell against it." We deny the charge. To say that the repealers, either theoretically or practically, are enemies to morality is pure assumption. Firmly believing in repeal, we believe in other things as well. We believe in happy homes and pleasant firesides and requited love. We believe in morality and decency and purity. We believe that the way to get these is to lift the veil of mystery, secrecy, and darkness, and let in knowledge and the light. We believe in attempting to lift the people out of the sexual corruption into which they are plunged. And this charge of immorality we turn upon the "reformers," and say: You are the promoters of obscenity. You, Mr. Abbot, by opposing Free-love, are helping to swell the ranks of the very classes of people which the dealers in obscenity are able to reach. You, Mr. Abbot, as a champion of legal marriage, necessarily champion obscenity, prostitution, rape, secret vice, abortion, and infanticide. We, as Freelovers, wash our hands of all responsibility for these things; for we are laboring to overthrow the social system of which these are the necessary results. No less, then, in the name of morality and purity than in that of liberty do we call for repeal, repeal, REPEAL.—The Word

Mr. Abbot's Manifesto.

The editor of The Index has issued a singular challenge to the members of the National Liberal League. He wishes the League to take ground in opposition to the repeal of the infamous Comstock law, but in favor of its modification. And he challenges the League to take this position at the peril of losing his valuable services as its President if it does not.

It is entirely proper and legitimate for Mr. Abbot to advocate the modification instead of the repeal of this iniquitous law; and no one, we presume, is disposed to criticise or disparage him for urging his opinion. But the question between modification and repeal is one of the most important and vital that Liberals, as such, or, indeed, that American citizens hav ever been called upon to decide. It should be argued and decided purely on its own merits, without being mixed with any extraneous consideration or side issue. Nothing else—not even the thought of possible obloquy—should be permitted to cloud the vision or distort the judgment in reaching a conclusion—save only the inquiry, What is right and true? When a man begins to ask, "What will men think of me if I take this position?" he is already bribing his pride or his vanity to betray his conscience.

But it is singular that Mr. Abbot—with the high purpose and devotion to principle which he has claimed, and for which his friends have given him so much credit—should hav put forth this consideration hitherto as a leading argument in the case. He has urged with great persistence, and reiterated with great fervor, that Liberals would be maligned and misjudged if they did not take his position; that they would be held in the public estimation as the friends of obscenity and the foes of morality if they favored repeal. But what hav Liberals to do with the public bruit in deciding a question of principle? If Liberalism does not mean a purpose to do right, whatever men may say or think, it means nothing. The radicalism that makes Liberals is no whit better than the most fossilized conservatism if, like conservatism, it can only cut and carve its convictions according to the prevailing sentiment. This consideration, which he so vehemently urges, is entirely irrelevant and misleading.

But, in his recent manifesto to the members of the League, Mr. Abbot presents another consideration still more irrelevant and misleading. In a word, he will accept the office of President for another term only on condition that the League will adopt his opinion on this question. We cannot help admiring the art, while we can hardly applaud the fairness, of this appeal. Mr. Abbot was the founder of the League. It is, so far as we know, his own darling conception. He is its first and only President. His well-known name has floated at its masthead ever since its organization. He labored with heroic persistence to put it on its feet during years of weary discouragement when other Liberals did not see enough in its platform on which to found a vital organization. At length an absorbing and agitating question arises, on which the League, if it takes wise ground, may become a real moral force in the great battle of reform—the freedom of speech and of the press, imperiled by the Comstock law. On this question Mr. Abbot early announced his individual position. And now he comes forward, and, with a persistency which seems to us almost cruel, refuses to accept office in the League again unless it comes to his terms. The members of the League might retain their admiration for him, and yet differ with him in opinion on this point, if not compelled to mix two separate and distinct considerations. But, when he thus forces them to choose between their love of him and their pride in his fame, and obedience to their own convictions, what is he doing but offering them an ignoble inducement to do what their better judgment forbids? We submit that it is hardly fair in him to offer this indirect bribe.

But Mr. Abbot's manifesto, while containing what he might in justice better hav omitted, fails in one essential particular. Mr. Abbot claims that the Comstock law can be so amended that it could not be used as an instrument of oppression and injustice. This has been as distinctly denied. It has been urged that it is impossible to giv such a legal definition of obscenity, in framing such a law, as to protect human rights. Mr. Abbot sends forth his platform, in advance of the meeting of the League, to aid the discussion of the subject. The thing most necessary for him to do, for this purpose, from his standpoint, was to show that his proposal was feasible. If, as he says, it is possible to frame a law which evil-disposed men could not twist to purposes of injustice, he is the man to show how it is to be done. Let him giv the draft of such a law, containing a legal definition of obscenity under which the freedom of the press cannot be struck down, and then the members of the League can judge whether his assertion can be made good. From such examples as that of Mr. Heywood, it would seem evident that it cannot be done. If, in the face of such examples, Mr. Abbot asserts it to be possible, the burden is on him to prove it. Until he does this, his platform lacks the essential strength of that "logic," which has been his pride.—The Word.

Censorship of the Press vs. Right of Private Judgment in Morals.

Editor Index: I hav read attentively your elaborate articles on the obscene literature laws, and regret that my "pent-up" condition forbids me to worthily reply. In giving generous space to this important subject, you go to school to yourself in a way that suits me; for, having got on a century without a censorship of the press, the American people will not sanction one now, even though the Liberal League continues its mistaken advocacy of it. Agreeing with you that, whether viewed as a state or Federal question, the issue differs only in degree—Federal law covering a wider field, and clashing with more diverse interests—I assert, without fear of successful refutation, that any law against obscene literature, since it invades mental liberty, initiates, if it does not establish, a censorship of the press. I understand you to concede that liberty is the natural and desirable condition of human beings; that to form and express opinions is the inalienable right of all; that "no man may use his freedom so as to infringe on the equal rights of others" (and, conversely, that no one may restrict the rights of others because they do not think or act to please him); and that "the office of government," as well defined by Daniel Webster, is "to protect persons and property from invasion." A Frenchman spent years to write a book perfect in style but devoid of thought; he failed, because even behind his purpose not to express thought was the thought to be thoughtless. Since no book, pamphlet, newspaper, or circular is possible without expressing opinions, any law forbidding any publication on any subject whatsoever invades opinions, and is therefore self-condemned on your own principles conceded above. John Calvin held that to think differently from himself was irreligious and hence immoral; so he burned Servetus with green oak wood. You hold that free thought in morals leads to obscenity, and you seek to restrict it by fining and imprisonment of its author or vender. If you are right he was right, public opinion then allowing him to employ severer penalties than are now permitted. If liberty is unsafe, we must all go back under the "five points" of John Calvin's total depravity banner. Your claim to suppress what you call obscene literature, if conceded, destroys your right to publish The Index when orthodox purists are able to suppress it. Rev. J. M. Manning, D.D., pastor of the "Old South" in Boston, once was reported to say in a Sunday evening discourse in Hollis Street Church that the writings of Ralph Waldo Emerson are more immoral in their tendencies than the thefts and debaucheries of North street, because immoral principles are more vitiating than vicious practices, though he had not the hardihood to invoke legal power to abate Emerson! Yet he will hav such power if your view prevails, which, fortunately, it cannot.

You rightly say that those who would repeal the national statutes yet sustain state obsenity laws are illogical. Granted; but better be inconsistent favoring liberty than logically opposed to it. "To be great is to be inconsistent," says Emerson. State laws, heretofore, hav been practically dead letters. They will be found to be as objectionable as the national laws when serious effort is made to enforce them. The fathers saw that state religion would admit oppression and disaster; "to be as good as they we must be better"; opposing state morality we must unflinchingly assert the right of private judgment in morals. The absurd doctrine of "constructive treason," demolished by the genius of Erskine in the famous trial of Tooke, Thelwell, and Hardy in 1794, reappears in present efforts to punish "constructive" immorality. You say "the crime" of obscenity should be defined. Certainly; will you please define it? Elizur Wright neatly says: "Obscenity, if there is such a thing, consists in want of respect for the sexual nature." Is that a punishable offense? But "society must be protected?" Yes, by maintaining individual liberty inviolate. In cases of forgery, libel, or perjury, invasion of persons givs ground for action. If I sell a book to another, or send it to him in the mails, its morality or immorality is our business, not yours. But "children should be protected?" Yes, by knowledge and discipline. When parents giv a child money to spend, they invest him or her with power of contract, the child acting in place of parent; hence there is no invasion and therefore no grievance. If you invade the natural rights of the parent you destroy the child in advance. If one's child is safe only when watched by police, the parent should attend Freelove conventions and learn how to hav no more such children. Your idea of government seems to be compulsive, not voluntary; and hence in conflict with natural right—which was before government, and will survive it. Mine finds liberty, individualism to be the primary facts; society to be an outgrowth, and the state an instrument to be "altered or abolished" as "we other folks" who improvise it think best. In attempting to regulate morals by any power outside of appeal to reason and conscience, you impose "communism" suitable for jails, but not encouraging to the voluntary associations of intelligent people contemplated in the Declaration of 1776, and the Massachusetts Bill of Rights.

You generously concede that my book is not obscene; but a United States jury and two United States judges thought differently; hence I am here, caged in a logical conclusion of your doctrine, more confining than convincing. I do not like it. Judge Clarke could make a strong defense of his rulings, in the case of the United States assault upon me, based on the invectives you hav bestowed upon "Cupid's Yokes" in the columns of The Index. The mistake is in Government undertaking to suppress publications of any kind whatsoever; and I am profoundly surprised that the policy of repression suitable to the Vatican in Rome should be so stoutly defended by the founder of Free Religion within sight of Faneuil Hall. Your distinction between theoretical and passional opinions [we never made any such.—Ed. Index.] would not be accepted by authors of the latter. Your habit of imputing a lascivious tendency to my Freelove faith, and of implying that the friends of repeal (few of whom are Freelovers) practically favor obscenity, is as illogical as it would be for me to say that you favor drunkenness because you wisely oppose prohibitory liquor laws. While you see that prohibitory liquor laws are indefensible, you yet hotly favor prohibitory literature laws. "Freedom," says Macauley, "is the only cure for the evils which freshly-acquired freedom produces." Freelovers were the first to detect the fearful prevalence of obscene desires and satisfactions, and hav suggested the only method of effectual renovation, viz., liberty, and the knowledge, sobriety, and continence which follow in wake of expanding tendencies. Repression is abortive—kills at the breach, not at the muzzle. Hav they suppressed "Cupid's Yokes?" They hav advertised it. Hav they "reformed" me? Not much. They hav taken me from my beloved family, broken up my business, uniformed me as a felon, fed and caged me as a savage; but the ideas my book proclaims "march on" with greater speed and strength than before, and the rebound of the blow which struck me down will demolish compulsive government itself. In reply to your fear that repealers hinder modification, my experience in reform is that if you would get even half a loaf, ask for the whole. "The world rests on believers," says Emerson. The fact that modificationists, issuing no petition of their own, turn their guns on the advance party, the repealers, indicates where the working forces of liberty gather, and on which banner victory will finally rest. Thanking you for your uniform friendliness and courtesy to me personally, and confident that this discussion will clear and broaden the scope of Freethought, helping also to bring the grave issues of love and parentage within the domain of reason and moral obligation, which is the object of my book, I am yours to hasten it,

Cell Fifty two, the Jail, Dedham, Mass., Oct. 5, Y. L. 6. } EZRA HOAR HEYWOOD.

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX.

[1. There is no "censorship of the press" established by punishing libel (an abuse of the press to the malicious injury of an individual's reputation) as a crime. Neither is any such censorship established by punishing the circulation of obscene literature as a crime. Publishing remains in each case as free as eating or walking; but publications which are criminal, whether libelous or obscene, are treated as such.

2. It is preposterous to allege that we "hold that free thought in morals leads to obscenity." On the contrary, we hold that it leads to purity alone. We conclude that Mr. Heywood utterly fails to understand what he cannot argue against except by such wild misrepresentation. To establish freedom is necessarily to establish the possibility of crime, but not to deprive society of the right to punish crime.

3 There is no need to define obscenity in the abstract; the law would define it, by describing clearly the class of publications which it means to suppress, and by explicitly recognizing the right of free discussion of all subjects whatever. We have again and again described this class as publications whose main and manifest intention is, not to discuss or to excite thought, but to inflame lewd passions for the sake of profit to publishers or advertisers. Doubtless this definition can be improved; but it has been in substance before the public already nine months, at the very least. Why not criticise it, and thereby help to make it better, instead of shutting the eyes or looking the opposite way?

4. We cannot honestly "concede" Mr. Heywood's book to be, in our own opinion, "not obscene"; we have not done so. But we hav all along contended that it ought not to be suppressed by law, because its obscenity is merely incidental, and because common sense as well as common justice requires the courts to judge books by their general tenor and main object, not by exceptional passages.

We cannot make any further notes on the above, except to say that whoever insists on making the cause of Freethought protect the vileness of really obscene publications, does his utmost to tie a corpse to a living body and to bury both together in the same grave.

ADDITIONAL REMARKS.

We think it must be obvious to our readers that the above remarks of The Index are weak, sophistical, and Jesuitical, by far less logical, honest, and convincing than the earnest words of Mr. Heywood. We only ask our readers to compare them carefully. Perhaps the difference of position with the two editors accounts somewhat for the difference of their views and expressions. Possibly, were Mr. Abbot torn from his family and business, and immured in prison, with lousy fellows for his companions, for the term of two years, humbled and disgraced before his fellow-men, his affection for the Comstock laws might be a trifle lessened. He might then begin to think they were not just the thing for editors and freemen.

Liberal League.

At the regular meeting of the St. Joseph (Mo.) Liberal League, held at Turner Hall on Sunday, the 13th inst., the following members were elected delegates to represent the League in the National Liberal League Congress to be held at Syracuse, New York, on October 26th, instant, for the transaction of general business and the nomination in 1880 of candidates for President and Vice-President of the United States: 1. P. V. Wise; 2 Herman Brunsing; 3. Henry Christ; 4. Jacob Sprinkle; 5. Fred. Bush. On motion it was resolved that in case any one or all of the delegates being unable or failing to attend, the Hon. H. L. Green, of Salamanca, New York, be and hereby is authorized to cast the vote of such delegate or all the delegates for this League.

The following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

WHEREAS, The orthodox having in view the suppression of free thought, reform, human freedom, and happiness, by means of deception and fraud, the peculiar weapons of all false systems of theology, and the aid of the Young Men's Christian Association, aided by their vile, unprincipled chief, one Anthony Comstock, hav procured the passage of an act by our national Congress, nominally, against the publication, having possession of by any person, or the transmission through the mails of any obscene newspaper, pamphlet, book, or instrument, or device whatever, or any medicine or other thing to prevent conception or produce an abortion, but really and in truth to prevent Liberal, Freethought publications, the transmission of them through the mails, or the having possession of and reading and using them by the unorthodox and thinking portion of the people, and also to prevent any improvement in medicine or surgery, or in the great field of physiological investigations, unless confined to the old, narrow, allopathic, ignorant, orthodox ruts; and,

WHEREAS, In evidence of these charges we submit as facts to a candid world the malicious arrest and prosecution of the editors of Woodhull's Weekly; of Geo. F. Train; of John A. Lant, editor of the Toledo Sun, for publishing verses of the Jewish-Christian Bible; of D. M. Bennett of THE TRUTH SEEKER; of E. H. Heywood of The Word, who is now languishing in a Christian prison, while his Christian brother sold his homestead in Puritan Massachusetts under a mortgage, and turned his wife and children out into the streets; of Dr. E B. Foote, of Dr. Sara B. Chase, and many other prominent physicians and scientists, not for any crimes that they had committed, or deeds done against the cause of truth or humanity, but simply for laboring in the search after truth, and for the benefit of the entire human family; therefore, be it

Resolved, That the right to investigate, to search fearlessly for truth, untrammeled by creed or ism, and to freely express, and publish, and declare to the world our conscientious opinions and ideas on all subjects pertaining to the improvement, the liberty, and welfare of mankind are the dearest and most sacred rights, privileges, and immunities that man, woman, or child can enjoy.

Resolved, That we hold the above to be sacred and inalienable rights, that must not be yielded under any circumstances to either gods or men.

Resolved, That we demand the immediate and unconditional repeal of the odious Comstock laws on obscenity, well knowing that their impartial enforcement was never intended, as they would prevent any one from having in their possession and reading the classics, Burns, Shakspere, the Bible, or any works on anatomy and physiology.

Resolved, That we demand the equal and impartial taxation of all churches and property used for theological, sectarian purposes; that we demand that no public moneys, state or national, shall be paid to any chaplain, or for any theological, sectarian purposes whatever; that we demand the repeal of all laws known as the Sunday or Sabbatarian laws, as such.

Resolved, That we regard the violation of the conditions of Stephen Girard's will, founding the Orphan's University at Philadelphia, by Christian priests and propagandists in persisting in conducting religious services in connection therewith, as being grossly immoral and contrary to all rules of justice and equity, and directly violating the sacred obligations of all contracts.

Resolved, That, as the entire structure of human society and governments is supported by and depends upon the tiller of the soil, the artisan, and laboring man, woman, and child, the soil should be owned by them in an indefeasible right, and all human laws should be made for their protection and advancement.

Resolved, That the state should giv every child, without regard to color or sex, a good, practical education, whereby each member of society would be able to support and care for himself or herself, whoever he or she might be.

Resolved, That we favor the nomination of candidates for President and Vice-President of the United States in 1880 on the Liberal Reform and Workingman's platform, hereby pledging ourselves to do our utmost to secure their election.

Echoes of "The Last Comstock Case."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: It was my good fortune to be interviewed by a man who called himself Chapman and said he was not Gurney. This man was very much excited, apparently, and found it convenient to address me as a "d——d rascal" and threaten me with arrest, prosecution for slander, and other evils which he considered would be so horrible that I should be compelled to fly at once to ex-Judge Dittenhoffer's office and "settle" by paying ten or twelve thousand dollars. I am unable to fly much.

I am not terrified, do not fear prosecution for my report of the case, and am incredulous as to the necessity of paying blackmail to anybody.

This man, who says his name is Chapman and never was Gurney, says he knows Gurney to be a rascal, because he has sold Gurney goods which hav not been paid for as agreed. He says he worked with Comstock in the Greene-street case, was arrested with the other parties, and did not know of any conspiracy against the captain of the precinct.

He said he had arrested Assistant District-Attorney Herring for his slanderous remarks about him during the trial; but before walking off from the interview said Mr. Herring was his counsel in the matter of prosecuting me for writing and you, Mr. Editor, for publishing my report of "The last Comstock Case."

He said he was in business in Bond street and had a son nineteen years old who had received anonymous letters saying his father had been in state prison. He (Chapman) who is not Gurney—who could not be found when he was wanted by both sides in the trial—now turns up when he is not wanted, and desires much pay for so "turning up." I cannot even pretend to report one-half of what Mr. Chapman, who is not Gurney, said during that interview (which was very noisy on one side), and yet one sentence impressed itself on my memory: "I know enough about Comstock to cook him—send him to ——," etc. But of Mr. Britton his remarks were more considerate.

Mr. Chapman—who was never Gurney—said he is now in the employ of four firms as detective, and that the report of that trial was damaging to him, and that he paid $50.00 to McKenney, the court stenographer, for a copy of it. Farewell, $50.00. Good day, Chapman. Where is Gurney? Perhaps he will "turn up" wanting something.

Extra copies of the report of the trial referred to can be had gratis at THE TRUTH SEEKER office.

Voltaire in Exile.

HIS LIFE AND WORK IN FRANCE AND IN FOREIGN LANDS.

BY M. GASTINEAU.

(Translated for THE TRUTH SEEKER.)

V.—CONTINUED.

One of the first thoughts of Voltaire in Belgium had been for Frederick, the Prince Royal of Prussia, to whom he had written a short letter as early as the 30th of May, from Louvain, during his excursion to Beringhen. In the first part of June, 1739, he addressed him a long missive, from which we extract what follows:

"Madame du Châtelet will do nothing here but plead. She will find very few persons to whom she can speak of philosophy. The arts do not dwell in Brussels any more than pleasures. A retired and quiet life is here the lot of nearly all individuals. But this quiet life simulates ennui so nearly that one can very easily mistake it."

The same critical idea of Brussels and Belgium is reproduced in several letters of Voltaire. Among others is an epistle addressed, at a later period, to M. de Farmont, and of which we give a stanza:

"For the sorry town whence I write thee,
Of ignorance 'tis the home,
And, besides, of dullness and ennui;
Stupidity here reigns alone.

'Tis a land of true servility,
With no wit, and saintly to the core;
But then Emilie is here with me,
And she is alone worth France and more."

In a letter to Madame de Champbonin is found this passage:

"There are, as you know, many princes in Brussels, and few men. One hears at every moment, 'Your Highness,' 'Your Excellency.'"

VI.

With his rapid glance and his habitual vivacity, Voltaire contents himself with exposing the penury of arts and letters in the Belgium of the eighteenth century; but to have been absolutely just he should have indicated the causes which had made of that intelligent and expressive race a nation of mutes, and had temporarily weaned them from their native qualities. Political and religious despotism is the grave-digger of nations, and liberty is their emancipator, their creator, as was so well proven at that period by the prosperity of the United Provinces, toward which all that Flanders had of vivaciousness and intelligence had been directing its course for a century.

Voltaire, then, should have recalled and placed by the side of his strictures upon the moral and intellectual state of Belgium in his time the vital explosion, the magnificent efflorescence, of the Flemish communes of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. Led by Artevelde, who at that period conceived the idea of the federal communes of Europe, they heroically resisted the oppression of the counts of Flanders, backed by the French monarchy, and succumbed only under the weight of overwhelming numbers, at Roesbeck, in 1382. Voltaire should have recalled the dark silhouettes of Philip II. and the Duke of Alva, swaying the ax over the head of all intelligence, over the heads which arose above the level of servitude—principally over the members of the Chambers of Rhetoric, which were a nursery of poets and authors.

The Prince Royal of Prussia joined the chorus with Voltaire against Brussels. It is true he did not spare Germany any more.

"Brussels, and nearly all Germany," he wrote to Voltaire on the 17th of July, 1739, "still feel the effects of their ancient barbarism. They honor the arts very little, and therefore cultivate them but little. The nobility bear arms, or, after superficial studies, enter the bar, which they look upon as a pleasant thing. The well-to-do gentry live in the country or in the woods, which makes them as wild as the animals they pursue. . . . You must be much more sensitive than any one else to the difference in the life of Paris and Brussels—you who breathe only in the centers of art, who have brought together in Cirey all that is most voluptuous, most piquant in intellectual pleasures."

A letter of Voltaire to the Marquess of Argeus, dated July 18, 1739, relates the case of the Jesuit Janssens, which at that time was making a great noise:

"My compliments, dear friend, to the reverend father Janssens, Jesuit, of Brussels, who persuaded the poor dame Viana that her husband had died a heretic, that consequently she could not in good conscience keep any money in her possession, and that she should place it all in the hands of her confessor. The good lady Viana, full of compunction, trusted all her money to him. The coachman who helped the reverend father to carry the sack gives legal evidence against the reverend father. The good man says he does not know what it means, and prays God for them. The people, however, want to stone the saint. The case is going to be tried. He must be hung or canonized, and haply he will be the one and the other. Adieu, and let us be neither the one nor the other."

Voltaire and the Marchioness had left the shades of Enghien to return to their Rue de la Grosse-Tour. But they did not remain there long. Madame du Châtelet was called to Paris, and she took her philosopher with her, as well as her mathematician, Koenig, who followed her everywhere.

In the month of September of that year, 1739, the Parisian editor Prault published a collection of fugitive pieces, at the head of which figured an unpublished fragment of the "Histoire du Siécle de Louis XIV.," by Voltaire. The book was seized at the publishing office and the publisher condemned to pay a fine of five hundred livres and to shut up his house. Voltaire, fearing to be included in the pursuit, retired in all haste to the Château de Cirey.

Madame du Châtelet, seeking to attract Voltaire into the field of scientific studies, of exact sciences, sought to divert him from his love of poetry and his purely literary occupations. "When M. Voltaire is sick," she wrote, "he writes poetry." But Voltaire did not abandon himself to the wishes of his too learned friend. At that time he wrote:

"I love all the nine (the muses). One should seek, as much as possible, to derive enjoyment from so many fair ones."

Voltaire has also painted Madame du Châtelet in her metamorphosis from the worldly into the scientific woman:

"But as the evening shades come on,
Adown from her aphelion
Our astronomic Emilie,
Her hands with ink black as can be,
And apron on, returns to me.
To compasses she bids adieu,
To reckonings, telescope;
Her charms she now takes up anew;
Those flowers beneath her steps that ope,
Up to her toilet take with speed,
And play for her upon thy reed
Those melodies to love so dear,
And which poor Newton did not hear."

In the month of December, 1739, we find him again, with the marchioness, in Brussels. The 10th of January, 1740, the Prince Royal had written him a letter made up of prose and verse, characterizing the Cardinal de Fleury as an old ungrateful priest, and which begins thus:

"For making France illustrious
A thankless old priest banishes
Thee from thy home, O princely bard!
Old age makes him ridiculous;
It is the way one punishes,
But not that men reward."

Voltaire, very sensitive to the disagreeable results of Prault's publication, writes from Brussels to the Count d'Argental in February, 1740:

"I intend to remain a long time in this country. I love the French, but hate persecution. I am indignant at being treated as I am."

And to the Marquess of Argenson, the 21st of May:

"The suit of Madame du Châtelet does not progress much. I must prepare myself to remain here long. I am with her; I am sheltered from persecution, and yet I regret you," etc.

Voltaire did not flatter the city of Brussels in 1740 any more than in 1739:

"I have not yet had the consolation of seeing my works correctly published," he writes to Frederick. "I could profit by my residence in Brussels to make a new edition [the 'Elements' are here alluded to], but Brussels is the abode of ignorance. There is not in it a printer, not an engraver, not a man of letters, and without Madame du Châtelet I could not converse of literature here. Moreover, this country is a country of servility. It has a papal nuncio and no Frederick."

In the course of January, 1740, the author of "Manou l'Escaut," the Abbé Prévost, had addressed a curious letter to Voltaire, in which he calls himself his most passionate admirer, and proposes becoming his liegeman to answer to the mob of pamphleteers bent on tarnishing his fame. Then, passing without other transition from his offer to the quest of services, he exposes to him his pressing need of twelve thousand livres, of which the lack causes him to be besieged by his creditors even into his very hotel. "Out of one thousand opulent persons with whom I pass my life, I wish to die if I know one of whom I have the hardihood to ask this sum, and of whom I feel sure of obtaining it."

Voltaire only answered the Abbé Prévost from Brussels in June, 1740. He begins by declaring himself highly flattered to be lauded by him, but that the motive which prevented the great Condé from writing his memoirs also stops him short, seeing that, like him, he would be obliged to bring on the stage in a disagreeable manner a large number of persons of a notorious ingratitude toward him, to begin with the Abbé Desfontains, who owes him his life, and who has rewarded him by every kind of insult and pamphlet.

Why the Hard Times?—Concluded.

BECAUSE OF THREE FRAUDULENT ACTS OF LEGISLATION, VIZ.: THE AMENDMENT TO THE LEGAL TENDER ACT, EXCEPTING DUTIES ON IMPORTS AND INTEREST ON BONDS AND NOTES—THE LAW OF 1866, AUTHORIZING CONTRACTION—THE SPECIE RESUMPTION ACT OF 1875.

[PRIZE ESSAY BY MISS C. A. BLODGETT.]

[Our readers remember Mrs. Elizabeth Thompson, of New York, offered some months ago, three prizes for the best articles explaining the cause of the present national distress. Of 400 Essays sent in the following took one of the prizes.]

Honest men who have done a legitimate business for from ten to fifty years, and laid by a competency for old age, find themselves shorn of their wealth, as it were, in a day; and men with honor unsullied by any deed of their own are left debtors for tens or hundreds of thousands, that they can by no possibility ever pay. In all sincerity I ask, have we ever had any such appalling state of "public credit" abroad, as to demand this wholesale "fleecing" of our own citizens?

It is an almost hopeless expectation that the men who have already crossed life's meridian and are going down the declivity on the other side can ever regain their shattered fortunes. And yet so great are the recuperative powers of this country that could these three ruinous acts of legislation be immediately repealed, nothing is impossible for such a people and such a land.

Since 1866 more than a billion and a quarter dollars of coin-interest-bearing bonds have been issued and sold at from sixty to eighty cents on a dollar, and the property of this country mortgaged for their redemption at one hundred cents on a dollar, and that to be paid in gold after paying gold interest on them for twenty, thirty, and forty years.

Rothschilds, in whose interest this legislation has been largely conducted, could not manage his own affairs so disastrously and not precipitate himself into bankruptcy in three years.

In addition to this burden of bonds, our currency has been contracted to an equal amount, thus drawing the life-blood from the business of the country and concentrating it in the hands of a few capitalists who could make more by keeping it in idleness than by employing it in business. The money thus withdrawn, with the exception of $330,000,000 treasury notes, consisted principally of small bills which circulated daily in business, and the bonds that consumed them have been issued in large denominations and given into the hands of the capitalists, who needed only to lock them up, and the people would pay him interest and the Government remit his taxes.

Is it rational to suppose that of the two billions one hundred and ninety-two millions of money in circulation, more than a billion and a half could be withdrawn, and the business of the country not suffer prostration? Besides, the small balance of seven hundred millions remaining has been upon an ever varying basis, so that no one could predict with any degree of certainty what the future would be.

The destruction of so large an amount of currency has of course caused an appreciation in the value of what was left. Just as making large quantities of corn into whisky has sometimes advanced the price of the former commodity, and as any special blight upon the crops of the country diminishing their quantity advances their price.

The greenback dollar has, during some of the time, appreciated nearly ten per cent per annum, so that idle money has been more profitable during all this period than invested capital, which has, in almost every instance, brought nothing but loss and and ruin to its owner.

John Sherman comprehended this fact, and opposed the measure before he became Secretary of the Treasury and a member of the Syndicate.

EXTRACTS FROM A SPEECH BY JOHN SHERMAN BEFORE THE SENATE IN 1869.

"The appreciaiton of the currency is a far more distressing operation than Senators suppose. Our own and other nations have gone through that process before. . . . . .

"It is not possible to take this voyage without the sorest distress. To every person except a capitalist out of debt, or a salaried officer or annuitant, it is a period of loss, danger, lassitude of trade, fall of wages, suspension of enterprise, bankruptcy, and disaster. To every railroad it is an addition of one-third to the burden of its debt, and, more than that, deductoin from the value of its stock. It means the ruin of all dealers whose debts are twice their (business) capital, though one-third less than their actual property. It means the fall of all agricultural productions without any great reduction of taxes. What prudent man would dare to build a house, a railroad, a factory, or a barn, with the certain fact before him that the greenbacks he puts into his improvement will in two years be worth thirty-five per cent more than his improvement is then worth? Why not hold his money for two years until his building will cost him one-third less? When the day comes, every man, as the sailor says, will be close reefed, all enterprise will be suspended; every bank will have contracted its currency to the lowest limit, and the debtor, compelled to meet in coin a debt contracted in currency, will find the coin hoarded in the Treasury no representative of coin in circulation, his property shrunk, not only to the extent of the appreciation of the currency, but still more by the artificial scarcity made by the hoarders of gold. To attempt this task by a surprise upon our people, by arresting them in the midst of their lawful business, and applying a new standard of value to their property without any reduction of their debts, or giving them an opportunity to compound with their creditors, or to distribute their losses, would be an act of folly without example in evil in modern time."

IN THE FACE OF ALL THESE FACTS, and in opposition to the teaching of all history on this subject, our national bark was fully launched upon this perilous voyage, January, 1875.

The most careless observer of passing events knows that we have seen nothing but constantly increasing adversity since we started on this Argonautic expedition in search of the GOLDEN FLEECE.

Since that period, and in fact ever since we commenced preparation for it, in 1861, we have simply repeated what has been the history of every nation that has ever tried the same experiment before us.

The real estate of Great Britain was transferred from the ownership of two hundred and fifty thousand land owners to fifty thousand in a comparatively short time, by simply going from a non-convertible to a convertible currency.

When the country issues a non-convertible paper, it is because more money is needed that can be supplied in coin, and afterward to reduce it to the coin standard, means simply to destroy the extra amount as soon as it has performed the function of paying a debt. Could anything be more dishonest or dishonorable?

Less than a decade of years ago monarchical France was ravished by war, drained of her money, and left in a state of anarchy. The French people were declared incapable of self-government, and there was not a civilized country in the world that was not ready to offer some assistance in regulating the affairs of the disordered empire. All such generous offers were declined, and the so-called volatile French nation, long oppressed by tyrants, too seldom seen—that of attending to their own business themselves.

GAVE TO THE WORLD AN EXAMPLE

They planted an infant republic. They paid Prussia one billion dollars in coin or its equivalent, which effectually drained their treasury. They funded their national debt of $5,000,000,000 (two and a half times that of the United States), with the legal-tender notes largely bearing one and a half per cent interest and taxable the same as other property.

They built a fire in every furnace in the land; they set in motion every loom and spindle; employed every idle man and woman in the republic that wanted work, and to-day the French people are living in the enjoyment of peace and plenty, undisturbed by the financial earthquake that has shaken every other civilized nation of the globe. Her fiscal agent, the Bank of France, has over four hundred million dollars of gold in her treasury, and we have respectable journals in this city advising the Federal Government to borrow gold of France, even if it has to pay ten per cent interest for its use.

Suppose France had tried to build up her wasted commerce by buying gold at ten per cent, and refused to use any money not convertible into gold, it would probably have been a long time before she would have had any gold to loan. Suppose, again, she should commence at the rate of four millions a month, as the United States has done; suppose that after continuing this a few years she should fix a date four years hence, and give out word that during that period she should burn or otherwise destroy her blue, black notes, until only three hundred millions of them remained.

The fires would be as certain to go out in France, the wheels to stop motion, and the people to be reduced to beggary as they have been in this country.

Let America adopt the same financial policy pursued by the republic across the sea, and she too will soon have gold to loan.

Scotland has had for years a non-convertible currency, and it is a proverbial fact that the Scotch peasantry are superior to that of any other country of Europe.

A gold basis, and oppressed and enslaved people, are inseparable evils. They have been true yokefellows during the history of civilization.

The nation has

gnawing at its vitals, and that is, the national banking system.

By this system a man by joining with others and forming a national bank can, with three hundred thousand dollars of greenbacks drawing no interest purchase a government bond for the same amount, drawing four per cent interest, payable in coin. He can deposit this bond with the Government and receive its full value in currency, less ten per cent, which he leaves as security for his banking operations. With this $270,000 currency he can buy another interest-bearing bond, and again exchange that for currency less ten per cent, and repeat the operation until he has a million or more dollars on which the Government shall pay him interest, with legalized authority to issue paper of his own to the extent of eighty per cent of his bonds. On his million of bonds the Government will pay him $40,000 in gold interest, and loan him, free of interest, subject to a tax of one per cent, $900,000 of currency to loan the people, at from 7 to 10 per cent.

I will not amplify upon this subject. It is receiving very close attention at the hands of the intelligent everywhere.

WHAT THE COUNTRY NEEDS

is not intelligence offices or soup houses, but a sound national currency. There has never been any other cause of business depression in this country. There has been no falling off of material wealth. We have never failed of seed time or harvest, or wanted for the early or later rain. Our agricultural productions have been greater during the three years of "famine" than they ever were before, and the ten thousand causes that have been ascribed by people who at best only jump at conclusions—such as "over-production," "excessive use of machinery," "immigration," "extravagance," or even "stealing," —have no foundation in truth. Concerning the latter, if our Congressmen only stole money enough to keep their wives in silk dresses, and enable them to give state dinners, the loss would be imperceptible. But it is their ruinous legislation, destroying all values, that bankrupts us. Again, if every woman in the United States wore silk dresses and trailed them a yard, even this would not exhaust our stores of wealth. Like the national debt, it might become a blessing, because it would foster industry. As for immigration, while nineteen out of every twenty acres of our productive soil has not yet been broken by the ploughshare, we can afford to open wide our doors and invite the oppressed of all nations to make a home of our forests or our prairies. The question of "over-production" I will leave to those who believe our starving laborers are suffering from too much food, too good clothes, over work, or over pay. The subject is so voluminous, space determines that I sum it up briefly, thus:

A SOUND NATIONAL CURRENCY.

The Greenback dollar a perfect legal tender, THE ABSOLUTE MONEY of the United States, besides which there shall be no other, no more bonds, entire demonetization of the so-called precious metals, no more bank notes. But a national currency as inviolable as the Constitution of the United States or the American flag, something to which children's children of the latest generation shall never dare do violence, and which shall be redeemed in gold, when the comes down from God out of heaven and when the foundations of the city are a pearl, an amethyst, a carbuncle, or a topaz, and the streets are all of solid gold.

But never again let AVARICE and IGNORANCE combine to frustrate the designs of our beneficent Father, who has provided for all liberally, by decreeing, through human legislation, that this earth, which is mostly iron and clay, shall hereafter revolve on a golden axis, or that it shall not revolve at all.

I tell the story with the greatest possible simplicity of language, because truths such as these need no embellishing.

As I am more anxious for the success of the cause you seek to advance than for the gratification of any personal ambition, I say in advance: "All honor to the pen that shall strike nearer the root of the evil than mine has done."

Hoping that you may accomplish great good by concentrating careful thought upon the subject, I am very sincerely yours.

Address by Stephen Pearl Andrews.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: THE TRUTH SEEKER is becoming so much addicted to scientific subjects that I take the liberty to request you to republish the following condensed address, showing the mode in which Universology intervenes in the matter of Scientific Classification. Those of your readers who are familiar with Mr. Wakeman's Tables of Classification will readily perceive that this sketch traverses the same ground from a new point of view, bringing out the correlations of the special sciences with regional dominions of the human body. Mr. Wakeman has called the scale of sciences which he exhibits the backbone of the sciences. It will be observed that the analogy is only partially correct. Logic is the backbone, or bony framework, of the scheme, and the scale is commensurate with the entire body in its fleshy and geometrical as well as in its bony aspects.

STEPHEN PEARL ANDREWS.

[From the Long Branch Daily News.]

By request, Stephen Pearl Andrews made an address before the New Jersey State Dental Association, on Wednesday morning, July 17th, upon "The Relation of Science to the Profession of Dentistry." He said:

"It is well to consider what it is that constitutes a good, the best, or a first-class education. It seems to be the knowing something of everything, and everything of something. What comes to the same thing is a knowledge of Universals, on the one hand, and of the minutiæ and details of one's own specialty, on the other hand. The specialty knowledge you are acquiring steadily by study and practice. It is my specialty to contribute something of the universality aspect. I am not a dentist, but I know things which I think dentists ought to know. Dr. Atkinson, so distinguished as a dentist, is also a student of universals, and it is by his invitation, seconded by yours, that I am here.

"The universals of science constitute Universology. There is at bottom but one science. The school that should teach that science would be a true university. The world has not had as yet a true university. It is too early to expect it. The Dental Associations, by taking on a universality aspect, in addition to their specialty aspect, may contribute toward the final establishment of the true university.

"The university should teach the universals of science. These are closely allied to classification of the sciences. This subject is, again, allied peculiarly with the distribution of the human body. The brain and head, apart from the face, correspond with the mind, and so with psychology, the science of mind; the larynx and tongue correspond with linguistics, the science of language; and the face with æsthetics, or the science of comeliness or beauty.

"Going to the other extremity, the animal tail represents tradition, knowledge depending on tradition, unverified. This falls away in man, except the coccyx, which represents the verified residuum of such prior assumption of knowledge. The pelvis and nates—the seat of the person—represents astronomy, the outer cosmos, as contrasted with the head and mind at the other extremity. We call a residence a seat—a country seat; and by enlargement of the idea the world is the seat of man. Physics, as mechanics, the science of force (potency, etc.), is represented by the genitalia. Chemistry is represented by the ingredients of the body, and especially by the ingesta and egesta.

"Coming up to the regions of life (Biology), it divides, below man, into three great sciences—first, Protistology (beginnings of life, lore); then Botany; then Zoology. Protistology corresponds with the mesentery and lacteal glands, where life begins in the body. These glands are the sucking lips of infants, or the spongioles of plants. Botany is represented by the branching viscera, the veins, arteries, etc. Zoology is represented by the aggregated or splanchnal viscera (liver, etc.)—the true vitals, or life region.

"Above mere life, and below abstract mind, language, etc., is the region of man. As such, his science is anthropology. It divides into three great sciences—Mon-anthropology, the science of man singly, or as apart from society; Sociology, and Ethics. Sociology defines itself. Ethics is the science of the conduct of the individual man in his relations to society. The body divides into two equal and correlated sides. The single side-half (either of the two) is analogous with Mon-anthropology. The two sides together, in their bi-lateral symmetry, correspond with Sociology. The pairing of the sexes as companions is the unit of Sociology (or societary relationship). The right side-half of the body is masculoid, or represents man; the left-hand side is feminoid, or represents woman. Ethics is represented by the perpendicular line dropped from the apex of the crown through the body, coinciding with the median line, or linea alba. The words which we instinctively use for ethical ideas are such as on the square, flat footed, upright, and downright.

"In fine, the nose and breathing apparatus represent Pneumatology; and the punctum vitæ, theology."

Financial.

In reply to your correspondent of last week—J. W. Truesdell—on the circulation, and with a long official list to back his statements, permit me to add, your summary, Mr. T., so far as it goes, is correct—$983,318 686; but, in fairness, add $829 992 500 of seven-thirty treasury notes to the circulation of 1865, and make the total circulation $1,813,311,186, to compare with subsequent times.

Mr. Spinner, then Secretary of the Treasury, one day on being asked if the seven-thirties were intended as currency, replied thus:

"MOHAWK, Aug. 17, 1876.

"MY DEAR SIR: The seven-thirty treasury notes were intended, prepared, issued, and USED as currency.

"Very respectfully yours, F. E. SPINNER."

But at all events a greatly increased population, with a contraction in currency of $283,000 000, as admitted by Mr. Truesdell, is in inverse ratio against labor, and real estate, and making money scarce. F. J. EMARY.

TO TAKE a needed step in the spelling reform, we have acted upon the advice of the American Philological Association to the extent of dropping the useless final e in the words have, give, and live, except in such matter as is used in making books and pamphlets. It is hoped other periodicals will see the propriety of this step and act accordingly.

Letter from Judge Dittenhoefer.

As an indication of the high appreciation entertained of Mr. Wakeman's arguments relative to the unconstitutionality of the Comstock postal laws, we lay before our readers the following very sensible letter from Judge A. J. Dittenhoefer, who is justly regarded as one of the ablest and most prominent lawyers of this city. While such minds accord unqualified approval to Mr. Wakeman's arguments, perhaps it can be complacently borne if a few minds of smaller caliber fail to see in his presentation of facts and arguments little to command their repect and co-operation:

NEW YORK, Oct. 16, 1878.

T. B. WAKEMAN ESQ., My Dear Sir: I read your very able and forcible address reviewing the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of ex parte Jackson, with great interest. Its positions are unassailable. While bowing, as I am in duty bound to do, to the decision of the Supreme Court as an authority in the case before it, my convictions as to the unconstitutionality of the laws therein reviewed are strengthened by your reasoning. I hope that some time in some other case the question may be reargued with better success. Yours very truly, A. J. DITTENHOEFER.

Letter from H. L. Green.

We are kindly permitted by Mr. T. B. Wakeman to lay the following interesting private letter before our readers. It shows pretty clearly what effect Mr. Wakeman's article must hav upon the general reader. Mr. Green was originally in favor of the Abbot position in reference to the Comstock postal laws, but Mr. Wakeman's arguments, logic, and facts appear to hav been too much for him. We will let him speak for himself:

SALAMANCA, N. Y., Oct. 18, 1878.

T. B. WAKEMAN, ESQ., Dear Sir: This moment I hav finished reading "An Answer to the Index Criticisms," by yourself, in this week's TRUTH SEEKER, and I cannot forego the desire I feel to write and thank you for that able and masterly production. It convinces me beyond a doubt that the Comstock laws are unconstitutional. Your Faneuil Hall Speech left very few doubts in my mind, and those doubts hav been swept away by this article.

I wish it could be read by every Liberal in this country in connection with your speech and all of Mr. Abbot's criticisms.

I had never considered the question of the constitutionality of the law until I read your speech, but the reading of that speech and the discussion of the subject by various persons in the Liberal papers hav convinced me that if ever the question is fairly brought before the United States Court, that Court will hold these laws unconstitutional. And after due consideration I conclude it is better that such is the case and that therefore the suppression of obscene literature be left to the state governments. And the more I consider the subject the more I am convinced that it would be nearly or quite impossible to so word a law against the circulation of obscene literature that it could not be made an instrument for the suppression of the freedom of the press.

Friend Wakeman, you hav done great service to the Liberal movement by your able discussion of this subject, and I again thank you for your valuable labors.

Very truly yours, H. L. GREEN.

We are glad that Mr. Green is now able to see the facts regarding the Comstock Postal laws so clearly. We hav very little doubt that ninety-five out of a hundred would arrive at the same conclusion if they would take the same means to inform themselves upon the subject that he has taken. One has only to become acquainted with the language of the Constitution, and with the opinions of the greatest statesmen that America has produced, to become convinced that the Charter of American Liberty confers upon Congress no power to institute a system of espionage in our postal service nor to investigate the meaning, morals, or supposed propriety of anything that passes through the mails. It is ignorance that makes some so ready to grant that Congress has the power to violate the Constitution and pass laws authorizing the appointment of spies to watch what the people see fit to send through the mails and to estimate it a virtue to cry out against obscenity, which no two persons scarcely define alike. Those who are actuated by a morbid respectability and desire to stand well with those who wish to be considered the "upper crust" of society are those who are most ready to surrender the most sacred rights of the Constitution in place of the bauble of "respectability," who would rather be cringing slaves to intolerant tyrants than for a moment to be considered indifferent to the fiat of Mrs. Grundy. More information is needed upon this subject. We hav just issued a pamphlet of nearly 120 pages containing Mr. Wakeman's Faneuil Hall speech, his reply to The Index given in our last, his second article, given in this paper, the letter of James Parton, the replies of T. C. Leland and others to The Index, the appeal of The National Defense Association to the Liberal League, with other articles and letters. Sent to any address for ten cents.

A Few Questions Well Enough to be Considered.

1. Shall it become a part of Liberalism to advocate the violation of the Constitution and the annihilation of a free press and free mails for the sake of pseudo-respectability and the good opinion of its orthodox opponents?

2. Is there anything about Anthony Comstock or his laws that any Liberal should contend ought to be preserved?

3. Is there any way to "reform" a rattlesnake equal to cutting his head off?

4. Is there any "modification" for a poisonous cobra equal to instant death?

5. Is the false shepherd who defends the wolf that destroys the lambs of the flock any better than the wolf himself?

6. Is it any part of the work of the Liberal League to join hands with the worst enemy the Liberal cause in this country ever had, or to champion the worst set of laws ever enacted in the land?

7. Is it a good indication on the part of Liberals, or on the part of him who would be the accepted leader of them, to be over-sensitive as to what their orthodox opponents may think of them?

8. Is not a "kid-glove" Liberalism and the kind that takes special pleasure in quoting what bigoted clergymen and sectarian periodicals may say against the cause or against honest workers in it an entirely different kind than that which was possessed by Thomas Paine, Ethan Allen, Thos. Jefferson, Abner Kneeland, and men of that ilk?

9. Is not a man's Liberalism to be mistrusted when he is ready to sacrifice on the altar of "respectability" equally the dearest rights of freemen and the very fundamental principles of free thought, free speech, and a free press?

10. Is not the man who would steal away the precious rights of the people, when he does so under the garb of morality and decency, quite as much to be distrusted as when he does it as a robber or highwayman?

11. Does it make any crime less black and repulsive to commit it under the covering of morality or in the name of religion and decency?

12. Is not a hypocritical, canting enemy more to be dreaded than one open, blunt, and above-board?

13. Was it a mark of brotherly love in the cultured editor of The Index when the uncultured, plain-spoken editor of this paper was beset by the sly, underhanded agents of the Young Men's Christian Association to praise the attacking party and decry the one attacked?

14. As the head of the Liberal League, was it not the President's place to come to the relief of a brother in distress, who held the position of Vice-President in the same organization rather than to virtually join hands with the persecutor and sound loud notes of praise for the grand, good work he, the persecutor, was doing?

15. If it is not fit work for the Liberal League to defend the principles of liberty when attacked, either under the garb of religion or of the law, what in the world are its appropriate duties?

16. Was it kind and brotherly in the cultured editor when his unfortunate brother was under bonds and in the toils of his deadliest enemy to speak of his having been guilty of obscenity, a crime he never thought of committing?

17. When his brother was arraigned before the highest courts in the land; when the prison doors were yawning to receive him, and the precedents of the court before which he was arraigned had made his offense but little less than murder, sentencing some persons for little or no crime to five and ten years' imprisonment, was it the spirit of Liberalism that made the cultured editor oppose him and take up on the side of his enemies?

18. When the unfortunate one, in full view of the peril that threatened him and had threatened others, feeling the injustice of the law under which he was arraigned and his innocence of the crime with which he was charged, caused to be sent over the country thousands of carefully and ably drawn petitions to Congress to repeal or modify the cruel laws, was it kind or friendly in the cultured editor to denounce the petition, to insist that it should not be signed, to declare positively that he would not sign it and that he advised other Liberals not to sign it?

19. Was it truthful or honorable in the cultured editor to represent that the petition was a trap or decoy in the interest of obscenity, and that those who signed it did so without knowing what they were doing?

20. Was it truthful or honorable in the cultured editor to impute to an unfortunate brother, when under bonds, the intention of defending and upholding obscenity?

21. Is it not one of the most unjust and cruel things known to charge or insinuate that any person is guilty of a heinous crime when he is not, especially the crime of obscenity, which is despised by all honorable and good people?

22. Did not the cultured editor charge and insinuate time after time that the seventy thousand upright, honest, liberty-loving people who signed those petitions were ignorant of the evil they were doing, of the wrong they were aiding, of the trap they were blindly falling into?

23. Was it not unjust and dishonorable in the cultured editor to repeatedly throw out the insinuation and charge that the seventy thousand, because they opposed the existence of an unconstitutional law upon our statute books, were therefore giving their aid and influence in favor of obscenity?

24. Did not the persistent, Jesuitical, and ill-natured warfare which the cultured editor kept up from month to month against the projector, author, and signers of that petition go far to prevent its passage before Congress, and to defeat the great and earnest effort which so many thousands made in a great and good cause?

25. Cannot the defeat and the intent to defeat the greatest petition ever sent into Congress be justly charged upon the editor of The Index?

26. Does such a kind of Jesuitical work peculiarly adapt him to be the leader of the Liberals and Freethinkers of America; and should we all now hold up our hands and raise our voices and cry aloud, "Let the little cultured editor, who has done so much for us, continue to rule over us?"

27. Was it kind, truthful, or honorable in the cultured editor, when his brother was under the ban of the Young Men's Christian Association and the Christian Society for the Suppression of Vice, whose President and great agent publicly declared that all Freethought and Freelove publications were in the way of soon being "stamped out"—when, we say, the pampered and highly-salaried agent of these societies was doing all he could to cast the unfortunate man into prison, to blacken his reputation, and to break up and destroy his business, was it brotherly or honest to take the advertisement of an enemy who had been bulldozed by Comstock, falsely damaging to the unfortunate one, and publish it with an unfriendly flourish in his own paper, and urge it as a reason why the great petition should be defeated?

28. Was it kind, brotherly, or honorable in the cultured editor to try to show that his unfortunate brother, who was, too, one of the Vice-Presidents of the National Liberal League, was guilty of the crime of forgery, in addition to the still more heinous crime of obscenity?

29. Was it brotherly, honorable, or Liberal in the cultured editor to write to that Christian enemy in this city with a view of obtaining all the damaging facts he could against the unfortunate brother, and when he had procured from that unreliable source statements that were partly false and partly true, then to lay them before his readers with the express purpose of making them believe that his unfortunate brother, in addition to obscenity, had positively committed forgery?

30. In this whole business, hav not envy, jealousy, and petty malice been the ruling motives that hav actuated the cultured editor?

31. Does such conduct, the exhibition of such traits, especially fit the cultured editor as a leader for the Liberal forces of America?

32. Has it been truthful or honorable in the cultured editor to persistently misrepresent those who hav been at work in the interest of the repeal of the unconstitutional Comstock laws upon the ground that they establish an odious censorship of the press and a detestable espionage of the mails—many of them the best men and women this country possesses—that they were working in the interest of obscenity, and giving their aid towards flooding the schools with the vilest and nastiest trash ever known?

33. Do such misrepresentations from the cultured editor, with the fifty others that can easily be enumerated, which, in the name of morality, culture, and respectability, he has from week to week dealt out to his favored readers, offer irrefutable arguments why he should remain at the head of the greatest Liberal organization of the country?

34. Is it not a question whether, in looking back upon the labor he has been engaged in, he has sufficient grounds for complacently smiling at his labors and holding up before his confiding and admiring readers the beauty and symmetry of the work he has performed?

35. In bringing his powerful mind to bear upon the great questions of constitutional law, has the cultured editor made the greatest and best use of his abilities by struggling to retain upon our statute books laws subversive of freedom of speech, freedom of discussion, freedom of the press, and freedom of the mail, and to break down the guarantees of American liberty under which the country prospered in an unprecedented degree for one hundred years?

36. Does such a course of conduct and such a prostitution of his rare abilities especially qualify him for the leadership of the sons of freedom?

37. Do the sophistry, special pleading, and false premises which for months the cultured editor has presented to those who hang upon him for their mental pabulum really evince such a cast of mind as free thinkers and free speakers want for a leader?

38. Are falsehood, misrepresentation, and sophistry any more lovable, or more calculated to win the appreciation of intelligent, honorable people, because it is assumed that they are employed in the interest of decency, respectability, and high morality?

39. Is it the legitimate business of a teacher of Liberalism to advocate the continuance of laws which can easily be made to oppress candid thought and honest convictions?

40. If the candidate editor wishes to hav the Comstock laws, or a part of them, retained upon our statute books, should he not, as a matter of honesty, point out the parts he specially wishes retained, and if he thinks a law can be framed so as to prevent immoral matter from passing through the mails, and not by any possibility be construed to interfere with the honest expression of heretical views upon theology, to give the form and phraseology, that his readers may know just how it can be done?

41. As he has been requested repeatedly to give a draft of the law or bill now incorporated in the Comstock laws, which he thinks by his process of reform should be retained, and which it is such a great wrong to ask to be repealed, and he still insists that the laws should not be repealed, is it not a case of palpable dishonesty on his part to persistently refuse to reply?

42. Is it not a mistaken notion in a Liberal leader to work himself into a panic over a nearly imaginary evil which scarcely has an existence in the country, and has not had for six years past, and not be at all disturbed by evils ten thousand times greater in magnitude that exist under our very noses, and may be found in every city and town, in nearly every village and hamlet, in the country?

43. Can a man be a fit leader for Liberals whose mind is so unbalanced as to be horror-stricken at evils which he has not seen, but only imagines, and be wholly indifferent and callous to the positive and monstrous wrongs which, like a running ulcer, are everywhere found on the body of the public?

44. Can he be honest in advocating a law clearly unconstitutional, which, at the best, can merely clip one branch of the evil which he so loudly decries, when there are state laws already in existence fully capable of entirely eradicating the evil, doing violence neither to the Constitution nor the liberties of the people?

45. Is it not immensely better to advocate and depend upon state laws which are right and constitutional and amply sufficient to meet the necessities of the case than to break down the barriers of the Constitution, trample upon the rights of the people, and commit an absolute wrong for a process which cannot do the work half so well?

46. Is it not wrong in Messrs. Comstock and Abbot to appal the tender feelings of the country, exciting horrors and fears, by exaggerated statements about the schools and seminaries of the country being flooded with obscene literature thrust, unasked, upon the innocent and helpless scholars, when there is nothing of the kind whatever taking place?

47. Is it not greatly to be regretted that Mr. Abbot should needlessly have thrown this bone of contention into the Liberal ranks, tacitly accusing thousands of being on a grade of morality far beneath his own?

48. Are there not men in the Liberal ranks who would not exhibit the marked indiscretion which the cultured editor has evinced, and who would not spend their time for months in decrying the honest and earnest efforts of those who, though inferior to himself, are doing as much in their way to fight superstition and error?

49. Is not the Hon. Elizur Wright, the aged veteran of Freethought and human liberty, who for half a century has not flinched in the advocacy of the highest principles of liberty, both mental and physical, who has had the moral bravery ever to espouse unpopular theories when they were right, such a man as the Liberals of America can safely trust as their standard-bearer, and is he not eminently worthy of the honor?

50. Can the Liberal League in the National Congress assembled at Syracuse do better than to unite upon the worthy and good Brother Elizur Wright as a leader for the next twelve months, and will not the Liberal League be likely to prosper harmoniously and successfully under his wise and able leadership?

Still One More Prosecution.

On the 20th inst. a deputy sheriff visited our office and served a summons upon us, issued at the instance of one Frank J. Chapman, for libel. His complaint is that we hav injured his character by slandering him, and he wants $25,000 or $50,000 to make his reputation good again.

On the fifth inst. we published a report written by Prof. A. L. Rawson, of Comstock's prosecution of three girls on Greene street, who by the payment of money were induced to exhibit their nude persons before Anthony Comstock and five other persons. The report embraced the remarks of the prosecuting attorney, the judge, and the defendant's lawyer, scarcely anything else was mentioned. It seems that the trial brought out the fact that a man by the name of Chapman had had considerable to do with working up the case, and had made arrangement with Madam DeForest, who keeps the house, to hav the girls make the exhibition alluded to on the evening of the 14th of June last. It seems that Chapman some how got confounded with another person, said to be of bad character, by the name of Gurney. Neither being present at the trial, the prosecuting attorney Herring thought that Chapman and Gurney were the same man, whom he represented as having passed several terms in the state prison as a felon. Comstock whispered to Mr. Herring that they were two different persons, but the lawyer did not seem to credit the statement.

Mr. Chapman has visited our office several times, claiming that the publication of the report of the trial has damaged him greatly, and he insists that he has not spent several terms in state's prison. He admitted, however, that he was a detective employed by the Society for the Suppression of Vice, that he did assist Anthony Comstock in working up the Greene street case, that he did make the arrangement for the girls to exhibit themselves in the manner they did, and that he went there "to hav some fun." While he admitted that he had acted as a partner of Anthony Comstock in the case referred to, he denounced him in as strong terms as we could, and said he could give us proofs against Comstock that would "send him up," or make him odious to the entire community—or words to that effect.

The great desire Mr. Chapman seemed to cherish nearest his heart was that we pay him some $10,000 for publishing the report of the trial in which the name of Chapman appeared, without designating what Chapman it was; but we not happening to hav that little sum of money by us were unable to hand it over to him, even had we the faintest desire to do so. Hence his suit against us, and it remains to be seen whether he succeeds in wringing that amount of money from us. Prof. Rawson is also included in the suit.

This seems to be a rather good season for suits. We hav only three of our own on hand at the present time. No 1. The Watkins arrest for handing up a copy of "Cupid's Yokes. No. 2 for using the name of Chapman in vain. No. 3, to recover payment on a note that we paid two years ago, of which we are able to give abundant proof. So, with our other cares and troubles we seem destined to be kept tolerably busy for some little time to come.

Who Is to Blame?

Mr. Underwood and others regret that the question of "repeal" or "modification" is to be introduced as an element of dissension in the coming Congress of the National Liberal League. It may be a just cause for regret, but we wish that the blame, if any, may be traced to its true source. We think no share of the blame justly attaches to us for the commencement of the unpleasantness. Our desire was certainly for peace. We began no quarrel with The Index. We were not the first to indulge in personalities or criminations. We can, in a just defense of the position we occupy, but reiterate what we hav said before, and that is, that we never made an uncomplimentary remark in our columns relative to the editor of The Index until after he had said the most unkind things about ourselves, imputing to us the worst and most abhorred of crimes.

As to the question of repeal or modification, it is the editor of The Index who has had more to say upon these subjects than anybody else, and who has had more fault to find than all else besides with those who had the temerity to ask for the alternative of repeal or modification. It is he also who has forced this question upon the Liberal League Congress; it is he who laid down a platform of three planks touching these questions, upon which only he will stand as a candidate for re-election. It is he, most emphatically, who has forced this quarrel upon the Liberal Congress; and if there is any blame in the matter, he is the gentleman who is entitled to it.

We return thanks to our numerous friends who hav sent in the names of many trial subscribers. We appreciate the interest they hav thus manifested in adding new names to our list, and we shall continue to feel grateful to all who will aid us in the same way. Let it be remembered that we still send The Truth Seeker three months, with a copy of either of the following works, as may be preferred: Paine's "Age of Reason," "The Holy Bible Abridged," or the "New Pocket American Dictionary" (30,000 words)—for 60 cents. We wish to add a thousand more names to our list within the next thirty days. Let every earnest friend of the paper procure a new subscriber or order it for some friend who ought to read it. It is to new subscribers that this offer is made.

The Immorality of Reform.

"CRUSHING REASONS" FOR REPEAL.

BY T. B. WAKEMAN.

To the Editor of The Index: I regret more than ever that my answer to The Index criticisms did not appear in your last issue as intended, for if fairly considered it would certainly hav saved the editorial that did appear. You could not hav then written as follows:

"To demand that there shall be no laws against the mailing of obscene literature is necessarily to demand that that crime shall go unpunished; and to demand that crime shall go unpunished is a glaring violation of political morality."

Here you assume two things which you have never proved, and the contrary of which was clearly shown.

1. The simple mailing of a thing is not a crime, and Congress cannot create it into "a crime." As Henry Clay said as to "incendiary" literature, it is all harmless in the post-office. It is the "circulation out of the post-office" that makes the offense. And that "crime" must be discovered and punished just as libels and all other crimes are by the states and not by the General Government which has no constitutional power over them whatever.

2. You assume that those who favor the repeal of these "postal laws" as unconstitutional, immoral, "wrong in every way and pernicious in many ways," necessarily demand that the circulation of obscenity shall go unpunished, and this you say is the position of "repeal."

Now the exact reverse of this is the truth.

The fact is that all the obscenity there was, was and could and can only be suppressed by state laws. The mailing and every form of circulation can only be reached by them. This was all practically done before the Comstock postal laws were passed in 1873. Only the state laws that strike at the root and reach the printing, manufacture, and circulation in every form, including expresses and the mails, can be effectual. Postal laws cannot prevent the circulation of obscenity, for it has a hundred means beyond them. There must be state laws; they were efficient—why not continue to use them until they fail? All these postal laws hav done is to introduce "espionage and decoy," which hav outraged justice, liberty, and morality in pretending to punish "crimes" they hav produced or induced.

You choose to represent the position of those who favor repeal as "UTTERLY IMMORAL." Thus you seek to frighten the unreasoning and the timid. Such misrepresentation may delight your orthodox opponents like the "Statesman," but it should make the fair and judicious grieve. When you delight that paper expressly established to overthrow the League, and put God in the Constitution, can you not see that you are in the wrong? Your course givs the "orthodox" all they want, to wit, the Constitutional power to dispose of free thought and the liberties of the people as they wish. They always, the majority, will consult their views and tastes, and not yours, in the disposal. All Liberal literature, in the words of Judge Field's Opinion, is "deemed injurious to the public morals" in their minds. This is the time for meditation over the fate of the silly sheep who trusted to the flattery and promises of the wolves instead of their own faithful dogs and fold.

Now as to the morality question. You hav stated exactly the reverse of the truth. The cause of "genuine morality in politics, freedom, and virtue" which the League was designed to establish, make it plainly necessary for all friends of the League to vote for the repeal of these "wrong" and "pernicious" laws. This is the ONLY MORAL POSITION. When the fog of metaphysical declamation clears away, these solid moral truths remain:

1. It is gross "immorality in politics" to try to violate and prostitute the Constitution and laws of our country to purposes they were never intended to cover, and thereby,

2. To break down the only protection to liberty our fathers gave us, so that the freedom of thought, of speech, of the press, and even of our property from seizure, shall mean no more than the whim of a majority in Congress, which the "orthodox" can always control.

3. It is immoral to destroy our free post-office by establishing an espionage over it and the sentiments of the people, thus taking away the liberty, equality, and confidence of the people before and in the government; as the laws in question do and must do to be of any use at all.

4. It is immoral, and "wickedly wrong," to pass laws that can be executed only by "decoy," so as to make crime in order to punish it; as these laws do and must do, in the interest of officials, sects and agents.

5. It is "immoral in politics," and in every way, to pretend that Congress can create new crimes contrary to the Constitution, out of the simple act of mailing an inclosed paper, and that it can thus acquire unlimited Federal criminal jurisdiction over the lives, liberty, and property of the people.

6. It is immoral to represent and teach that good can come by making crimes and punishing them without regard to the Constitution, and in violation of the rights and liberties of the people.

7. It is immoral to add to and foster the immorality of obscenity by pretending that it can be suppressed by any post-office laws, when, in truth, they cannot reach it, and can only add to that "crime" the guilt of espionage, decoy, and illegality, while it can only be practically and legally suppressed by state laws, which will reach its printing, manufacture, and circulation in every possible way, as they hav done when enforced, for one hundred years.

8. It is immoral and fraudulent ("whatever the intention of the parties may be") to continue to represent that "reform" can get rid of the unlawfulness, and immoral and pernicious consequences inherent in these postal laws, without being able to show, or even trying to show, how it can be done.

9. It is immoral to represent that the liberties of the people are, or can be, as safe under the usurped and irresponsible criminal jurisdiction of the Federal Government as they would be in the states and before courts, and officers, and juries of the vicinage.

10. It is "immoral in politics" and in every way to make the Liberal League an instrument to sacrifice the real, permanent, constitutional rights and liberties of the people to a causeless obscenity panic, gotten up chiefly by those who wish now to use it, by means of these very laws, to crush liberty and Liberalism out of existence.

11 It is immoral to ask the Liberal League to become the accomplice of its adversaries in betraying the liberties of the people.

This is enough for those who will stop and think. For these moral and "crushing reasons," and because "the Liberal League is, as you say, shaped symmetrically," it must stand by "genuine morality in politics and freedom" by voting for the repeal of those laws; because they are really immoral, futile for good, the inevitable cause of outrages, injustice, and wrong—and in every way "inconsistent with the genius of free institutions," as the League declared at Philadelphia.

The five "crushing reasons" in your last editorial are exactly reversed by the above considerations, and, like stones too heavy for the heaver, roll back and crush the one who moved them.

Yes! You are right; the League "cannot afford to deny its own foundations." "It is built upon respect for morality," not upon hypocrisy, nor so-called "respectability," nor the breath of Mrs. Grundy, but upon good, true, substantial, common-sense, practical, constitutional "morality in politics" and out, "and on freedom," as the only cause and foundation of "virtue." If the Liberal League is true to its name, its cause, and itself, it will be not a sham nor a traitor, but a power to effect these results by the repeal of those laws which violate them all. Yours respectfully.

New York, Oct., 17, 1878.

CUPID'S YOKES AND THE HOLY SCRIPTURES CONTRASTED, a remarkable little pamphlet by Parker Pillsbury, in which the condemned passages from Heywood's "Cupid's Yokes," for which Mr. Heywood is now in prison, are contrasted with many of the indecent passages of the Bible, and which, in comparison, suffers severely. It is decidedly rich. Price, only ten cents. For sale at this office.

On Penitentiary Religious Instruction for Criminals.

BY R. C. TROWBRIDGE.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Will we ever cease teaching religion to criminals, and giv instruction to improve their condition and benefit them in this life?

The damaging effect of religious teachings upon persons in our penitentiaries and prisons as a producing cause of crime, and an incentive to its continuance, is little known to the masses of the people, who should be instructed upon this subject. Not only is the welfare of the criminal whom we wish to reform concerned, but also thousands of families from whom the criminals spring, and who severely suffer on their account; and, beside these, it is of the highest interest to every honest, industrious, law-abiding citizen, every tax-payer, and to the state. Many are the causes at work at the present time to produce criminals, and I would by no means argue this the only one; but from my own experience I do insist that such teachings are one of the most fruitful sources of vice and crime, and that the first work for every philanthropist, independent thinker, and all Liberals is to examine this subject and demand an immediate reform.

A person imprisoned is supposed to hav violated some law of the land, for which disobedience he is doomed to suffer, and not for disobeying the laws of the gods, excepting such as are included in the law of the land to which he is amenable—nor for any injustice done them, nor for the neglect of any supposed duty to them. Therefore, in performing his every duty as a good citizen, he is only required to obey the laws of the land, and is in no way accountable to any known or imaginary gods; neither should their claims be in the least regarded by a criminal nor suffered by his superiors to hav any influence over him till the law of the state is satisfied.

The orthodox religious teachings to criminals—for which the state pays liberally by taxing not only religionists but all non-religionists, Spiritualists, Liberals, Atheists, Deists, and other Infidels—is manifestly unjust to the majority of tax-payers, who do not half of them believe in these religions, but are compelled to pay for religious teachings to a convict which they believe to be delusive, injurious, and useless, not aiding in his reformation, but tending to make him still more vicious and debased.

As religions mean superstitions, and are connected with the supernatural and imaginative, pertaining to a supposed next world, with regard to which nothing can be actually demonstrated, they hav not necessarily any part with the teaching of natural morality—as we often find the most religious person to be the most immoral and vicious; therefore we can but conclude the strictly moral person is superior to the most religious enthusiast; and that the convict should be taught that a life of strict rectitude is to be sought after and prized above all religions.

Suppose there is a next world or another state of existence after this life; our relations to it and the best preparation for it hav never been so clearly defined by the gods or by man as to settle the thousand conflicting opinions about it, and what, I ask, has all this to do with the services of a criminal due the state for violation of her laws, or why will she allow anything so visionary to be taught to a convict?

The idea of religious instruction for a criminal must hav originated in the brain of a religious enthusiast, fanatic, lunatic, or knave; as there is nothing in such teachings calculated to make the criminal a better father, husband, son, or brother, and more obedient to the laws of the land, more regardful of his duties to society or of the rights of his fellows, or to create in him that self respect so necessary to his reformation.

I am well aware that many of the ideas I shall advance upon this subject are extremely radical, very unpopular, and will be branded by the orthodox Christian world as vile "heresy," poisonous Infidelity, and damnable soul-destroying doctrines, that should not be published or sent through the mails. And had we a few more evil-disposed, depraved ill-begotten, cruel, and heartless wretches like Anthony Comstock to secure the passage of a law to rob men of rights guaranteed them by the United States Constitution and shut them in prison, I should not be permitted to write my honest convictions upon this subject, or a Liberal editor like yourself be allowed to publish such an article containing sound, solid truth in the good old Truth Seeker.

Any person possessing good sense who is enlightened upon this subject, and not prejudiced in favor of some religion, will soon learn in the treatment of criminals by an intelligent, every-day observation of its demoralizing effects upon them to discard its use altogether—because debasing and corrupting even to the morals of a criminal, hurtful to good discipline, and a hindrance to his self-improvement But some one asks, "What is religion?" "Please define it?" and would expect me to giv a better definition of religion in a short article than the whole army of priests who hav been studying theology for thousands of years, and at present no two of them are able to agree as to what religion is, and yet persist that it is their exclusive right to take the people's money for teaching criminals that mysterious, undefinable, imaginary something, that calls their attention from the real to the illusive, and that instead of enlightening them in their ignorance of the laws of life and health, elevating them from their degradation, improving their condition and making them honest, industrious, and happy in this life; it says to the convict, "Prepare to die; get ready for the next world; it matters little about regaining your lost manhood and be again restored to friends and society; prepare to meet the gods whom you hav greatly offended; appease their wrath; secure their favor and a pardon from them for the wrong done to yourself and the injustice done to others." These are some of the teachings of religion, and judge ye what must be its fruits when taught to a law-breaker and a criminal.

By religion, as taught to convicts, I mean the same as others do—everything taught them by priests and ignorant enthusiastic religionists who discard those things that would reform the life and character of a convict here, and denounce those who would instruct them in useful knowledge as not fit to teach them because not caring for their souls—while these bigoted, intolerant, assuming imbeciles are suffered to instruct a criminal with their sophisms, mysteries, absurdities, and contradictions with regard to a supposed future existence, and their duties and relations to the gods that no living person can tell them anything positive about, but the more mysterious, the better fitted for the vilest and most debased criminal, furnishing a better cloak to conceal his crime.

We hav not to go back to ancient history to learn the effect of such religions upon many of our supposed best men while outside of prison, who hav all their lives had the benefit of the best religious instruction, and hav made religion a cloak to conceal the greatest schemes of swindling, forging, and embezzlement known in our day.

Many are the cases within the past two years—a Chace, Hathaway, Gilman, Winslow, and many others might be mentioned—some of the most villainous rapes and atrocious crimes, and even murders, hav been committed by preachers of this religion and others high in religious standing.

How far religious teachings hav influenced these men to destroy them, 'tis impossible to tell, but there is little doubt that religion has ruined them, and if religious teachings and religious beliefs will not preserve such intelligent men from crime, why will people who are supposed to hav common sense suffer religion to be taught to ignorant, depraved, and vicious criminals, when all that should be required of them is to become more obedient to the laws of the land?

In this article I can mention but few of the religious teachings given to convicts, and their influence on the various different organizations of brain and mind, and the effect upon the daily life, actions, and character of the criminal while in prison, or after going out, but for the present suffice it to say, as a general rule, the results are pernicious and disastrous to the well being of the convict; as those who will be good with religion would be better off without it, and the vicious and badly organized, as they become religious, usually grow more vicious, mean, and deceptive.

We wish now to examine the relations of the convict to the gods, and his duties to them, and their jurisdiction over our penitentiaries and prisons and also with regard to their assistance in framing and executing the laws of the land. I use the term gods to exclude none, from the Jewish Jehovah who is said to have governed this world alone for a few thousand years, to all the heathen gods, all real or imaginary gods that ever existed, and the term applies equally well to the Christian gods of the present day—one, or three.

We shall object to the gods as having any authority over a criminal, because no intelligent material gods are known to exist in this world superior to man, therefore, man should hav full jurisdiction over the criminal. We claim this reason of itself is sufficient to satisfy reasoning men.

Having no living, moving, material god that can be seen, and no spiritual god that can be demonstrated, we have none except in the visionary imaginations of the ignorant and superstitious.

This must hav been the reasoning of the framers of the United States Constitution which is a secular instrument having no god in it and needing none, and was framed wholly by men without the aid of the gods; all of our laws hav been made without their aid, and must be executed without their interference.

Thus our Constitution is secular and not religious, our laws are wholly secular and must ever remain so in the administration of justice to the law-abiding and the criminal, our common schools must remain entirely secular, our penitentiaries, prisons, and all public institutions, and religious teaching be confined to the family circle and the church where it properly belongs. The Christian gods are next in order.

Less than two thousand years ago the Jewish Jehovah was changed from one god to three, and then they became the Christians' gods, and remain so at the the present time. They are said to exist somewhere in the next world where we must go after death and be under subjection to them; and it is also claimed by Christians that they, a few thousand years since, created this world, and hav a right to control our law-making powers and wholly dictate to us our religions through the priests, who must be permitted to corrupt even our criminals with their religions in violation of the Constitution of these United States.

Science, nor the highest intelligence of man, has yet demonstrated the existence of these gods, but allowing their existence in another world, their relations to this does not appear, and we are positive they had nothing to do in framing our laws, and are useless in their administration, and it is preposterous to claim any such right for them, and far more rational to suppose they will be required to manage the laws and affairs of their own world if they hav any.

Thus the laws of the gods, whatever priests may interpret them to be, and their absolute and supreme authority upon persons convicted of the most atrocious and heinous crimes, must supersede the laws of the land, which our vilest most dangerous and debased criminals will hold in contempt, or certainly will consider them as secondary and not binding as the laws of the gods as expounded by the priests.

So long as the authority of the gods is allowed to supersede the laws of the land, or to interfere with the duties the state owes to her criminals to punish, instruct, assist, elevate, correct, and improve her unfortunate subjects, so long will they continue to sink deeper in crime and their numbers increase.

The state being secular should discard all religious teachings in prisons because they pay a premium on the commitment of crime, and the greatest criminals are often the most favored by the gods, although making no restoration to those they may hav shamefully and maliciously wronged; but by becoming pious and professing religion, they are relieved from the consequences of their terrible deeds and promised eternal happiness in a future life.

In this country we are now and hav been for many years reaping the results of these abominable and delusive teachings by furnishing our criminals with religion as a luxury to pamper their vicious and depraved moral appetites and sink them in iniquity and destroy their usefulness the same as tobacco, opium, and whiskey will debase and destroy the body. The duty society owes to her criminals demands an immediate secularization of every department of this government, and an entire separation of Church and State, and the best of teaching and instruction for her criminals with all religions left out.

Organization.—Liberty.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Though not a member of the Liberal League, I am earnestly with it in every effort to remove hindrances to growth, and strongly desire that at Syracuse it may quit its hitherto mistaken advocacy of a censorship of the press, and henceforth stand squarely for free thought on all questions of human interest. To undertake to supervise opinions in any way whatever, to limit or define freedom for others in deference to what we think right or proper, is impertinent tyranny which every clear-seeing reformer will resent with indignation. What was tried and failed against Quakers, Baptists, and witchcraft, in the "alien and sedition laws" against Jeffersonian democracy, and by Calhoun and his confederate slaveholders to suppress antislavery publications as "incendiary literature," has become a "legal" fact in Anthony Comstock's obscenity statutes, and we now behold the astounding spectacle of such prominent exponents of progress as F. E. Abbot and B. F. Underwood attempting an intellectual vindication of this most revolting mental tyranny! For the first time in American history a censorship of the press is zealously urged, and that by prominent reformers. If they represent the Liberal League, it better have never existed. The lineal descendants of John Calvin, who burned Servetus, they invoke all the rigor of persecution which public opinion now permits, and deliberately propose to punish those differing from them in opinions by fines and imprisonments! Notwithstanding all their kind words in my behalf, personally, it is their intrusive doctrine that "some law" is needed to supervise opinions committed to the United States mails which imprisons me here.

As Messrs. Andrews, Leland, and their associates of the Pantarchy truly show, any organization which does not welcome and encourage spontaneity forfeits its right and power to exist. Mrs. Colman clearly indicated, in the last Truth Seeker (Oct. 12th), that putting a price on the privilege of association in the form of a charter fee is invasive and impolitic. If Mr. Abbot supposes that is the best way to get money, promote co-operation, and create responsible constituencies, he is mistaken. The strongest and most successful reformatory asssociation this or any other nation ever knew—the American Antislavery Society—was strictly voluntary, exacting no such "returning-board" conditions as the Executive of the Liberal League imposes. When, fresh from the university, an incipient orthodox preacher, I asked Mr. Garrison for the conditions of membership, saying to him that I would like to sign the Constitution and become a member of his society, he replied: "We keep no record of membership; if it is your impulse to work with us, that is enough." Edmund Quincy, President of the Massachusetts Antislavery Society, and next to Col. Wm. B. Greene the ablest presiding officer I ever saw, always left conditions of membership to be decided by the individual consciences of those present when he put a question to vote. The Republican party, in its palmiest days, when it could boast of such men as Chase, Seward, Fessenden, Trumbull, Lincoln, and Sumner, cohered so entirely by attraction and mutual interest that Horace Greeley could truly say, "We have no leaders, for we are all leaders." If the Liberals at Syracuse know their time and the select, serious significance of the mighty work in hand, they will reject all "returning-board" yokes and stand fast in the natural liberty which is the indispensable condition of associative power.

As Mr. Verity ably showed in your last issue, this effort to discriminate against freedom of opinion in morals while asserting it in religion is absurd and monstrous—persecution of Freelovers being the logical, inevitable result. Though a Freelover for twenty years, having lectured and published on all phases of reform, no one even questioned my ability to use chaste language before Comstock's "law" was invoked to crush me. The evil is not in the form of the law, but in the law itself, which, however defined, is a mischievous engine of oppression. Those who say Freelove favors obscenity know little of the philosophy of liberty or of the conditions of purity and harmony in domestic life. "Truly free only as we are divinely bound" purity is impossible without liberty, which gives opportunity to learn and observe the laws of life, leads to knowledge, sobriety, continence. Repression engenders obscenity; liberty alone cures it. The charge that those who favor repeal thereby indorse Freelove is too shallow to require refutation. Of the increasing thousands who, from Maine to California, gather under the banner of "Repeal," few indorse my individual opinions. The grandeur of this movement is especially impressive because it asserts, not the right of one person merely to think, but the right of all citizens to freedom of conscience. To permit others to think as we do is nothing; tyrants do that. But when you and W. S. Bell, at Watkins, risked fines and imprisonment to vindicate Josephine Tilton's right to sell her printed opinions you revealed the intelligence, courage, and character which constitute the living, growing strength of genuine Liberalism. Remembering how much we all owe to Mr. Abbot for his great services in the formation and growth of the Liberal League, but mindful also that without liberty it is a body without soul, I earnestly hope that, true to the noble old motto of The Boston Investigator, "Universal mental liberty!" its voice at Syracuse will be firm for the immediate and unconditional repeal of the Comstock statutes. Yours ever,

Cell Fifty-two, the Jail, Dedham, Mass., Oct. 15, Y. L. 6. } EZRA HOAR HEYWOOD.

THE TRIAL FOR HERESY.—CONTINUED.

ZION HIL, N. J., Oct. 7, 1878.

MR. EDITUR: I wil now proseed to giv yu a further deskripshun ov the church trial which waz held over yure waward humbul servant.

After being kalld upon by the Elder, Sister Jones roze and showd in her manner and air that she felt a good deel of embarasment. She opend the kase in about this wize:

"Brethren and Sisters ov Zion church, yu ma think a little strange why I hav taken such an activ part in preferring charges aganst our respekted brother, Deeken Skidmore, but I want to ashure yu that it iz from a sense ov duty and nothing else. I do not wish to deny that the Deeken haz dun a grate deel for our church in wun wa and anuther. I wil not deny that when munny haz ben short and hard to be razed he haz kum forward like a good Kristyan and dun akording to the meens which God haz givn him. But he iz not the only wun that haz givn to this church, and hoo haz struggled to keep it abuv the waves ov trial and afflikshun. I no he haz not at eny time givn more than he had to giv with, and sum others hav dun about az wel az that. I no that we at our house hav dun sumthing to keep up this church. It iz very tru that we hav not dun neer az much in the wa ov munny az Deeken Skidmore haz, but we hav dun what we kood, and, az I sed, he haz not dun enny more than that. But what if the Deeken haz given more than enny other member ov this church, duz that proov that he shal be alloud tu destroy the church by introdusing the most damnabel kind ov heresy into it that ever waz hurd ov? What good duz it do for a kow to giv a big pale ov milk if she haz to up and kik it over az soon az it iz milkd? Now that iz just what Deeken Skidmore iz doing, and I am trying to sho up the evil ov hiz waze, to snatch him, if possibel, from the destrukshun he iz rushing into, and at all events to keep up the kredit ov our church by keeping heresy out ov it. If I don't giv as much munny az sum, I wil fite aganst the Devil. I wil fite aganst the seduktiv enemy ov unbeleef that wood draw us all down to hel wer it possibul.

"Yu all no whot the charge aganst Bro. Skidmore iz based on. He haz departed from the fathe ov Zion to the extent that he iz taking an awful wiked Infidel paper, kalld THE TRUTH SEEKER, evry week; and, whot iz wurse stil, he writes for it, and he haz got other peepel to take the same vile sheet, and 2 ov them ar members ov this church. Iz this a small matter, my brothers and sisters in Kriste? Iz it a small thing for the first deeken ov our church, which haz ben established now ni upon 30 yeers, to go after stranje gods and to bring into our naberhood and our church the worst heresy that kan be imagined? Do yu no, my frends, whot kind ov a paper this TRUTH SEEKER iz? Why, it iz edited and published by an old Infidel by the name ov Bennett, and he rites and prints in hiz paper the awfulest stuff that eny human being ever red. He don't belieev in God, angels, nor devils, and yet he allows the devil to rite for hiz paper, and the devil's letters appear meny times when Deeken Skidmore's do. Now, izn't that a pritty state ov things for the devil and our first deeken to be riting for the same paper, and the vile sheet to be taken rite in among us and red by the members ov our church? Kan enybody think stranje that I stand up for karakter, respektability, and truth? Ar we all to flote helplessly down the kurrent ov damnashun and no wun raze the voise ov alarm and kry out about the danjer that iz ahed? Besides being wiked, Infidelity is vary disrespektabul. If even thare iz sum truth in Infidelity, I wood not hav enything to do with it, bekauz it iz not respektabul, and I do insist that enything that the first sitizens ov our kuntry do not reseev az respektabul and fit for them to aksept shood not be tolerated in our church for wun moment. So I hav set my fase aganst Infidelity and disrespektability, and that iz whot made me enter komplante to Elder Goodly about Deeken Skidmore. I saw that wiked TRUTH SEEKER lying on hiz tabel, whare he had just ben reeding it. He konfesses that he subskribed for the paper for 3 munths, and we no that he rites for it regularly. Now, this being the kase, I leev it with yu all if Bro. Skidmore iz not gilty of heresy, and whether he aut not to be suspended from the offis he fils until he puts awa the sin that he haz kommitted, and if he wil not do that, to then sever hiz konnekshun with this church.

"I don't want eny wun to mistake the motiv which aktuates me in whot I hav sed and stil hav to sa upon this subjekt. I no sum wil sa I had better look at home and pull the weeds out ov my own garden before I undertake with my nabers'. I am not unmindful ov the fakt that members ov my own family hav not always ben as perfekt az tha mite be, and I no wel enuf sum ov yu wil think ov it while I am speeking heer; but let me tel yu that I don't think those littel family matters ov mine hav enything to do with the heresy of Deeken Skidmore. Whot my family hav dun tha wil hav to anser for themselves, and whot Deeken Skidmore haz dun he wil hav to anser for himself; and that iz whot I hope wil be konsidered here to-da. I hold that he iz doing very rong in taking that wiked TRUTH SEEKER while he holds hiz pozishun az deeken ov this Kristyan church and hands to us evry month the body and blud ov Jesus in the form of bred and wine, which ov korse we no to be the real body and the real blud ov our Savyur. I kannot help feeling that this matter iz ov grate konsekwense, and that not another da aut to go over our heds without probing this thing to the very bottom. I hav sed in part whot I feel upon the subjekt, and hope others wil be az fre to speek thare minds az I hav ben. I ma hav a fu more wurds to sa before the meeting iz over, but wil now lissen to whot others ma hav to offer us."

After thus freing herself Mrs. Jones took her seet, looking very imperius and a good deel flushed in the fase. I notised she kast a rather severe look at my wife just az she sat down, az much az to sa, "Thare! I ges I hav about uzed up yure TRUTH SEEKER husband. It ma be I wil take yu down a peg or 2."

It waz kwiet for 2 minits after Mrs. Jones took her seet. Nobody seemd inklind to sa enything, and Elder Goodly lookt at Mrs. Kragehed rather intently, and asked her, in hiz blandest manner, if she had enything to sa. She aroze rather sloly, and sed she did not no az she had enything vary speshal on her mind. It waz her intenshun to leed a good Kristyan life, to follo the tru fathe, and to work fathefully in her own vinyard. She did not beleev it waz rite for eny ov us to abandon the old landmarks or to run after nu noshuns or nu doktrins. When sister Jones first told her about Deeken Skidmore's taking an Infidel paper and riting for it, it shokd her vary much, and she felt az tho, if Bro. Skidmore fel, thare wer nun hoo kood konsider themselvs safe. She waz extreemly sorry to heer that so good a brother az Deeken Skidmore shood so far forget hiz duty to himself and to hiz God az to subskribe for a paper that waz direktly oppozed to hiz holy relijun. But she kood not think that the good brother ment eny harm in whot he had dun. He did not seem eny different or eny less a Kristyan the last 2 munths than he had before. She waz afrade the akkuzashun aganst the good brother waz exajerated and karred most to far. She waz inklind to think that the deeken wood soon see hiz fault and korrekt it himself. She did not beleev it waz nesessary to treet him harshly or to kondem him with to much severity. Thare wer, in her mind, but fu hoo wer perfekt and without fault.

Thus the good sister went on for 10 or 15 minits, and I waz plezd that she waz so kareful ov my feelings. Yu perhaps wil remember that I told yu that Sam Kragehed iz paying attenshun to our Suzan, and we all think he iz very ankshus to hav it a match. Wife thinks that littel surkumstanse had sumthing to do with the muther's mildnes ov remark. A good meny expekted she wood be more seveer.

Mrs. Studley waz the next speeker. She dwelt strongly on the grate importanse ov manetaning the korrekt fathe and the grate danjer ov induljing in douts and unbeleef. It waz her opinyun that dout and lak ov fathe wood sink soles deeper in hel than eny other krimes. She sed God hated unbeleef more intensely than all uther sins. He wood forgiv murderers and robbers and adulterers before he wood thoze hoo harbered unbeleef in the kardinal doktrins which evry Kristyan must beleev or take thare lot with the damd. She thot, to, that it waz far wurse for wun hoo had had the lite ov the gospel in hiz sole to giv wa to darknes than for wun hoo had never reseevd such favor from heven. She tharefore thot that it waz far wurse for an offiser in the church to giv wa to unbeleef and heresy than for wun hoo had never had such privilejes. In her opinyun no member ov this church aut to take an Infidel paper in hiz hand or lissen wun moment to the seduktiv arguments which an unbeleever in Kriste was kapabel ov uzing, much les the first Deeken. She felt that I had dun vary wrong, and she hoped I wood repent in sakkloth and ashes and put far from me the evil paper which had kaused all this trubbel. She had not a partikel ov dout that the man hoo wood print such a paper az THE TRUTH SEEKER waz the wikedest man in the world and deserved to hav hiz porshun with thoze hoo ar to be kast in outer darkness where thare iz to be nout else but weeping, waling, and nashing ov teeth, and that if that wiked editur iz kapabel ov dragging down with him to the rejuns ov deth the sole ov good Deeken Skidmore, it wood be like Satan enkompassing the ruin ov the angel Gabriel. But she waz wun hoo kood not beleev that Deeken Skidmore waz to us lost and she wood not entertain such an opinyun. She beleevd this timely meeting wood kause the Deeken to sense the danger he waz in and to put far awa the vile thing he had taken to hiz boozum. She shood continue to pra for that konsummashun.

Thus, Mr. Editur, the speekers went on. Wun after another freed thare minds in respekt to yure humbel servant; but I kannot tel yu more about it this time. I think I kan giv it all in my next, for yu must understand that in spite ov whot sister Jones, sister Studley, and all the rest ov them hav to sa about the grate rong ov my riting yu, I shal kontinu rite on riting yu regularly til I am myself konvinsed that it iz rong.

Beleev me, yures truly, JOEL SKIDMORE,
1st Deeken ov Zion Hil Baptist Church.

Address to the Liberal Leagues.

OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE NATIONAL DEFENSE ASSOCIATION, 34 BOND ST., NEW YORK, Oct. 14, 1878.

To the Auxiliary Liberal Leagues:

Greeting: In view of the important issue to be decided upon by the National Liberal League at its Second Annual Congress, called to be held at Syracuse, October 26th and 27th, it seems advisable to make a statement of the true position of those who oppose the re-election of Mr. Francis Ellingwood Abbot as President of the League.

Mr. Abbot opposes the repeal of either state or national "Comstock" laws, and charges the "repealers" with favoring obscenity and Freelove.

The repealers ask for the repeal of the United States "Comstock" law of 1873, and the improvement of the state law by adding a definition of what is called "obscenity." Mr. Abbot advocates "definition," so the issue is simply this: Shall we ask for the repeal of the United States "Comstock" law?

The Defense Committee on investigation find that all the outrages that hav been committed hav occurred under the United States "Comstock" Postal Law, and that this law is entirely different from the state law in its nature and operation.

1. It is an unconstitutional espionage over the mails and post-office, and destroys the free post-office, without which a free press and free speech are empty words.

2. The "Comstock" Postal Law of 1873 can only be enforced by "decoy," which is simply a system of committing one crime to detect another.

3. The United States law is insufficient, because obscene matter can be sent by express or other means beyond its reach.

4. The law of 1873 givs the United States Government a criminal jurisdiction which is unconstitutional, and is enforced by officers, judges, and juries belonging in effect to a government beyond the reach of the people, and practically irresponsible to them. This has been the cause and source of all of the outrages.

5. The enforcement of this United States "Comstock" law has been such a continuous history of outrages that this Association, called into existence to resist it, knows whereof it speaks when it urges its immediate repeal, because it is a source of continual danger.

6. This law is the means by which the guarantees of liberty in the United States Constitution are violated; and, if established as a precedent, it entirely deprives them of any effect as a limit of the powers of Congress over free thought and a free press.

7. Before this "Comstock" law of 1873 was enacted, the evil of obscenity had been removed under the state laws, by the action of state officials and of the press; and if any such evil exists now, it can be readily removed by the same means again.

8. The issue of the repeal of this law has been forced upon the Liberal League, so that it cannot now be avoided without giving its decision practically in favor of the "Comstock" law, thus indorsing the espionage and decoy system which destroys a free post-office, and with it, practically, free thought and free press.

Mr. Abbot is in error in charging the "repealers" with a desire to repeal all laws against obscenity, and he evidently is using this with his other absurd charge of advocating "Freelove," as so much dust which he is throwing into the eyes of Liberals while he steals a march on them. In this he is continuing his former error, in which he, as editor of The Index, influenced other Liberal leaders to oppose the Wakeman petition, which was signed by seventy thousand Liberals, and he was the chief means of its defeat. Such a man is unsafe as a leader at this critical time, when a crafty religious sect is seeking the aid of the Government in persecuting religious liberty of opinion and threatening all true liberty in this nation. He was not with you at the Heywood indignation meeting at Boston, and he has not the Liberal cause at heart.

His successor should be a man whose principles are well known and revered by all Liberals—such a man as the Hon. Elizur Wright, who is not afraid of doing his duty at all times, and who is most courageous when danger threatens.

A. L. RAWSON, President.

Letters from Friends.

SALAMANCA, N. Y., Oct. 19, 1878.

DEAR MR. BENNETT: I am so much pleased with the following letter from Mr. J. H. Cook, a veteran Freethinker, that I wish you would publish it in THE TRUTH SEEKER as soon as your space will permit. I hav sent him the blanks and instructions called for, and hope he may succeed in the good work of organizing, a Liberal League.

THE LETTER.

COLUMBUS, KAN., Sept. 28, 1878.

H. L. GREEN, Dear Sir: I hav often thought I would write you and will wait no longer. I take great interest in the old Empire State as I lived there thirty-four years, and suffered much persecution, as a man and teacher, for my opinions, but not near as much as I hav here. I hav been prosecuted and mobbed, my life has been in peril, and I hav paid dearly for my bold defense of the truth. I am old and poor, out on the prairie, but I am rich in truth. I am glad your F. A. of your state has been organized, and that Liberalism is gaining ground in old New York. I think you are entitled to great credit for your services and expenses in getting up the Watkins Convention, which with the arrests, I think, will wake up the stupid Liberals everywhere and inspire them to do something for the cause of truth and freedom. Our enemies are all alive to the inroads we are making upon their absurd and inhuman creeds and laws, and "we must fight" as Patrick Henry said, with all the mental power we hav.

I am sorry to learn that the Convention left a debt. I do not see what the debt is for. Was it for rent of a room in which to hold the meeting, for printing and advertising? If Liberals would open their pockets, those who are able, as much as the bigots do, books and papers could circulate, and meetings be held four times as much as they are. I wish I had some money to help the Liberal cause in various ways, but I am so poor I can hardly raise stamps. I send twenty-five cents to make me a member of the N. Y. F. A., but shall probably never meet with it.

Please send me the necessary papers to form a Liberal League as I may be able to get up one in this county.

In Cherokee, in the southeast corner of the state, I hav fought a good fight and sowed the seed of truth and liberality, and others must take my place and reap what I hav sown.

Go on, Bro. Green, in your noble work, and I will bless you and so will future generations saved from priestcraft, error, and bigotry. Yours truly, J. H. COOK.

The money asked for is to pay the expenses of some of our poor speakers who came a great ways to attend the Convention and to pay some expenses at Watkins. Up to this date (Oct. 12th) $7.50 has been sent in. H. L. G.

"HOLY BIBLE ABRIDGED."

SNEDEKERVILLE, PA., Oct. 10, 1878.

"The Holy Bible Abridged" seems to be stirring up some feeling in the minds of Liberals, when it was to hav been expected none but the saints would hav rushed to rescue their sacred treasure from the hands of the ungodly Infidels. But it is from the other quarter the attack comes. Let it come. We think you are able to stand it. The more blows the better if they are determined to giv you no peace. Passing over the first three mistakes made by the editor of the Vineland, N. J., Independent, viz, "The Freethinkers' Convention, which closed at Watkins, N. Y., on Tuesday, broke up in the arrest of D. M. Bennett," etc., with this correction, the Convention closed on Sunday evening, and the arrests were made Saturday, P.M., therefore the Convention did not break up in the arrests. Permit me to hint at the fourth, fifth, and sixth misstatements, viz., "Arrest for selling a book . . . mainly composed of extracts from the Bible," for the selling of which book he (Mr. Bennett) was not arrested, neither any one else, nor was any such book sold there.

"The Freethinkers . . . say it ("Bible Abridged") is mainly composed of extracts from the Bible." The Freethinkers say no such thing, knowingly; for those who do say it, if any such there are, must either not hav read the book, or else do not know what is or what is not in the Bible. And such seems the condition of this editor, or else he would know that every word in the "Bible Abridged" stands precisely as in the unabridged without being transposed or garbled in the least. So much for that false statement—number seven.

"Hunting for some paragraph . . . offensive to delicate and refined ears," etc. Why, Mr. Bennett! did this editor never go to school in his youthful days, when in the New Testament reading-lesson he came pop right upon some passage that made the blood mount to his cheek, boy that he was, while the girls could not raise their eyes for the whole day from very shame? If he never did, we hav. Was he, or we, "hunting for crude and obscene passages" then? Has he, or have we or others, been hunting for them since? What right hav such passages in a reading-book for children? or what right hav children with such a reading-book? This independent editor seems not the least worried about these passages being there, which he admits, but because some "man" has hunted them out (with a pack of hounds, we presume, they were so difficult to find) and exposed them. If they are so dirty outside of the sacred record, pray, are they clean inside? Did taking them out from other portions of the Bible and preserving their sense intact make them filthy? Will he explain how these obscene passages became obscene? Was it by being transferred from the Bible that the American Bible Society published in the Bible House in New York city, into a book that D. M. Bennett published across the way, a few rods distant, in his own office, with his own type, set up by his own workmen? How alarming this change! Surely, all who read this portion of God's holy Word, set up in Mr. Bennett's office, will "be tenfold more the child of hellish bigotry after their conversion than before," while the refined, Christian ladies who hug the remainder of the Bible, and all this included, to their pious bosoms as they reverently walk to and from the house of God on a Sunday, will be blessed by the holy contact, and in the conversion of their children through Sunday-school teaching from its sacred pages, yea, be thus rewarded for their prayerful zeal and devoted parental piety. Yes; those Christian fathers and mothers who desire to hav their children receive instruction out of God's holy Word, and who place the sacred volume in their infantile hands, and who urge them to pattern after the godly men and women of the Bible (who would not be out of prison to-day in New Jersey cities if they could be caught), will lift up their hands in holy horror to think any one would hav the blasphemous audacity to presume thus to make selections from its pure (!) contents. And while they will place the unabridged Bible on their parlor centertable, bound in gilt and morocco, with silver clasps, this perfect little paper-covered abridgment falls under their righteous condemnation. Neither does it escape the unholy wrath of some Infidels.

While the Bible societies, through missionary enterprise, contemplate sending this Bible to every land on the face of the earth, and planting its doctrines in every breathing human heart on the globe, some of our Liberals are snuffing up their noses "dirt," and talking and writing about the "Hebrew Scriptures . . . offensive to delicate and refined ears." If the whole is fit to read and be thus circulated, how can a part be so vile? And to say that this part in the "Holy Bible Abridged" is obscene, is to admit the whole question that the book from which it is taken is obscene, or that the passages are just as obscene in that book as in this, and therefore the book is under the ban of obscene literature, and those dealing in it ought to be prosecuted under that law.

But we leave the subject for this time, asking the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER and other radical papers not to be alarmed at the refinement (!) of some of our Liberal friends (!) who hav no fears of the Bible *un*abridged converting any one to "hellish bigotry," etc, but who are terrified out of all "sympathy for that Radicalism, or that man, which (or who) will spend days and weeks hunting for some paragraphs," etc., which Radicalism, or man, can very well afford to dispense with such sympathy.

Now, Freethinkers and Liberals, we hope you will purchase this book by the scores and the hundreds, read it, and circulate it among your pious friends and neighbors in order that they may know what their Bible contains. Urge them to read it in connection with their *un*abridged, compare the two, and determine for themselves if justice has not been done to the sacred Scriptures in the compilation of the "Holy Bible Abridged" Let edition follow edition, till everywhere will this little volume be found lying beside the Bible; send it to clergymen and prominent religious persons by mail; let the Young Men's Christian Association not be ignorant of its existence or its contents; be as active in circulating this as they are in circulating theirs, and let them feel that the dark places in their book shall be exposed while they claim for every word between its covers plenary, divine inspiration and urge its acceptance upon every soul in order to insure individual salvation, not one word of which is not "able to make them wise unto salvation; for "all Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness" (2 Tim. 15, 16). ELLA E. GIBSON.

RIVERVIEW, IOWA, Oct. 2, 1878.

BRO. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I had, after debating the matter over in my own mind, finally concluded that I could not take THE TRUTH SEEKER another year the times were so hard here in this new country of grass-hoppers, but after reading the last copy my resolve was somewhat shaken and finally broke down altogether, and now I am resolved, though I should be only able to send ten cents at a time, to take the paper so long as it opposes the Christian doctrines of angry Gods, roaring devils, flying gentlemen, Holy Ghosts, burning hells, and golden heavens. I am not in love with gold; you see, a greenback heaven would be far better. I am, to say the least, proud of THE TRUTH SEEKER, of its manly defense against all its enemies, but regret exceedingly that there could be found in all this land one man of Liberal views who, professing to believe in free thought, free speech, and free press, could so far forget himself as to sanction the imprisonment of any one for speaking his honest convictions, and that man an editor. What's the matter? The green-eyed monster, or what? Oh, consistency, thou art a jewel! But you and Leland hav both hit your mark, and he may not attempt to feel your pulse again. Yours ever for truth, JOB WHITHEAD.

NEW ALBANY, IND., Sep. 4, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I am a girl of seventeen and an Atheist.

At the age of fourteen I began to be skeptical, at sixteen I was an Infidel, and at seventeen I am an Atheist.

I do not demand that every one believe as I do. I giv to every one the freedom of thought, and the right to express their thoughts, and I claim the same privilege for myself.

I am happy in my belief, although I deny the existence of a God. Yes, far happier than some who believe in and worship the orthodox God, which I consider a creation of their own brain.

Even if I believed that their God really existed I would rather suffer the torment in hell than to worship a being whom every rational mind must consider (judging from the Bible) a contemptible fiend.

I believe in religion. I think every one should be religious, but being religious does not consist in being a Christian. My ideas are that to be religious one must do all the good he can, do right because it is right to do right, because it makes us happier and those around us happier.

Very respectfully, JEAN INGERSOLL.

CENTREVILLE, UTAH, Oct 11, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I hav read "Cupid's Yokes" carefully through with calm reflection, and must honestly say I hav failed to discover the first word of obscenity in it, although some of the reading differs from my views, and to send a man to prison for publishing that book is a scandalous and infernal outrage to the welfare of society, besides an outrageous disgrace to the Constitution of this broad land of the United States of America, but hark! methinks that is not the main bottom of this infernal Comstock secret. No, Mr. Bennett, but it is the cutting truths of Infidelity, reason, and science, that you are fearlessly publishing and sending to all parts of this continent of America, and Tony and his ilk are feeling it keenly that their infernal priestcraft is in sad danger, and they think something must be done, or they will lose their useless, lazy life of ease. I shall next expect to hear of you and others, perhaps Col. Ingersoll, being arrested for undressing yourselves to go to bed at night, so keep a sharp eye on Tony before taking your shoes off, or he will swear it obscene, and then Mumbo Jumbo his prayers over, and tell his god of it. You know his god and his son are terrible fellows in the butchering line. Well, Mr. Bennett, I hav exercised a good deal of reflection since I heard of the imprisonment of Mr. Heywood for exercising his god-given right as a citizen and a man, and to arrest you and Mr. Bell, and the worthy little lady, Miss Tilton, for so frivolous a thing, while here in this territory, obscenity and adultery is practiced day by day, and hour by hour, by these infernal old Mormon lechers, year in and year out, and no law seems to interfere. Also many cruel murders hav been committed by these Mormon priests in the days of the past, of which that horrid Mountain Meadow Massacre is only one, and the murderers are still at large. No law seems to interfere. Just think of it. Only one man has suffered the penalty of the law for that horrid crime, after being at large for twenty years, and his conviction was only secured through strategy. I mean J. D. Lee. The rest of his helpmates are still at large! No law seems to interfere. Yet men and women can be arrested for publishing their honest convictions, and sentenced to long terms of imprisonment and fine. Has justice fled from this boasted land of freedom, and left Comstock with others of his infernal class of parsons, and humbugs, and lechers, to dictate the affairs of the people? If so, I must say they hav a tight job on hand. My letter is getting too long, so I will close, hoping that you, and Mr. Bell, and Miss Tilton, are in the best of health and spirits. May THE TRUTH SEEKER get into the hands of every lover and admirer of truth, honesty, and right, is the true and sincere wish of a Freethinker. WILLIAM WILLIAMS.

CEDAR FALLS IOWA, Oct. 14, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Herewith comes the amount due you for THE TRUTH SEEKER for the year 1878. I could not send it very well before. Put my name to the Declaration of Rights, and in as bold a hand, and as legible, as did Hancock his to the Declaration of Independence. Please send me a couple of slips for signatures, and I will obtain what names I can. I say, go for the repeal of those Jesuitical laws known as the Comstock laws. I am one of the seventy thousand who signed your petition, and think I knew what I was about when I wrote my name. Abbot beats me. How, in the name of Liberalism, he can oppose the repeal of said laws is more than I can account for. "Hold him level." You can do it. You hav two to his one for backers. His case may not be hopeless. It may be like a case of sore eyes that hav become so sensitive to the rays of light that but a little can be admitted at a time. He may be able to see all right after a while, but it is evident, to me at least, that he is wearing colored goggles yet.

Yours with much respect, H. M. ADAMS, M D.

ROCHESTER, N. Y., Oct. 15, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Friend: I want to thank thee for the books and documents containing so much excellent and important information. Mr. Austin and myself hav gladly received them and circulated them to the best of our ability. Our Rochester League has elected five delegates to the Syracuse Congress, with each an alternate, and hav sent them to Boston for ratification. The delegates are all as true as steel, which I am a little proud of, as our League is largely made up of women. Mr. Abbot told us last year that they, at Boston, were afraid of women, for the reason that they were so pious and under the influence of priests and ministers. If that is true, here is an exception. My friend, D. M. Bennett, the equal rights of woman, civil, political, and religiously, how has this great reform Liberal League practiced the second plank in its platform—"all citizens absolutely equal?" I became a member of the first congress of the Liberal League held in Philadelphia on the ground of this representation, but they failed then; but having large hope in the justice and humanity of our brother man, I tried again, and helped to form an auxiliary Liberal League in Rochester, which sent its delegates to the second congress held in our city. Our credentials were received, after which we received about the same treatment—were no more noticed than so many horse-blocks until the names for a finance committee were called for, when, behold, my name was mentioned. I confess, I declined accepting the necessary, but, to me, very disagreeable appointment with something kindred to a feeling of indignation, and gave, pointedly, my reasons. Now, I hav heard of an adage, "Three times and out."

I am going again, if health and strength will permit; and if I find it still, the third time (the Congress of the Liberal League), determined to reject the strength that woman's incorporation could not fail to giv it, I shall, until convinced otherwise, believe it to be a fraud as regards woman, and no more worthy of our co-operation, as women, than Anthony Comstock and his abettors.

Oh, I do so hope that there will be enough strong, conscientious men and women in attendance at this Congress to carry this momentous woman question. If there are not, I think a division must came, and perhaps as well now as later. All natural and spiritual science teaches us that this is the law. Our dependence must be equal; neither can prosper alone; we must stand or fall together. I wish everybody was as much in earnest as I am, and could see it as clearly as I do. I am hoping to be able to go to the Syracuse meeting, though I do not improve in strength as fast as I wish I could. Very truly thy friend, AMY POST.

JERICHO, L. I., Oct. 10, 1878.

FRIEND D. M. BENNETT; I think thee can hardly be aware of the great commotion, and I am inclined almost to add, devastation, thy TRUTH SEEKER and kindred publications are making in our village and among God's people at large. I had for some time past been wondering at the sparseness of our "First-day" meetings and a visible lukewarmness manifested in a certain portion of regular attendants. I accidentally, as it were, found out the cause. Calling upon a friend, I was told at his dwelling I would find him at the barn taking his usual "nooning." I found him in his barn, but not as I supposed, reposing lazily on a bed of hay, but earnestly reading aloud to his hands thy last voluminous work "The Champions of the Church." He vainly tried to cover it in the straw when I appeared. It was of no use to conceal the nature of the work he had been reading. Thy TRUTH SEEKER and a work by thee entitled "The World's Sages" lying around told the whole story. In truth, I had heard of thee before as one given to carnal reasoning on divine matters. Our business over, my friend and neighbor prevailed on me—not without much misgiving on my part—to accept of several back numbers of thy TRUTH SEEKER. I hav read them, and I will say they are startlingly bold, and provoke thought and investigation. Of one thing I can observe. Thy labors in arousing people to reason are less to be feared with our society of Friends than those whose vitality rests on the hireling priesthood. I wonder at the heroism with which thee traces the operation and motives to action down to their first principles, and in stripping the flimsy coverings from venerable church mysteries and dogmas. But permit me to observe that although thee can boast of many able and shrewd reasoners, I cannot as yet follow some of them to their conclusions. What may yet take place I cannot even divine, for I even now look back with amazement how heretical I hav become.

I sometimes think myself as somewhat in a condition resembling the pious John Bunyan on his toilsome pilgrimage, loaded down with his pack. But I must say I somewhat differ with the old saint. I hav a curiosity to know the contents of my pack. Will thee, friend Bennett, help to unload, through thy publications, the contents of my ponderous bundle?

For reasons which I cannot now explain to thee, we hav

yet to purchase our TRUTH SEEKER in rather a roundabout way—but we must hav it. Thine, J. H.

DUNKIRK, N. Y., Oct. 6, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT: I feel some like Mr. Green about the war in our camp, but, unlike Mr. Van Buskirk, I care not how many scrapes you get into with the emmisaries of the Church of Christ, if you only win. My impression is that Comstock & Co. hav made a better fight behind the obscenity dodge than they could in any other way. They hav evidently chosen their own battle field. It is curious that men who so persistently distribute the gross Hebrew smut that is contained in the Bible should hav their feelings shocked at anything. I thank you for sending Mr. Wakeman's speech, but hope you won't send the extracts from the Bible, for I certainly would not hav it in the house, and if I carried it to the barn I expect the horse would become disgusted.

Abner Kneeland was crushed out for what was termed blasphemy. It indicates progress when it is found necessary to strike from behind something else. I like Mr. Abbot's Nine Demands of Liberalism, but fear he is a difficult man to work with. Until our internal dissensions are healed we will make slow progress.

Being one of the 70,000, I found in circulating that petition (a business I am not much used to) that the first signatures were the hardest to get; that the longer the columns, the easier they were obtained. When it is popular to be an Infidel, you will find enough of them. The charge of blasphemy has become harmless, but the charge of obscenity is still potent. It is, I think, a fortress we ought not to hav been obliged to storm.

I inclose my year's subscription with this, which is all I can do at present. Yours, etc., HENRY SEVERANCE.

125 BAYVIEW ST., MILWAUKEE, WIS., Oct. 1, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Please appropriate $2.00 of the inclosed $10.00 to the National Defense Fund and place the balance to my credit on account of books and papers.

The "Champions," ordered in my last, came duly in good order—a splendid work, though you haven't done justice to James I. He should hav had credit for his diabolical invention of pulling out fingernails with pincers and thrusting needles into the flesh to extort confession of sorcery, as he did in the case of Dr. Fian, who was accused of raising a storm at sea with intentions of drowning His Majesty and bride on their return from Denmark. (See Lecky's History of Rationalism in Europe, vol i, p. 123.)

I see Mrs. Slenker has written a very just and appreciative notice of "Simon Christianus;" but she has not noticed in her article—though it doubtless has not escaped her attention—the parable in the fourteenth chapter. It is a masterpiece, and contains a "whole body of divinity"—a complete system of the popular theology in a nutshell.

Yours respectfully, ALMOND OWEN.

UPPER MATTOLE, CAL., Oct. 7, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Put my name down as one that indorses the stand taken by Elzur Wright. While I live I intend to buy and read any book that I want, and I don't intend to ask Anthony Comstock, or any other man, whether I may or not. I hope you and the others arrested at Watkins will come out all right, and I think you will. It seems to me that the religious bigots hav carried the Inquisition about as far as they will be permitted to in this day and age of the world. Yours truly, A. A. HADLEY.

HARTFORD, CONN., Oct. 1, 1878.

MR. EDITOR: We should like to ask if Mr. Talmage when he advocates Comstockism imagines for one moment that the woman who saved so many of her sex from being branded for life was not doing as much good as though she were shielding men from disgrace. We venture to say that if an institution existed for the purpose of benefiting men to such an extent, there would be no Comstocks to interfere. If these unwise women had the boldness to publish the names of their paramours, we think many a pulpit would be deserted. But for some unaccountable reason women are obliged to bear all the disgrace, while the worse offenders are scot-free. META.

A LETTER TO H. L. GREEN.

WEST WINFIELD, N. Y. Oct. 21, 1878.

MR. GREEN: As Chairman of the Executive Committee of the National Liberal League, I address you. I do not expect to be at the Second Annual Congress, but as a charter member, and interested in its advancement for truth and justice, I wish to reach the Congress by letter, and show the persons there assembled the need of utilizing the woman element.

I was informed that Mr. Abbot stated in Rochester last year that he had written to several women asking them to be there and officiate as vice-presidents, but none of them would accept. Why should they? Those he wrote to were not interested enough to be at the Centennial Congress. Perhaps if he had invited some of those who took interest enough to go to Philadelphia and help inaugurate the first Congress, he might hav been more successful. He might with the same propriety hav invited Prof. Swing, or Henry Ward Beecher to be present and act as president. Possibly Mr. Abbot and others will yet learn that there are plenty of persons in the background fully as competent, and who would shine as brightly in such a capacity as those he invited (not members). But to our subject, viz., woman. Says Herbert Spencer, "Women as well as men, being units in society, tend by their natures (alone) to giv society certain traits of character, hence the importance of the question, Are the mental natures of men and women the same? and the argument is, if they are not, it is certain that an increase of the feminine influence must affect the social and political type in a marked manner. To suppose that along with the unlikeness between their parental activities there does not go unlikeness of mental faculties, is to suppose that here alone in all nature, there is no adjustment of special powers to special functions. Accepting the above as correct, I would advise the election of as many women as men, both as officers and committees, and when you meet to confer together, call the women elected, and not leave them out as our good sister Amy Post was at Watkins. Hoping much good work will be done the 27th and 28th, I am fraternally yours, MRS. SCOTT BRIGGS.

CEYLON, O., Aug. 17, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I hav not failed to send your due through any carelessness or forgetfulness at the proper time, but simply through inability. Please find inclosed $2.25, my subscription to the end of the year for THE TRUTH SEEKER; and for the remaining seventy-five cents I want you to send me "The Truth Seeker Collection." I long for a number of your books, but times are so hard that it is of no use; I cannot hav them yet. But THE TRUTH SEEKER I would not like to do without, and will not so long as I am able to get it and you are its editor. There is not a bit of it that goes unread by me. A few years ago my wife was a church member of the most earnest and conscientious kind, but she had begun to be skeptical before we saw THE TRUTH SEEKER. As for me, I was always skeptical, though always among church people, and obliged to attend church services so long as my friends had any control over me. Being a thinker, I never seemed able to swallow all the many absurdities that were taught me. The inconsistencies of professors of religion, too, made a great impression on me. But till seeing THE TRUTH SEEKER I had hardly ever seen any Freethought publication or heard anything of Freethinkers except as people of the wickedest and meanest kind. But now the glorious old TRUTH SEEKER has cleared both our minds, I think, from every vestige of Christian superstition; for which many thanks to its editor, who seems to us like an old and intimate friend.

A. GREGORY.

PRESCOTT, Oct. 14, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Please send me one of those cards, "Declaration of Rights." I want my name on that glorious document, and I think we can get quite a number of names here in Prescott. The more I see of the ignorance and bigotry of the so-called Christians, the more I think it behooves Liberals and all friends of humanity to rush to the rescue, to do all in their power to raise humanity out of the depths of ignorance and superstition and set them on the rock of light and liberty.

"Cupid's Yokes" came to hand all right. I hav read it, and it fills me with indignation when I think that for uttering his honest sentiments our worthy brother Heywood now lies inside a common prison. Can this be free America in which we live? Methinks could a Franklin, a Jefferson, a Washington, or one of those noble patriots who laid down their lives for liberty, see this state of things, it would make them weep bitter tears. Shall their patriotism, their labor, and their blood be spent and shed in vain? It is for us in this day to say whether such shall be the case.

Brother Liberals, let Onward! be our motto, and let us not stop until the last remains of a false and cruel Christianity be rooted from this glorious land of ours. Then can we sing the songs of humanity and this world be joined in a universal brotherhood. Yours, etc., J. B. BLACKBURN.

POPLAR, OHIO, Oct. 19, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I hav just finished reading, for the third time, Mrs. Colman's letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 12th inst. With her, I am soul-sick, when I see the sick times all over our Liberal heritage. I am tired of conservatives. If there was any unselfishness or honesty left among professed, respectable Liberals, there would not be so much snorting and dictation—so much "me big Indian," and uncompromising cussedness abroad. There is such a thing as rights and wrongs in the land; and for more than forty years I hav been fighting to banish the wrongs and bring the rights of humanity right end, to the front There are such things as veterans in all conflicts, and there are some now living, one of whom is "Lucy," whose honest words are saving to my old soul even though she is soul-sick. I, too, was acquainted with that honest veteran—A. Kneeland. I met him the last time in Philadelphia. Oh, if all our Abbots, our Bells, our Ingersolls, our Bennetts, our Underwoods, and many others who hav comparatively just enlisted in the ranks, and all of whom want to doff shoulder-straps and epaulets, would not exhibit quite so much "in-God-we-trust" pomposity before they hav fought one hard battle for freedom, then there might be peace. I know of but four real veterans in the field of battle to-day alive. There may be others with whom I am unacquainted. These are Mrs. Colman, H. Seaver, J. P. Mendum, and last myself. But though forty years a private, and having all that time been in one continued conflict with the combined hosts of God and Satan, in every one of their hellish evolutions, yet to-day, simply because I am an old Jeffersonian Democrat, and fight in my own Radical harness (like Ethan Allen), on my own hook, I am not considered respectable by the almighty mushrooms of Liberalism.

During the forty years which I hav been fighting, I hav sown seed which, to-day, has produced for THE TRUTH SEEKER more than five hundred subscribers; this I firmly and honestly believe. I hav been three times arrested by the hell-hounds of the Church, and four times hav faced trial in high courts, and paid my counsel and all costs out of my hard earnings, and never asked or received one cent from outside respectability, as a "defense fund," or assistance in any form. I was imprisoned a month for asserting that "I never owed any allegiance to Abe Lincoln, Dave Tod, or Mr. Jesus Christ, Esq." I was summoned before the cussed legislature of Ohio to answer to this awful charge, and for all this expense I had to foot the bill, without pay, pension, or bounty Here I am to-day an invalid and cannot labor, and hav not for a year past, and hav been robbed by pretended Christian friends of all my earnings, yet I will liv and die mentally free if I die in the poor-house.

I hav not here told you half of my story, You would not publish my last letter to you, and you may not see fit to print this in your list of friendly correspondence; but if not, please return it to me, and I will find an office more liberal. Don't think, dear sir, that I am not friendly to you; if I was worth ten thousand, and you wanted one-half of it to defend yourself and the other Comstock victims, I would freely bestow it. It is all the pleasure I now hav left to read THE TRUTH SEEKER, Investigator, and other Liberal papers. But it is painful to read of so much ill-feeling and want of respectability.

But for forty years I've borne a heavy cross,
And now I'm left to die, "a poor old hoss."

Fraternally thine, D. TUTTLE.

ALLEGANY SPRINGS, VA., Sept. 11, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I think it is about time that I should send a few lines to your valuable paper. We are making some progress here; we hav some outspoken Liberals, and I think a great many "mourners." I am doing all that I can to enlighten the people. We hav the most ignorant class of people here to contend with that is often seen; for one of our exhorters stated in the pulpit some three months ago in his exhortation, that when he went to a big meeting and was with the Lord a long time, and then went home and went to plowing, the roots would turn up easier, and that he sometimes thought that Jesus Christ was a horse when the plow went so strongly.

Another remarked that the railroad cars were the work of the devil, and also the telegraph across the Atlantic ocean. He said if God had intended that men should send news over the sea, he would hav left a strip of land for that purpose. He thought man was getting too smart, and that the world was bound to come to an end. In spite of all this bigotry and ignorance, we are making some converts to the truth.

I visited Mr. J. M. Barnes on the 27th of July (as announced in the T. S. Aug. 21). He is doing all that he can by distributing papers and tracts. He informs me that our meeting at his house stirred up the people and did considerable good. On the second day of August I started to visit Mr. and Mrs. Slenker—a distance of twenty-seven miles. On my way I halted at Christiansburg. It was known at that place where I was going. My friends exerted all their influence to make me abandon the trip. I finally told them that I was going to investigate for myself and see the arch-Infidels of Snowville as they termed them. "Well," said a magistrate, "You will find her the d——dest ug'liest thing you ever saw." I told him I was not hunting beauty, but truth and intelligence.

Well, Mr. Editor, I did go, and I do not regret my trip, nor do I ever expect to. On my way, I overtook a wagoner who lived in Snowville, and I made the inquiry of him if he was acquainted with the Slenker family. "O, yes," said he, "very well." I asked him what kind of people they were. He remarked that they were very fine people, but they were Infidels." I said, I supposed they were honest. "O, yes, they are considered strictly honest; more so than their Christian neighbors."

I met with similar answers to all my inquiries, which were not a few. Dr. Henrietta L. Buckner has given such a true description of these worthy people that I will vouch that every word of it is true. I did not find Mrs. Slenker the ugly creature that had been pictured out to me, but I found her the very essence of intelligence—courteous, social, and everything requisite to a first-class truth seeker. Mrs. Slenker gave me a lot of tracts and papers, which I am distributing to the Christian heathen.

I see, Mr. Bennett, that you are arrested again. When will the devotees of ignorance cease to persecute truth? I hope the time is not far off when truth shall be esteemed a virtue and vice a crime. My sympathies are with you, but I am too poor at present to aid in sending any cash, but I will be able when I market my crop of tobacco, and if it will be any favor to you to pay then, you may mark me down for five dollars.

Many thanks to the unknown sender of some Spiritualist pamphlets, though I am not a Spiritualist, but I like to read anything that is of the Liberal nature. I would be glad to receive any and all Liberal works that are printed, and would like editors and publishers to send me a specimen copy of all their works, and will try and circulate them among the Liberals and others. I wish some kind friend would send "Cupid's Yokes" to me; I wish to see the great obscenity of it, not that I am a believer in obscenity, for I find more of that in the Bible than I hav any use for. I like to read the letters in THE TRUTH SEEKER; they are very instructive. The "Godly Women of the Bible" is very good. I hope the same will be continued. In fact THE TRUTH SEEKER is like the nigger's rabbit,—"it is good any way and every way." I would like to hav some of your books, but I could not pay for them until I sell my crop of tobacco. I would order "The Champions of the Church" and Paine's "Age of Reason" if I had the cash.

Yours in truth, GEO. W. HALL.

ENNIS, TEXAS, Oct. 14, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: The great West swarms with Liberals, and my Liberal books are in eager request. Of late it has been my professional duty to prosecute in behalf of the state a sanctified preacher for brutally whipping his grown-up daughter for going to a social party, and also a venerable Methodist layman for disturbing the religious worship of another congregation by giving the lie to the officiating minister. In conducting the cases every effort was made to leave nothing unsaid that could be said in condemnation of those who set themselves up as guide-posts on the road to glory and at the same time take every opportunity that is offered to quarrel and fight in the name of the Lord. The offenders were punished as the law provides; but, as a reward for the zeal shown in making out the cases, the priests are emptying on me the vials of their wrath. Thus far the smell of fire has not passed upon me, and the heathen element is enough in the ascendant to giv me a marked increase of business. Success to you. C. S. L.

DAVENPORT, O., Oct. 15, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I think the "Champions" is a fine book, and just the thing that the Liberals want to show them the true character of the "Fathers" stripped of the sugar-coating of hypocrisy with which they hav been so ingeniously painted by their modern peers, the clergy. The chapter on "Sinful Clergymen" is enough to disgust any sane man with the very idea that religion can do anything for a man who has no morality. The Christian Church has made it utterly impossible to write the history of crime with her name left out.

Please put my name on the list along with those brave men and women who indorse the Hon. Elizur Wright's "Declaration of Rights." I want everybody to know that James L. McKelney is an Infidel and ain't afraid to say so.

J. L. MCKELNEY.

NESS, KANSAS, Oct. 20, 1878.

DEAR UNCLE BENNETT: I hope you will not think it bold in me to thus address you, the champion of free speech, free press, free mails, truth, and liberty.

I am only seventeen years old, but hav been a constant reader of your noble paper, THE TRUTH SEEKER, since the first issue, and I do believe I should go mad if I had to go without it for one month.

I am glad you are going to adopt the "Spelling Reform." I think that will be a grand step forward.

Hoping to soon be able to help you more and be able to write a letter with more taste, I remain, CECIL H. GATES.

NAPLES, N. Y., Oct. 14, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Will you please correct the statement in the last week's TRUTH SEEKER that there is to be a two days' meeting in Naples on the 29th and 30th inst. B. F. Underwood will certainly lecture here on the 23d and 24th inst. On the 23d his subject will be, "If not Christianity, What?" On the 24th the subject will be, "To What Extent has Christianity Helped or Hindered Civilization?"

Truly yours, JOHN PECK.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., Sept. 29, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I was very much pleased with THE TRUTH SEEKER. I like it the best of any Liberal paper I ever saw; it is a rattler, i. e., it makes the dry bones of old theology rattle. Long may you wave. I got sixty odd names on the Heywood petition; sent it in some time since. I hav since read "Cupid's Yokes," and like it very well. I could not find any obscenity in it. Your "Open Letter to Jesus Christ" is an eye-opener. GEO. A. DUSTIN.

The Under-Hold.

BY HIDDEN STAR.

When once I was a little boy—
Though stranger to full many a joy,
Because of man's perverse alloy—
I learned in youthful wrestling-match,
Where everything was grab and snatch,
'Twas best the under-hold to catch,
And hold it.

I've found it ever thus in life,
Whate'er the turmoil or the strife,
'Twixt man and man, or man and wife,
In dealing with both hot and cold,
With timid ones and also bold,
'Tis best to get the under-hold,
And keep it.

In business, and in church as well,
With solid man or city swell,
The under-hold will always tell;
The merchant and the preacher, too,
Both try to keep the rule in view—
I sometimes think they do it, too—
And use it.

Well, though I think 'tis hardly fair
For godly men to warn of snare,
Then be the first to stumble there,
Still, they are only after gold,
And soon they need not be told
'Tis best to hav the under-hold—
Confound 'em!

Then take the under-hold, and use it;
It is a power—but don't abuse it;
If man needs help, oh, don't refuse it,
But show a heart above all gold,
To weak, to suffering, to the old;
Oh, blessed be such under-hold;
Stick to it!

Then at the last, when all is done,
When you your earthly race hav run,
And come to set of human sun,
Your heart will show its finer mold
If you the truth hav always told—
Then let Death take the under-hold,
In quiet.

A Mission Against Christianity.

For hundreds of years the Occidental world has been unceasing in its efforts to convert the heathens of the East to the Christian faith. Millions of treasures and thousands of lives hav been expended in this propagandism, and, in spite of much that is discouraging in the past and comparatively little that is hopeful in the present, all the different branches and sects of the Christian Church, with insignificant exceptions, are to-day as zealous as ever in the work of heathen conversion.

No religious contributions are more regular and very few are larger than those collected to pay the cost of carrying the Gospel to heathen lands. Christian missionaries are scattered throughout the East, the Bible has been translated into nearly all the tongues of the world, the prayers of myriads of the faithful ascend to heaven for the success of the efforts at heathen evangelization, and the theological seminaries hav constantly in training recruits for the foreign missionary field.

Doubtless progress has been made in the work since the Church first undertook the tremendous task of converting the heathens. The reports of the foreign missionary societies present encouraging facts and stimulate the religious to further self-sacrifices, to the end that the ancient faiths of the East may be broken down and the purer truths of Christianity substituted for them. But it cannot be denied that so far not even the outworks of heathendom hav been taken by the army of Christian missionaries which has steadily assailed them from the early days of the Church up to the present moment. In the Indies Brahmanism still has more followers than Christianity, and the Oriental mind turns away from the religious teachings of the West.

Our missionaries to India, China, and Japan do not go to rude and unlettered peoples, like the Fiji Islanders, or the African savages, or the Sandwich Islanders, as they were a hundred years ago, but to races who hav a developed creed and who can giv a reason for it; a creed which has many learned expounders and deft logicians to defend it. They are, therefore, unless they are very clever men, sometimes actually beaten in the argument with the heathens they set out to convert, and are driven to their wits' ends to save themselves from appearing to need conversion to Brahmanism, instead of having a superior religion of their own to offer. It is very great folly to send a dull and stupid man, a minister who is not bright enough to get on at home, to convert the Oriental heathens. They are pretty sure to be too sharp for him.

Our missionaries, no matter how learned and how devoted, suffer under many disadvantages in trying to propagate Christianity in the East. It is up-hill work with them from the start and all through. They must be content with accomplishing comparatively little, and yet keep alive the zeal of the faithful, who send them out in ignorance of the difficulties of the task of supplanting a faith so old and so deeply rooted as that of Brahmanism.

But, hard as the work now is, and expensive as it has always been, it seems it is hereafter to be made more arduous and more costly. The heathens are about to gain recruits from the West, who, instead of conducting a defensive warfare, will at once throw their columns against the walls of Christianity itself! We are informed that Hierophant Olcott and Mme. Blavatsky, the Theosophists, are now packing their trunks preparatory to a pilgrimage to India, there to challenge the Christian missionaries to debate the respective merits of Brahmanism and Christianity!

The intelligence is the more startling because the Hierophant has lately been received into the Brahmanical sect, and is now Pandit of New York, and Madame Blavatsky, who has long been known as an out-and-out Brahmanist, with a contemptuous opinion of Christianity, has set her heart on overthrowing the Bible and substituting the Vedas in the United States. The Pandit Olcott has all the fire and zeal of a new convert, and Mme. Blavatsky's mind is an arsenal of arguments which can be used against our religion. Their plan of operations is a bold one. Their intention, evidently, is first to meet and conquer the missionaries in the home of the ancient faith to which they hav been converted, and then, flushed with victory, to plant the standard of Brahmanism in America, and go forth exhorting the people to return to the old Aryan religion, with its mystical doctrines of metempsychosis and the rest and peace of annihilation.

This is a plan of assault not contemplated by our foreign missionary societies. They hav been wont to regard the Brahmanical as a quiescent faith, against which they could bring to bear the forces of Christianity—a faith on the defensive merely. But now, inspired by the zeal of Hierophant Olcott, the Pandit, and Mme. Blavatsky, the secress, the Brahmans are about to begin an aggressive warfare against Christianity, and establish a propaganda of their own in the West to offset that which has been so long carried on by Christians in the East.—Sun.

Tradition and Superstition.

MR. EMERSON ON THEIR PREVALENCE AND POWER.

Ralph Waldo Emerson writes as follows to the North American Review:

While the immense energy of the sentiment of duty and the awe of the supernatural exert incomparable influence on the mind, yet it is often perverted, and the tradition received with awe, but without correspondent action of the receiver. Then you find so many men infatuated on that topic! Wise on all others, they lose their head the moment they talk of religion. It is the sturdiest prejudice in the public mind that religion is something by itself; a department distinct from all other experience and to which the tests and judgment men are ready enough to show on other things do not apply. You may sometimes talk with the gravest and best citizen, and the moment the topic of religion is broached he runs into a childish superstition. His face looks infatuated, and his conversation is. When I talked with an ardent missionary, and pointed out to him that his creed found no support in my expeence, he replied, "It is not so in your experience, but is so in the other world." I answer, Other world! There is no other world. God is one and omnipresent; here or now here is the whole fact. The one miracle which God works evermore is in nature, and imparting himself to the mind. When we ask simply, "What is true in thought? what is just in action?" It is the yielding of the private heart to the divine mind, and all personal preferences and all requiring of wonders are profane. The word miracle, as it is used, only indicates the ignorance of the devotee, staring with wonder to see water turned into wine, and heedless of the stupendous fact of his own personality. Here he stands, a lonely thought harmoniously organized into correspondence with the universe of mind and matter. What narrative of wonders coming down from a thousand years ought to charm his attention like this? Certainly it is human to value a general consent, a fraternity of believers, a crowded church; but as the sentiment purifies and rises it leaves crowds. It makes churches of two, churches of one. A fatal disservice does this Swedenborg or other who offers to do any thinking for me. It seems as if, when the spirit of God speaks so plainly to each soul, it were an impiety to be listening to one or another saint. Jesus was better than others because he refused to listen to others and listened at home. You are really interested in your thought. You hav meditated in silent wonder on your existence in this world. You hav perceived in the first fact of your conscious life here a miracle so astounding, a miracle comprehending all the universe of miracles to which your intelligent life givs you access as to exhaust wonder and leave you no need of hunting here or there for any particular exhibitions of power. Then up comes a man with a text of 1 John v, 7, or a knotty sentence from St. Paul, which he considers as the axe at the root of your tree. You cannot bring yourself to care for it. You say: "Cut away; my tree is Ygdrasil—the tree of life." He interrupts for the moment your peaceful trust in the divine providence. Let him know by your security that your conviction is clear and sufficient, and if he were Paul himself, you also are here and with your Creator. We all giv way to superstitions. The house in which you were born is not quite mere timber and stone; is still haunted by parents and progenitors. The creeds into which we were initiated in childhood and youth no longer hold their old place in the minds of thoughtful men, but they are not nothing to us, and we hate to hav them treated with contempt. There is so much that we do not know that we giv to these suggestions the benefit of the doubt.

CHRONIC DISEASES,

Embracing those of the Blood and Nerves, the Diseases of Men, the Diseases of Women, and the various causes, physical and social, leading to them, are plainly treated by that plainest of books, PLAIN HOME TALK, EMBRACING MEDICAL COMMON SENSE—nearly 1,000 pages, 200 illustrations—by DR. E. B. FOOTE, of 120 LEXINGTON AVE., NEW YORK, to whom all letters from the sick should be addressed. In its issue for January 19, 1878, Mr. Bennett's TRUTH SEEKER thus speaks of DR. FOOTE and his medical publications: "We know him (Dr. Foote) personally and intimately, and we say, with all the assurance that knowledge imparts, that he is a man of the highest incentives and motives, whose life has been spent in instructing and improving his fellow-beings by giving such information as is well calculated to enable them to be more healthy, more happy, and to be better and more useful men and women. His medical works possess the highest value, and have been introduced and thoroughly read in hundreds of thousands of families, who, to-day, stand ready to bear willing testimony to the great benefit they have derived from the physiological, hygienic, and moral lessons which he has so ably imparted."

Abstract of the

LAST WILL AND TESTAMENT OF JEAN MESLIER,

A Roman Catholic priest, who, after a pastoral service of thirty years at Etrepigny and But, in Champagne, France, wholly abjured the Christian dogmas.

EDITED BY VOLTAIRE.

This little work contains very sound reasoning. Its utterances are among the most powerful and convincing. The clergyman gives most excellent reasons why the old dogmas of superstition and error should be discarded. Price, 25 cents. For sale at this office.

BY KERSEY GRAVES.

Author of "The Biography of Satan," and "The Bible of Bibles" (comprising a description of twenty bibles).

This wonderful and exhaustive volume by Mr. Graves will, we are certain, take high rank as a book of reference in the field which he has chosen for it. The amount of mental labor necessary to collate and compile the varied information contained in it must have been severe and arduous indeed, and now that it is in such convenient shape the student of freethought will not willingly allow it to go out of print. But the book is by no means a mere collation of views or statistics; throughout its entire course the author—as will be seen by his title-page and chapter-heads—follows a definite line of research and argument to the close, and his conclusions go, like sure arrows, to the mark.

Burns' Phonic Shorthand

FOR

Schools, Business Writing, and Reporting; arranged on the basis of Isaac Pitman's Phonography.

BY ELIZA BOARDMAN BURNS,

Teacher of Phonography and Phonetics at Cooper Union and N. Y. School of Phonography.

To facilitate the general introduction of Phonography into all businesses and professions, the author has, after twenty-five years' experience in teaching all the various "systems" in vogue, arranged a text-book which, though full and complete, is concise, free from superfluous verbiage, and of moderate size. The simplicity of arrangement in this work enables the student to pursue the study of Phonography with much more ease and certainty than any other text-book; while the writing which results from its use is as rapid as any, and far more legible than that derived from the instructions given in other phonographic works. Price, $1.00. Sold at this office.

THE

Creed of Christendom;

Its Foundation Contrasted with its Superstructure.

BY W. R. GREG,

Author of "Enigmas of Life," "Literary and Social Judgments," &c.

One vol. Crown, 8vo., with Complete Index. Cloth, $1.50.

"Some twelve years ago, in a London drawing-room, one of our most eminent men of science said: 'Why do not the bishops answer Mr. Greg's Creed of Christendom? They are bound to answer it—if they can.' In the lifetime of the present generation the earliest work at all similar was that of Mr. Charles Hennell, which, in various respects, had great merit; but Mr. Greg, coming later, had the advantage of access to many able German researches, and his work continues the most complete on all sides; to it one may most confidently appeal when assailed by eager Christians with the current commonplaces of their warfare. Since bishops, deans, learned canons, and academic divines do not reply formally to so thorough, clear, and learned a treatise, which has been so long before the public, we have the best of proof attainable that this historical argument—occupying precisely the ground which English academicians have chosen as their own—is unanswerable" (F. W. Newman, on "The New Christology," in Fortnightly Review).

WITH PREFACE AND NOTES BY SCHOLASTICUS.

First English Translation

Of the ancient Jewish story of Jesus, who was born at Bethlehem about 106 B. C., being the son of a betrothed maiden named Miriam (Mary) by Joseph Pandera. By the power of a charm stolen from the Holy of Holies he cured lepers, raised the dead, and wrought other miracles. Wherefore he was arrested by the elders of Jerusalem, scourged, crowned with thorns, and by order of the Sanhedrin stoned to death and hanged on the day before the Passover and the Sabbath, in the reign of Queen Alexandra, about the year 75 B. C.

AGENTS are informed that the best thing to sell to make money on, and also to benefit mankind, is this book. It explains and advocates the only harmless and practical means of avoiding the evils of celibacy, on the one hand, and of overburdened parentage on the other. It advocates more and earlier marriages, and increase of family only when health and pecuniary means will permit, but it most efficiently opposes abortion, prostitution, and all undesired and inconsiderate procreation. It contains the latest medical researches and results of science. The medical directions are easy, plain, explicit, though chaste and delicate. No married couple should be without it.

Christianity and Infidelity

A JOINT DISCUSSION BETWEEN

REV. G. H. HUMPHREY, Presb't'n Clergyman

OF NEW YORK, AND

D. M. BENNETT, Editor of The Truth Seeker

It was conducted in the columns of The Truth Seeker, a letter alternately from each contestant appearing each week, beginning April 1, 1877, and closing Sept. 29, 1877, thus continuing just six months, giving thirteen letters from Humphrey and thirteen replies by Bennett.

The subjects discussed were as follows:

PART I.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to American Liberty.

PART II.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to Learning and Science.

PART III.—Is there a stronger probability that the Bible is divine than that Infidelity is true?

The discussion has excited a large share of interest, both among believers and unbelievers: and as both sides are fairly presented, it is suited to readers of all shades of opinion.

The New York Advocate, a paper having a very extensive circulation, in speaking of the volume, says, "Perhaps a more able and exhaustive presentation of both sides of the great questions which have agitated the civilized world for centuries has never been made. At any rate, in this volume will be found a perfect magazine or storehouse of arguments, pro and con, which every intelligent man and woman should peruse with candor and with an earnest desire to arrive at sound conclusions on themes of the highest importance to all mankind. . . Light is what we need. Let the controversies proceed. Let the blows descend upon the error-dispelling anvil. Let the sparks fly in all directions from the heated steel. The truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, is what the people demand on all the great questions of the day, whether of Finance, Science, Politics, or Religion, and discussion will elicit it." Let every person who feels the slightest interest in theological questions, whether on one side or the other, read the Humphrey-Bennett Discussion."

A thick 12mo volume of 550 pages, well bound sent, post-paid, to any address, for the low price of one dollar.

Gems of Thought.

A WISE man proportions his belief to the evidence.—Hume's Essays.

WE giv advice by the bucketful, but take it by the grain.—W. R. Alger.

THE greatest trust between man and man is the trust of giving counsel.—Bacon.

FREE and fair discussion will ever be found the firmest friend to truth.—Dr. G. Campbell.

TRUTH is but a conformity to nature, and to follow nature cannot be to combat truth.—Wollaston.

EVERY man has a right to offer his idea of salvation to his brother. The feeling is right though the theology may be wrong.—Miss. Braddon.

GOOD and evil are necessarily, essentially, and unalterably what they are, and God necessarily sees and judges them to be so.—Dr. Sam. Clarke.

TIME is the greatest innovator, and if time of course alters all things to the worse, and wisdom and counsel shall not alter them to the better, what shall be the end?—Bacon's Essays.

WE hav more to unlearn than to learn, and the acquisition of truth is not near so difficult a task as to attain a superiority over rooted errors and old prejudices.—Dr. George Campbell.

WELL! well! Soleo terto, sacco dritto (Italian proverb) many a full sack comes from a crooked furrow, and he who will be captain of none but honest men will have small hire to pay.—Geo. Eliot.

THE grand and indeed only character of truth is the capability of enduring the test of universal experience and coming unchanged out of every possible form of fair discussion.—Sir John Herschell.

FOR me, I hav determined to lay up, as the best solace and treasure of a good old age, the honest liberty of free speech from my youth when I shall think it available in so dear a concernment as the Church's good.—John Milton.

PERHAPS there are few less happy than those who are ambitious without industry, who pant for the prize but will not run the race, who thirst for truth but are too slothful to draw it up from the well.—Sharpe's Letters and Essays.

A GREAT part of the life of a philosopher must necessarily be devoted, not so much to the acquisition of new knowledge as to unlearn the errors to which he has been taught to giv an implicit assent before the dawn of reason and reflection.—Dugald Stewart.

THE great principle and foundation of all virtue and worth is placed in this, that a man is able to deny himself his own desires, cross his own inclinations, and purely follow what reason directs as best, though the appetite lean the other way.—Locke's Education.

TRUTH ought to be the object of every man, for without truth there can be no real happiness to a thoughtful mind, nor any assurance of happiness hereafter. It is the duty of every man to obtain all the knowledge he can and then make the best use of it.—Thomas Paine.

AS CIVILIZATION advanced, the citizens of that famous republic (Athens) became still less visionary and still less simple-hearted. They aspired to know where their ancestors had been content to doubt. They began to doubt where their ancestors had thought it their duty to believe.—Lord Macauley.

ALL true greatness of mind depends upon the culture of the affections, their nurture, their exercise, and their development. . . . I am aware that this self-assumed superiority to opinion may be and often is a thing of danger; dangerous in its crudeness and fermentation although in its perfection most blessed.—Self-Formation.

There is scarcely a low and dishonoring conception of God current among men, scarcely a narrow and malignant passion of the human heart, scarcely a moral obliquity, scarcely a political error or misdeed, which biblical texts are not, and may not be without any violence to their obvious signification, adduced to countenance and justify.—Greg.

LANDOR had always been conservative; but he had the eager wish, wherever evil of any kind presented itself, political, moral, or religious, to eradicate it straightway, without reference to the old blockhead cry of what was to be subtituted in its place. When docks and thistles were pulled up, were any such questions ever asked?—Foster's Life of Landor.

HE who can think dispassionately and deeply as I do is great as I am; none other. But his opinions are at freedom to diverge from mine as mine are from his; and, indeed, on recollection, I never loved those most who thought with me, but those rather who deemed my sentiments worth discussion and who corrected me with frankness and affability.—Landor.

IS THERE, then, a vast spiritual existence pervading the universe, even as there is a vast existence of matter pervading it—a spirit, which as a great German author tells us, sleeps in the stone, dreams in the animals, awakes in man? Does the soul arise from the one as the body arises from the other? Do they in like manner return? If so we can interpret human existence.—Draper.

RIGHT and wrong exist in the nature of things. Things are not right because they are commanded; they are not wrong because they are prohibited. . . Under the regime of the ghosts, the laws were not understood to exist in the nature of things; they were supposed to be irresponsible commands, and these commands were not supposed to rest upon reason; they were simply the products of arbitrary will. | Ingersoll.

Odds and Ends.

BLACK friars—Colored cooks.

OPEN watering-places—Milk cans.

THE worst thing out—Out of cash.

A RAINING favorite—An umbrella.

VEGETABLE philosophy—Sage advice.

PARLOR magazines—Kerosene lamps.

THE best counter-sign—"No trust."

MUSICAL morality—An upright piano.

MAN appoints, but woman disappoints.

WHAT tune is a great favorite? For-tune.

PRESS, Pulpit, and Petticoats—three ruling powers.

BARBERS always predict short crops.

A HORSE, unlike a man, is always prepared to meet an oat.

WHAT is the greatest stand ever made for civilization? The inkstand.

A LEGEND.—A day or two since a stranger in the city was making inquiries about the "Pontiac Elm" at Bloody Run, and finally accepted the offer of a bootblack to go up Jefferson avenue and point out the historic relic. When the tree had been looked over and the ravine explored the stranger asked:

"Boy, are there any legends connected with this spot?"

"I guess there's one," replied the lad.

"What is it?"

"Well, as near as I kin remember, a feller got a boy to come up here with him and look around and answer questions, and when they got back down town he never paid the boy a cent—not a red."

"He didn't? And what happened to him?" asked the stranger, as he lifted his left eye.

"He got drowned the same night, while the boy is rich and high-toned, and wears a velvet vest,"

"Hum!" mused the stranger, as he passed out a quarter without further delay.—D. Free Press.

A DEAD FAILURE.—A small newsboy who is every morning to be found on the steps of the People's Savings Bank was yesterday morning observed by a policeman to remove his stockings and shoes at an early hour and hide them under the steps. The lad then took great pains to exhibit his bare feet to all passers, and was often noticed standing on one leg, as if the cold pavement was very painful. Man after man passed without a word of sympathy, and the sales of papers did not increase by one. By and by along came a man with a red nose and a good-natured look, and the boy held out a paper and said:

"Hav a paper?—my feet are almost frozen."

"Eh? Barefooted?" queried the man, as he halted and looked down.

"Yes, and my feet are freezing."

"Are, eh? See here, bub, I'll put you up to snuff. Let 'em freeze, and then take a lay-off in the hospital for all winter! Nice fries—chicken soup—nothing to do—and you're feet 'll thaw out early in the spring and shed every stone-bruise! Fact, bub—tried it seven winters myself."

The boy looked after him in a doubtful way, and then made for his shoes on a skip, muttering:

"Mebbe he lies and mebbe he don't, but I'm busted up as clean as the chap who held his watermelons over winter for a rise? Ouch! Whar's them stockuns and cowhides!"—Detroit Free Press.

DINAH AND THE TELEPHONE.

Is'e bin talkin' wid de sperrits.
An' I heerd ole Gabrel's horn;
An' I nebber seed sich doin's—
Nebber sence ole Dinah's born;
Now, you niggahs, don't say nuffin,
Jes' yer wait and hear me froo,
Fer de tale I hab ter tell yer
Beats de debbil—yaas it do!

When I seed de crowds a standin'
Roun' dat box in Mahs' Jim's sto,
I jes' know'd dat sumpin' wuz comin',
An' it did come sartin sho';
Dey wuz axin' all sorts ob questions,
Wid deir moufs close up to dat box
An' de answers—de Lord hab mussy;
Nebber did I heah sich talks.

By itself de box wuz nuffin',
But it had a string dat run—
Well, I seed it go 'way ober
De housetop towards de sun;
An' de tings I heerd a-tricklin'
Fru dat box wuz mighty queer,
An' I know'd befo' dey tole me
Dat de sperrits wuz pow'ful near.

Mahsa Jim he axed some questions,
Jes' fur me, about de crap,
An' how long befo' ole Dinah
In de grabe would hab to drap;
An' de answer wuz de wustest—
All de summer's gwine be dry,
An' befo' annuder season
Po' ole Dinah's got to die.

Arter dat de sweetes' moosic
Quivered fru dat cotton string,
An' Mahs' Jim he said de tootin'
Wuz ole Gabrel on de wing;
An' wid dat I lef' an' lit out,
An' I'se hyar—but not fur long—
I'se jes' waitin' fur de angels—
Waitin' till dey soun' de gong.

Wha's dat, Pomp—no use in wukin',
Arter what de sperrits said?
Yer lazy nigger—git de hoe, sah,
An' reprove dat collard bed;
What de sperrits sez is one ting
An' de collards am annuder;
Dat's ez troo ez Pomp's a niggah,
An' dat I am Pompey's mudder.!

THE TRUTH SEEKER

Vol. 5. No. 44. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT.} New York, Saturday, November 2, 1878. {SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY.} $3 per Year.

Notes and Clippings.

THE Rev. J. V. Douglass of Lynn, Mass., under bail for several offenses, has run away and left his bondsmen to pay.

THE loss by the yellow fever, through the destruction of crops by neglect, stoppage of trade, and minor causes, is estimated at $200,000,000.

THERE is a terrible famine in Morocco. War, pestilence, and famine flourish as briskly in the nineteenth century as in any other century —especially famine.

A WRITER in the Scientific American says that after the electric light shall come into general use, the gas companies may profitably use their works in making non-illuminating gas for cooking and heating.

YELLOW fever has thus far carried off fifty-six clergymen. Twenty-four were Roman Catholics, thirty-one Protestants, and one Jewish Rabbi. And yet we are often told that God is good to his own servants.

IN a letter, dated Toronto, Sept. 11, to an English paper, signed "Thomas Frost, many years a schoolmaster in England," we read: "Brother Jonathan has paid over $900,000,000 of his national debt since the war, and during the last five years over $300,000,000, while we hav added $41,500,000 to ours, and increased our taxation $3,000,000." The writer givs a gloomy account of Canadian prospects.

ACCORDING to the Washington Post, Brother Talmage was in error when he claimed that in exploring certain haunts "he moved into a world of which he had before been entirely ignorant." The Post says that "there must be some mistake about this statement, or else Brother Talmage has a short memory. A few years since, while on a visit to this city, he 'took in' its abodes of sin in company with a detective and others, and appeared to be highly delighted with the trip."

SIMON GRANT has bought a tract of land on the Northern Pacific Railroad for the purpose of starting a community. He is a wealthy Scotchman, and will devote his entire fortune to the enterprise, which he has been planning many years; but he intends to be the high priest of the religion—said to be a strange worship of the sun—which is the basis of the movement. Thus far he has only a score or so of followers. He has chosen a place in what is fast becoming a thickly settled farming region, and is confident of success.

A DEEP excavation is being made in Indianapolis for the foundation of a state house. A layer of sand three feet in depth has been removed, in which appear the trunks of trees accurately molded in a harder soil. The explanation is that long ago trees were growing on a much lower surface; that the river changed its course and flowed over the spot, depositing the sand; that the river subsequently altered its course again, leaving the place dry; that the trees rotted away, and their places in the sand were filled by the accumulation of soil.

THE Cardinal Archbishop of Malines, Primate of Belgium, has published a series of letters, in which he endeavors to prove that the oath taken to a political constitution, such as the Constitution of Belgium, cannot bind to anything that is contrary to the laws of God and of the Roman Catholic Church. That is precisely the position held by the Catholic Church. They readily set the most solemn oath aside when the interest of the Church requires it. It follows that obedience to the Constitution and the laws may at any moment be superseded by a higher necessity, and that the oath taken to the Constitution constitutes, therefore, only a vain formality.

FOR thirty-five years the Seamen's Bethel has been moored at the foot of Pike street, East River. It is a chapel built on a barge, with accommodations for about three hundred persons. Sunday services hav been regularly maintained there, to the great advantage of the sailors who chose to attend. The form of worship is that of the Episcopal Church. A petition for the removal of the Bethel has been presented by some fruit dealers who want for their business the room which the chapel occupies. The Commissioners of Docks hav this petition under consideration, and will hear arguments and facts in regard to it on Wednesday next The friends of the Bethel are making urgent efforts to keep from being ousted, and are as hopeful as they are earnest about it.

EVEN the yellow fever cannot make Americans other than what they are; that dry sense of humor which is part and parcel of the national character is irrepressible. The survivors in the plague-smitten cities have heavy hearts. God knows, and their gratitude for what the North has done for them knows no bounds. But as the boxes of clothing are unpacked they cannot help smiling through their tears over some of the queer gifts that are brought to light; such as sealskin victorines, double-lined buckskin gloves that would be very useful in Alaska, and slippers "sufficient," says the Memphis Avalanche, "to supply all the ministers who ever flourished on these bluffs." But they do full justice to the kind sympathy behind these odd gifts for all that, and are just as thankful as for more serviceable ones.—Sun.

IT must now be plain to all concerned, even to the slaveholders themselves who have shut their eyes obstinately, that slavery in Cuba is doomed. Ever since Campos set his hand and seal to the compact that the runaway negroes who had fought in the ranks of the Republican army should not be returned to servitude, universal emancipation has been merely a question of time. The royal order just promulgated, under which all slaves escaping from Cuba become free the minute their feet touch any other Spanish soil or the deck of any Spanish ship, only hastens the inevitable. The tree is girdled. Where the home Government is to find the money to idemnify the slaveholders is another question. But that concerns the Madrid authorities, the Cuban planters, and the comparatively few outsiders who, like Purto Welsh have taken the risks of an investment in human property on the island, and who have not had the foresight to sell out.—Sun.

THE Chinese Government has tried every means to put a stop to the habit of opium smoking, which destroys millions of Chinamen every year. The brave Emperor Taw-Kwang made war against the British thirty-seven years ago to prevent them from importing opium into China, but the British Christians defeated the Chinese heathen, and retained the profits which accrued from others' ruin. Millions upon millions of Chinamen hav since that time been reduced to misery and death by the opium forced into their country, for mercenary purposes, by Queen Victoria's Government; but yet the heathen Chinese hav never relaxed their efforts to suppress its use. A despatch from China by way of San Francisco now givs us the news that the Viceroy at Nanking has ordered the confiscation of every house rented for the purpose of opium smoking. The British Government cannot interfere with this policy, which may therefore meet with success.

IT is the custom in Massachusetts Republican Conventions to open the proceedings with an alleged prayer. In the Convention at Worcester the Rev. A. B. Kendig was at hand to execute this part of the programme. The Rev. A. B. Kendig is a Methodist preacher from somewhere out West, who was imported into Massachusetts in time to make a rattling speech at the Massachusetts Republican Convention of 1876. He has, or had, a big beard and a big voice. In his so-called prayer the other day he is reported as having freely expressed his sentiments about the importance of maintaining the Republican party, the recent election in Maine, the currency question, and Gen. Butler. Religion has no more dangerous enemies than the preachers who lend themselves to these indecent burlesques of its most solemn offices. The average politician is not remarkable for piety; but even he would shrink from the profanity of making a stump speech under the guise of a prayer.—Sun.

UP to Oct. 22d, in New Orleans, the yellow fever footings were 12,312 cases and 3,733 deaths. In the presence of so fearful a record, and with the power of malarial influences in extending the plague apparently well established, the investigations into the conduct of Administrator McCaffrey tell a terrible story. It was publicly charged in the press of the city that last spring this officer used four thousand cartloads of garbage and refuse to fill up streets for grading. A committee was appointed to examine the charge, and the Administrator of Improvements has offered proof that he was directly authorized by a city ordinance, passed last winter, to use city refuse at some points, at least, within the city limits in the way specified. Evidence has been given in regard to foul odors coming out of this mass of stuff. After all that has been said and written on the garbage question during the last twenty years, such revelations carry a kind of hopelessness with them.

A RECENT explorer of the sequoia forests of California says, in Harper's Magazine, that the Fresno group of big trees, not often visited, occupies an area of three or four square miles. The average stature of these trees is about 275 feet, many exceeding 300, and the diameter from 20 to 30: yet so harmonious are their proportions that the immensity of their size is not readily realized. "Walk the sequoia woods at any time of the year," he says, "and you will say they are the most beautiful on earth. Rare and impressive contrasts meet you everywhere —the colors of tree and flower, rock and sky, light and shade, strength and frailty, endurance and evanescence." He combats the idea that the big trees are the last of forests of their kind, and argues that they will be replaced by others as enormous in size. Fire is the great enemy of the comparatively young trees, and the cones are nearly all eaten by squirrels: yet he found an abundance of young and vigorous sequoias.

OF the foreign commerce of the country New York continues to do more than all the other ports combined. During the past fiscal year New York received 67 per cent in value of the foreign goods which entered into all the ports of the United States, while of the total exports for the same year more than 47 per cent were shipped from our harbor. During the nine months since January 1st, the imports of merchandise have been to the value of $214,680,000, while the exports foot up nearly $264,000,000. The September exports of domestic produce from this port are unprecedented, reaching $32,104,880. During the year ending June 30, 1878, the exports of goods, the produce and manufacture of the United States, were greater than ever before in the history of the country, the value $680,683,798. Adding this to the value of foreign products exported, $14,200,402, we have an aggregate of $694,884,200. During the same period the imports fell $437,051,534, establishing an excess in the value of exports over imports of $257,832,657. This wide disparity between the inward and outward movement has created a condition of the trade balance more extraordinary than anything hitherto experienced.

TALMAGE'S IMMUNITY.—Brother Talmage is trying hard to earn his $12,000 salary, and perhaps he is succeeding, if the filling of his place of performance may be called success. But why did he go to the trouble to prepare a lot of sermons which would suit prurient tastes, when he might hav bought for a dollar or two something already written just as attractive to evil imaginations and perhaps of higher literary merit than anything he could compose? If Anthony Comstock permitted the sermons, would he not hav found just as little fault with brother Talmage's delivery of extracts from illicit literature which has the same object in view—that of gratifying vicious tastes while assuming to reprobate vice? But brother Talmage is filling his Tabernacle, and doubtless he is well satisfied. His extensively advertised tour of disreputable places produced the desired result. He got a crowd to applaud the oratorical tinsel with which he decorated them, and he added piquancy to his descriptions by threats of exposing the people of decent reputation whom he pretended to hav met there. He didn't giv any names, however, but why not? Who are the judges, for instance, who frequent the worst resorts of the metropolis? The preacher who makes charges like these to draw a house ought to be compelled to be specific and to prove his accusations. Otherwise he is only a slanderer who seeks immunity in the pulpit. An actress advertised that she would read a dramatic composition in New York Sunday evening of last week, but the Young Men's Christian Association interfered and the police forbade the entertainment. It is an entirely moral work, she says, and is devoid of anything that would stimulate evil thoughts. Yet Mr. Talmage was permitted to deliver his advertised prurient discourse in Brooklyn, with crowds of women and children to listen to it. Talmage says Brooklyn is a very moral place, while New York is a sort of Sodom and Gomorrah in one. Perhaps that is why he was let alone. Yet it is surprising.—N. Y. Sun.

Events of the Week.

THE Indians are quieter.

THE Australian cricketeers hav gone home.

WENDELL PHILLIPS has come out for Butler.

THE Greenbackers claim 80,000 votes in this state.

ENGLAND will hav to fight the Ameer of Afghan.

THE yellow fever is abating, owing to the frost and the approach of cooler weather.

THEODORE TILTON lectured in this city on "Heart's-ease." He can't hav had much of it.

ALL who were engaged in the Florida cipher dispatch business are to be hauled up before the Potter Committee.

THE Bishop of Manchester, England, has denounced the church hymns as "namby-pamby and strangely sickly." Correct.

THE Cabinet are all stumping for the hard money Republicans. Civil service, like charity, ought to commence at home.

SNOW to the depth of nine inches fell in the northwestern part of Ontario on the 27th ult. Great damage was done to fruit trees.

BISMARCK is enforcing his new Socialist bill. Twelve associations hav been broken up in the past week and four newspapers suppressed.

THE Socialists of the city and county of New York hav organized and nominated a full ticket. They claim that they control 14,000 or 15,000 votes.

THE Manhattan Savings Institution of this city was broken into last Sunday morning and robbed of $3,000,000 in cash and securities. It is one of the greatest and most mysterious thefts on record.

THE Russians are sending troops to Roumelia, the condition of whose people, according to the Porte, is intolerable. Russia is charged with conniving to establish an independent state in Bulgaria. The insurrection is spreading.

ONE hundred and fifty-eight thousand voters hav registered in this city out of a population of nearly twelve hundred thousand. Edward Cooper, son of Hon. Peter Cooper, is the Greenback, Republican, and Anti-Tammany candidate for Mayor.

THE believers in the second coming of Christ held a convention in the Holy Trinity Church of this city three successive days last week to discuss his advent. It is needless to say that Jesus did not attend the gathering either in the role of savior or delegate.

TALMAGE, in his lecture on the wickedness of New York, last Sunday, denounced scientific literature as "hot from hell" and incalculably demoralizing. It is of no consequence, but it is well to know the clownish mountebank's position in regard to science.

CARDINAL CULLEN, Archbishop of Dublin died on the 23d ult., in the 75th year of his age. He started as a poor boy, but by combining piety and shrewdness rose to the eminent position he held. Isn't there something somewhere about a man not being able to serve God and Mammon?

THE Catholics of this city are holding a fair in St. Patrick's Cathedral to last a month, and expect to realize $200,000 towards the completion of the building. It will be the finest ecclesiastical structure in the country. So far, its cost has come principally from the Bridgets and Mickeys. It will consume several millions, and the state will not receive one cent of benefit from its erection, as the Lord doesn't pay taxes on his property.

ONE of the severest storms of the year passed over this portion of the country on the 23d ult. The wind blew at the rate of seventy miles an hour in Philadelphia and fifty miles in this city, and was accompanied by rain. Over forty churches were more or less injured by the storm in Philadelphia, which proves either that God doesn't care for his own, or that the churches are not his. Many vessels were sunk along the coast and much damage done to shipping in the various harbors. Many injuries and seven deaths are reported.

The Darwins.

BY ELMINA D. SLENKER.

"We Infidels do not profess to be 'washed in the blood of the Lamb,' or to be 'baptized into Christ,' thus getting purified from 'original sin;' but we claim to have inherited tendencies towards evil-doing, and know that we are liable to err. We make no pretensions to being 'lights,' 'guides,' and all that, but simply try to do as nearly as we can what we think right, and do not offer a premium for sin by promising, under certain circumstances and conditions, to remit and forgive it, for we know we must accept the legitimate consequence of every act of our lives, and that not one wrong deed can ever be atoned for. We realize that each evil act leaves its mark indelibly impressed upon the record-leaves of our book of life.

"I appreciate thy kind wish to do something 'for my soul's sake' just as much as if thee wished me any real good or real blessing, for I know thee is in earnest and means it. But to me the wish would sound just as reasonable if thee had said, 'I wish you to believe for the sake of the eternal happiness of the central drop of water in yonder mill-dam.' I am just as certain that that drop of water will be eternally happy or miserable as that my soul will, and even more so; for the drop of water is a real entity, whereas soul is nothing.

"As to 'will not believe,' please render it 'cannot believe.' The will does not influence belief. Thee could not disbelieve in the resurrection of Jesus, with thy present feelings and evidences, if thee willed to do so ever so hard. In fact, thee could not even will at all. Thee is compelled, by thy organization, training, and evidences, to believe precisely as thee does believe. Could I believe that the veritable lamp of Aladdin was hidden in some cave of the Virginia mountains if I willed to do so ever so hard? Could I will to believe it? No; for I am certain it is not there, because it never could have existed. And it is precisely as impossible for me to believe in all the theological paraphernalia which thee has such faith in, because I know that, like that lamp, they are all myths and impossibilities. And why, then, condemn me for what I cannot believe? Thee says I have 'turned the testimonies aside on the slightest suspicion.' Can I help that when to me they are not testimonies at all? How much weight does thee allow to the testimony which is given to prove the wonderful miracles which are said to have occurred amongst the Mormons, Spiritualists, and Catholics, and which can be testified to by living witnesses—hundreds and thousands of them, many of whom would die to prove the truth of what they think they saw? And there are millions of miracles that are claimed to have taken place during the early ages of Christianity, and the testimony to all of these thee 'casts aside on the slightest suspicion,' because thee knows that, in the nature of things, it cannot be true.

"Arnold says that you 'construct a magnified and non-natural man, by dropping out all that in man seems a source of weakness, and inserting its contrary, and by heightening to the very utmost all that in man seems a source of strength, such as his thought and love, and then call it God. The objection to the magnified man and to the men ethereal-ized (angels) is one and the same: we have absolutely no experience whatever of either the one or the other. . . . The reasons drawn from miracles one cannot but dismiss with tenderness, for they belong to a great and splendid whole—a beautiful and powerful fairy-tale, which was long believed without question, and which has given comfort and joy to thousands. And one abandons them with a kind of unwilling disenchantment.'

"Does not thee see, then, friend David, that all of the whole chain of theological belief is, as Arnold says, 'a fairy-tale'—not all 'beautiful,' though, for dark shadows are reflected upon it by thoughts of hell and its torments, and the hell upon earth that millions have endured under its bigotry and tyranny. But the loving memories, sweet hopes, and precious thoughts that have clustered for ages around this 'fairy-tale' have cast a glamour over many and many a mind that might else have detected its fallacies and falsehoods."

"But I shall weary you, girls, if I read longer; so I will now tell you a little about my lady correspondent, and then give way to one of the rest. I have been writing to Miss Pansie for several years. She lives in California now, but lived in Tennessee when we were there. We have heretofore quietly ignored the subject of religion in our correspondence; she, because she was afraid she might hear something that would upset her faith; and I, because I never like to bore any one on a topic they do not care to talk upon. But we Infidels have too long simply acted upon the defensive. Now, since the scandalous proceedings of Comstock and other fanatics, I think it is time we became aggressive; that is, each one of us must take up the work individually, and do all we can to spread and circulate the principles of Freethought, supply all who will read with tracts, books, and papers, and coax others and still others to talk, read, and write upon the great and all-important theme. We must work while it is yet day if we would save the liberties we now have or obtain our full rights under the law. I think I shall not be able to make much impression upon Miss Pansie. She is one of the too numerous class of women who do not want to know anything but 'Christ and him crucified.' In her last letter she says:

"Some persons have thought more on this subject than was good for them—have thought till they hardly knew what they did think; but I am very certain that I am not going to let this little brain of mine take in more at a time than it can digest. Nothing on earth makes me madder than to hear an Infidel run down Christianity. I know that neither you nor any one else can alter my belief. I know that God did some things in olden times which seem strange to us, but he knows his business a great deal better than we do, and I am willing to leave it all to him. I feel that, if I were to read anything against him, he would feel like forsaking me entirely."

"Her last argument reminds me of what our partner's wife, Mrs. L——, once said when Mr. Darwin offered to fix her sewing-machine on Sunday. 'Oh, no! I'm afraid it would never sew another stitch for me if you do it on the Lord's day,' was her plea. I shall not give up all hope of Miss Pansie, however, but will drop a hint here and a thought there, and so work gradually towards the great end in view."

As Rose concluded her narrative, Jennie said she would now tell her little story, and, laying aside her sewing (for the girls were none of them idlers, and when one was talking or reading the rest were generally sewing, knitting, or crocheting), Jennie spoke as follows:

"In the first place, I want you to congratulate me, all of you, for I've completed the conversion of my dear father. It has been a blessed four months' labor with me, and no missionary ever worked harder or more faithfully than I have; and exceeding great has been my reward. It is hard to change the opinions of the old, as you all know, and father had such an intense love for his religion that it was like tearing away the very foundations of his existence. His clerical brethren have been doing all they could to keep him in the fold, but his great honesty and devotion to truth have brought him out safely. Once assured that there were flaws in his belief, he set seriously about it to separate the true from the false; and whoever does this rarely fails to land where we all did—on the shores of Atheism. Long, long ago Pascal said to the Jesuits, 'The world is getting mistrustful, and no longer believes things unless they are evident to it;' and this is daily growing to be more and more a fact. People do not swallow all manner of miracles as they once did. Father says he is satisfied now that all gods are but a gradual development; that from worshiping many material, visible objects men passed on to adoring the sum and substance of all things in the one great source of light, heat, and life—the sun; and from this sun-worship grew and developed a worship of the great invisible spirit, as they termed it; and this is now being resolved into nothingness by scientific scrutiny and research, and ere long we shall see the great masses of the civilized races settling down upon the hard-pan of fact and reality.

"So you see, girls, he is just where I have tried to lead him; and oh! am I not rejoiced! I have been trying also to get neighbor Mills to read and think for himself a little. You know he is a hot-headed, enthusiastic Methodist, and is always arguing with all who do not believe as he does. He flatly refused at first to read any tracts or papers that were Infidel in tendency. But I told him he was so good at fighting all other denominations and proving the supremacy of his own, that I thought he ought to be willing to take one round with an Infidel, especially when his opponent was only a girl. He laughed then, and said he would read just one book to please me. 'And will you criticise it for me, and say what you do not believe in it, and why?' said I. 'Yes, I'll do that too,' he replied. And so I gave him 'Bennett's Thirty Discussions.' And yesterday I received this letter from him, which I will read to you:

"'FRIEND JENNIE: I am afraid you will have much to answer for. It is now over three months since I received that book from you. I commenced at the first page and read the "Discussion on Prayer." I was greatly disturbed by it, I tell you. The man seemed honest, but so blasphemous! He shocked me terribly by talking as he did about Moses and the Midianites, and calling the Bible-God "fickle, changeable, cruel, and malicious." Then I read "The Snake Story," "The Flood," etc., and by this time I had got so muddled up that I put the book away and went at the Bible; but I couldn't make the old volume read right any more. Somehow your Mr. Bennett had spoiled the whole of it by his searching comments and queries. However, I prayed and read, and read and prayed, and when I had got in a good frame of mind again, and thought I could stand it, I took up Bennett once more. His "Arraignment of Priestcraft" gave me food for thought for a whole week. Then I got on "Elder Shelton" and "The Flood," and before I had finished that I just gave right up and said I would no longer try to smother my convictions, even if they led me into Atheism itself; and I really think I have lost my belief in a personal God and a Savior. Sometimes I think it is all a dream; then, again, I find myself wondering if I am not really on the road to hell, and if it is not all the work of the arch-fiend himself. I hear your father has also turned Infidel; and I am coming over to your house next Sunday to ask you both innumerable questions, which, if you can answer satisfactorily, will, I trust, lead me out of the tangle. If I can see and understand how the world can exist without a creator, and how things can be as they are, and all move along harmoniously while there is no hand at the helm, then I may be able to accept Atheism. But, Miss Jennie, I have one great stumbling-block to encounter—that is my wife. She is such a stanch church-member, and her whole heart is in her church. I fear she will almost go crazy if she finds out that I no longer believe in Christianity. I hope you will, therefore, keep all this from her till I really know what I do believe. Then we will enlighten her by degrees, and maybe lead her along slowly to—well, where I shall be. Sunday will, I hope, decide that. Till then, anxiously

"'Yours, JOHN MILLS.'"

The Influence of Christianity on Civilization.

Gilfillan, from whom we have before quoted, confesses that "for a wise and moderate extension of the right of voting, or any other boons to the lower orders, she (the Church) never asked, and probably never will." "All this," he continues, "shows the weakness of our present Christianity; its want of vital force; its incapacity to cope with the age; and the uncertainty of its prospects as to the future if not favored by supernatural aid." While this is true of the Church, the Freethinkers of England and of other European countries have been untiring in their efforts to extend the right of suffrage and to better the condition of the masses. Their reward has been not unfrequently, in the old world, imprisonment, fine, or exile. Some of them have lived to witness the triumph of the reform which they originated, or for which they labored and suffered, and to hear the clergy claim them as an outgrowth of the Christian religion.

"If you insist," says Higginson, "in giving the name of Christianity to the whole progress of modern civilization, you may claim these reforms as Christian, but in no mere technical sense. And the reason is plain. It is not that there were worse men inside the Church, but they were preoccupied with saving the souls of men by some doctrine or ritual, and so left it to unbelievers and secular men to look after the bodies."

On the whole I think it is clear that Infidelity, as much and as violently as it has been denounced by the clergy, and dreaded by religious people generally, has encouraged reform and exerted a good influence on the world.

It is a piece of strategy on the part of the defenders of the Christian religion to represent that the evils, which Freethinkers ascribe to their faith, are the result of a perversion of Christianity, and not of the system itself as taught by Christ and his apostles. It was a corruption of our holy religion, they say, that prevailed during the dark ages. That religion which exists in Catholic countries, and those forms of Christianity which oppose the reformatory and progressive movements of the age, should not, it is said, be confounded with the religion of the New Testament. If we ask for a definition of Christianity, the best moral precepts of the Bible are quoted, and we are asked how such teachings, if reduced to practice, could lead to bad results.

But it does not require much logical discrimination to see that a few rules of morality, or even a complete code of moral ethics do not constitute Christianity. Confucius, Socrates, Plato, and Epictetus taught the most beautiful sentiments contained in the New Testament, and they were men of pure and noble lives, but surely nobody will claim that they were Christians. Do any of the orthodox churches admit to membership all who accept for their moral guide the Golden Rule? Do they not make inquiries respecting the religious opinions of the applicant? Do they not require a declaration of belief in certain doctrines? The fact is the Golden Rule and other moral precepts are affirmed to be Christianity by orthodox Christians only when in discussion with Freethinkers they find it convenient to ignore those dogmas to which can be traced undeniably bad results. Another class of minds, those that have mostly outgrown the Christian religion, but that dread to give up the name, find it more agreeable to repeat a few of the universally accepted precepts of morality, claim them as their religion, and say they are Christians as they understand the word, than to put themselves in opposition to a name for which the remains of their old superstition make them yet reverent, and which with so many is still the synonym of truth and virtue.

But the least reflection will convince any intelligent mind that Christianity is really a system of religion, and demands belief in dogmas that have no necessary connection with morals. Belief in a God, in a future state of existence, in the resurrection of the body, in the fall of man, in the incarnation, in salvation through Christ, in a personal devil, in angels and demons, in the merit of faith and the sinfulness of unbelief, in the divine origin and authoritative character of the Bible, the Old and the New Testament—these are some of the prominent beliefs necessary to constitute an individual a Christian. He who accepts them is a Christian, just as he who believes in Mohammed and the Koran is a Mohammedan. These doctrines were all accepted during the dark ages, and had every chance to exert their legitimate influence. To say that the Christianity of those times was a corruption of the pure article, because it was accompanied by great ignorance and moral darkness, when, in truth, its most characteristic teachings never had greater prominence, is to take a most absurd position, and which, it seems to me, implies a want of logical acumen or offers evidence of actual disingenuousness. Equally weak is the assumption that Catholic countries are not Christian countries, since the Catholic accepts all the essential doctrines of the Christian system, all the dogmas which make up the creeds of the orthodox Protestant denominations.

I will endeavor to indicate how the doctrines and teachings of Christianity, the system itself, and not a perversion of it, have been injurious to the progress of civilization.

Christianity gives such prominence to a future life, regards the secular affairs of this world as of so little account, and attaches so much importance to a religious preparation for death, that in proportion to the intensity with which it is believed and realized, it must divert attention from the real concerns of life, and destroy all relish for the physical sciences and useful arts. He who, regarding this world as of but little importance, is almost constantly contemplating the real or imaginary glories of another, or is perplexed and harassed with doubts as to whether he and his friends will be saved or damned, is not the man to give us great discoveries and inventions, or to take a lively interest in the affairs of this world. Fortunately, they who profess Christianity in this practical and comparatively unreligious age, have no deep and realizing conviction of the truth of its teachings respecting the future. Hence its influence in turning the mind from the proper pursuits of life is very small in comparison with the influence in this direction which it exerted when it was fully believed. The Christian, the energies of whose mind are absorbed chiefly in trying to save souls, is alone a true and consistent Christian, and it is impossible that such a frame of mind can be otherwise than unfriendly to intellectual pursuits or practical reforms.

Another of the teachings of Christianity which is hostile to intellectual and moral progress is, that religious skepticism and unbelief are of a criminal nature, or that they imply moral demerit. It deters the mind from investigation. It makes man a moral slave. And it supports and perpetuates old systems of error, which a little fearless investigation would expose, but which, continued from generation to generation, produce the most disastrous results to the cause of human progress. The doctrine that religious skepticism is a crime leads to the belief that skepticism respecting any established time-honored and cherished institution or opinion is criminal. Religious persecution, too, is a legitimate result of the doctrine that certain opinions involve merit, and other opinions involve guilt. Religious persecution is undeniably one of the greatest foes to intellectual advancement as well as to the general happiness of man. The best men are generally its victims. "Who can pretend to say," says Darwin, "why the Spanish nation, so dominant at one time, has been distanced in the race. The awakening of the nations of Europe from the dark ages is a still more perplexing problem. At this early period, as Mr. Galton has remarked, almost all the men of gentle nature, those given to meditation or culture of the mind, had no refuge except in the bosom of the Church, which demanded celibacy, and this could hardly have failed to have a deteriorating influence on each successive generation. During this same period the Holy Inquisition selected with extreme care the freest and boldest men in order to burn and imprison them. In Spain alone some of the best men, those who doubted and questioned, and without doubting and questioning there can be no progress, were eliminated during three centuries at the rate of a thousand a year" (Descent of Man, vol. i, pp. 171–2).

It is true that many of the precepts of the New Testament enjoin submission and love; but a moral precept is powerless to counteract the effects of an erroneous principle, conscientiously entertained. Thousands of benevolent men, regarding unbelief or heresy as a crime of which the effect is the damnation of the soul, and desiring naturally enough to avert so terrible a calamity, have imprisoned and otherwise punished their fellow-men to arrest the progress of their opinions. Any good man, seeing thousands liable to be ruined by a false doctrine, and believing the man disseminating it the enemy of his Creator, will, if he has the power, confine, and if necessary to deter others, punish with severity that man, to prevent the injurious influence of his blasphemous teachings. What is the imprisonment, or even the death of a few individuals, he argues, compared with the eternal torture of thousands which will result if the heresy is not checked. It is easy to see why some of the most conscientious and benevolent men and women have been among the most bitter persecutors. It is easy to believe Llorente when he says that the founders of the Spanish Inquisition were men whose characters were unstained by vice, and who acted from an earnest desire to save the souls of men.

Science and the Arts.

The Doctrine of Filiation, or Descent-Theory.

BY PROF. ERNST HAECKEL.

Let us now pass on to examine and clearly limit our conception of an organic tribe. By tribe, or phylum, we understand all those organisms of whose blood relationship and descent from a common primary form there can be no doubt, or whose relationship, at least, is most probable from anatomical reasons, as well as from reasons founded on historical development. Our tribes, or phyla, according to this idea, essentially coincide with those few "great classes," or "main classes," of which Darwin also thinks that each contains only organisms related by blood, and of which, both in the animal and in the vegetable kingdoms, he only assumes either four or five. In the animal kingdom these tribes would essentially coincide with those four, five, or six main divisions which zoologists, since Bär and Cuvier, have distinguished as "main forms, general plans, branches, or sub-kingdoms" of the animal kingdom. Bär and Cuvier distinguished only four of them, namely: 1. The vertebrate animals (Vertebrata); 2. The articulated animals (Articulata); 3. The molluscous animals (Mollusca); and 4. The radiated animals (Radiata). At present six are generally distinguished, since the tribe of the articulated animals is divided into two tribes, those possessing articulated feet (Anthropoda), and the worms (Vermes); and in like manner the tribe of radiated animals is subdivided into two tribes of the star animals (Echinodermata) and the animal-plants (Zoophyta). Within each of these six tribes, all the included animals, in spite of great variety in external form and inner structure, nevertheless possess such numerous and important characteristics in common that there can be no doubt of their blood relationship. The same applies also to the six great main classes which modern botany distinguishes in the vegetable kingdom, namely: 1. Flowering plants (Phanergamia); 2. Ferns (Filicinæ); 3. Mosses (Muscinæ); 4. Lichens (Lichenes); 5. Fungi (Fungi); and 6. Waterweeds (Algæ). The last three groups, again, show such close relations to one another that by the name of "Thallus plants" they may be contrasted with the first three main classes, and consequently the number of phyla, or main groups, of the vegetable kingdom may be reduced to the number of four. Mosses and ferns may likewise be comprised as "Prothallus plants" (Prothallophyte), and thereby the number of plant tribes reduced to three—Flowering plants, Prothallus plants, and Thallus plants.

Very important facts in the anatomy and the history of development, both in the animal and vegetable kingdoms, support the supposition that even these few main classes or tribes are connected at their roots, that is, that the lowest and most ancient primary forms of all three are related by blood to one another. Nay, by a further examination we are obliged to go still a step further, and to agree with Darwin's supposition that even the two pedigrees of the animal and vegetable kingdom are connected at the lowest roots, and that the lowest and most ancient animals and plants are derived from a single common primary creature. According to our view, this common primeval organism can have been nothing but a Moneron which took its origin by spontaneous generation.

In the meantime we shall at all events be acting cautiously if we avoid this last step, and assume true blood relationship only within each tribe, or phylum, where it has been undeniably and surely established by facts in comparative anatomy, ontogeny, and phylogeny. But we may here point to the fact that two different fundamental forms of genealogical hypothesis are possible, and that all the different investigations of the Theory of Descent in relation to the origin of organic groups of forms will, in future, tend more and more in one or the other of these directions. The unitary, or monophyletic, hypothesis of descent will endeavor to trace the first origin of all individual groups of organisms, as well as their totality, to a single common species of Moneron which originated by spontaneous generation. The multiple, or polyphyletic, hypothesis of descent, on the other hand, will assume that several different species of Monera have arisen by spontaneous generation, and that these gave rise to several different main classes (tribes, or phyla). The apparently great contrast between these two hypotheses is in reality of very little importance. For both the monophyletic and the polyphyletic hypothesis of descent must necessarily go back to the Monera as the most ancient root of the one or of the many organic tribes. But as the whole body of a Moneron consists only of a simple, formless mass, without component particles, made up of a single albuminous combination of carbon, it follows that the different Monera can only be of a chemical nature and can only consist in a different atomic composition of that mucous albuminous combination. But these subtle and complicated differences of mixture of the infinitely manifold combinations of albumen are not appreciable by the rude and imperfect means of human observation, and are, consequently, at present of no further interest to the task we have in hand.

The question of the monophyletic or polyphyletic origin will constantly recur within each individual tribe, where the origin of a smaller or of a larger group is discussed. In the vegetable kingdom, for example, some botanists will be inclined to derive all flowering plants from a single form of fern, while others will prefer the idea that several different groups of Phanerogama have sprung from several different groups of ferns. In like manner, in the animal kingdom, some zoologists will be more in favor of the supposition that all placental animals are derived from a single pouched animal; others will be more in favor of the opposite supposition that several different groups of placental animals have proceeded from several different pouched animals. In regard to the human race itself, some will prefer to derive it from a single form of ape, while others will be more inclined to the idea that several different races of men have arisen independently of one another, out of several different species of ape. Without here expressing our opinion in favor of either the one or the other conception, we must, nevertheless, remark that in general the monophyletic hypothesis of descent deserves to be preferred to the polyphyletic hypothesis of descent. In accordance with the chorological proposition of a single "center of creation" or of a single primeval home for most species (which has already been discussed), we may be permitted to assume that the original form of every larger or smaller natural group only originated once in the course of time, and only in one part of the earth. We may safely assume this simple original root, that is, the monophyletic origin, in the case of all the more highly developed groups of the animal and vegetable kingdoms. But it is very possible that the more complete Theory of Descent of the future will involve the polyphyletic origin of very many of the low and imperfect groups of the two organic kingdoms.

For these reasons I consider it best, in the mean time, to adopt the monophyletic hypothesis of descent both for the animal and for the vegetable kingdom. Accordingly the abovementioned six tribes, or phyla, of the animal kingdom must be connected at their lowest root, and likewise the three or six main classes, or phyla, of the vegetable kingdom must be traced to a common and most ancient original form. How the connection of these tribes is to be conceived I shall explain in the succeding chapters. But before proceeding to this, we must occupy ourselves with a very remarkable group of organisms, which cannot without artificial constraint be assigned to either the pedigree of the vegetable or to that of the animal kingdom. These interesting and important organisms are the primary creatures, or Protista.

All organisms which we comprise under the name of Protista show in their external form, in their inner structure, and in all their vital phenomena, such a remarkable mixture of animal and vegetable properties that they cannot with perfect justice be assigned either to the animal or to the vegetable kingdom; and for more than twenty years an endless and fruitless dispute has been carried on as to whether they are to be assigned to this or that kingdom. Most of the Protista are so small that they can scarcely, if at all, be perceived with the naked eye. Hence the majority of them have become known only during the last fifty years, since by the help of the improved and general use of the microscope these minute organisms have been more frequently observed and more accurately examined. However, no sooner were they better known than endless disputes arose about their real nature and their position in the natural system of organisms. Many of these doubtful primary creatures botanists defined as animals, and zoologists as plants; neither of the two would own them. Others, again, were declared by botanists to be plants, and by zoologists to be animals; each claimed them. These contradictions are not altogether caused by our imperfect knowledge of the Protista, but in reality by their true nature. Indeed, most Protista present such a confused mixture of several animal and vegetable characteristics that each investigator may arbitrarily assign them to either the animal or vegetable kingdom. Accordingly as he defines these two kingdoms, and as he looks upon this or that characteristic as determining the animal or vegetable nature, he will assign the individual classes of Protista in one case to the animal and in another to the vegetable kingdom. But this systematic difficulty has become an inextricable knot by the fact that all more recent investigation on the lowest organisms have completely effaced, or at least destroyed, the shar boundary between the animal and vegetable kingdom which had hitherto existed, and to such a degree that its restoration is possible only by means of a completely artificial definition of the two kingdoms. But this definition could not be made so as to apply to many of the Protista.

Cuttlefish; or, How to Evade an Answer.

The editor of The Index reserved the printing of my "Answer to Index Criticisms" on the Faneuil Hall speech until he could giv it with six columns of an attempt at a reply, and in his last issue before the meeting of the Liberal League Congress.

This course was doubtless felt to be necessary from the nature of the reply. The cuttlefish when it wishes to escape "emits its ink" to darken the water and blind its opponents. The editor has merely done the same thing by shouting, "Evasion!" but he cannot escape by the length of his crying. The questions are too plain and substantial.

I. There is nothing in the claim that I evaded his criticism of what he calls the "technical part" of the argument. The speech proved that the Comstock laws could not be included in the Postal grant of the Constitution, which was limited to postal powers and purposes. He made, and has made, no answer to this conclusion except that such powers were "of the same nature" as "counterfeiting," and that the regulations as to "postal cards" were inconsistent with my claim that the Postal Department could have nothing to do with the meaning or sentiments of inclosed matter mailed. He also tried to crush me by throwing the vast power of the Supreme Court on one "individual" lawyer.

Now, he has simply evaded my answers to those criticisms, for I showed conclusively that the expression of the impliable power to punish counterfeiting excluded the idea of any similar implied powers; and I showed that the postal card regulations were purely "postal" because of the enforced publicity of their meaning, which entirely separated them from inclosed matter in postal usage.

He has not one single new word to show that Congress has the power to pass these laws. He makes no attempt to reply to these answers, and the judgment of every fair mind must go against him upon them. He merely falls back upon the authority of the Supreme Court.

I said that he had no right to fall back upon that authority, either as an editor or as a Liberal.

(1) As an editor, because he had admitted that that Court was wrong in holding these laws, as they are, to be constitutional, and therefore it was "inconsistent cruelty" on me and the rest of the Liberals to hold that we must be prostrated before the Supreme Court while he refused to submit to it.

No cry of evasion can avail here, and so the editor resorts to denial, which is worse. He speaks of my "astonishing assertion that we [i. e., he] hav ourselves admitted that the present Comstock laws are unconstitutional. We hav done no such thing. The Supreme Court has simply declared the law itself constitutional. We simply declared the administration of the law by the lower courts to be unconstitutional."

We have only to call attention to the exact words we quoted from his criticisms referred to, and say that no denial in such case can be of any use. He said:

> "We entirely agree with Mr. Wakeman that the Comstock laws, as they hav been administered—nay, more, as they can scarcely fail to be administered, so long as they retain their present dangerous vagueness and indefiniteness—flagrantly violate the freedom of the press, and are certainly for that reason UNCONSTITUTIONAL. His argument is powerful and UNANSWERABLE, so far as it relates to these laws in their present form."

He says thereby that those laws, as they stand—not "as they hav been administered by the lower courts"—flagrantly violate the freedom of the press, and are certainly for that reason UNCONSTITUTIONAL." The Supreme Court held exactly otherwise in its dictum!

After that, he has no right to appeal to the infallibility of the Supreme Court against me or anybody.

(2.) As a Liberal it will never do for him or for any one to invoke the authority of the Supreme Court on questions of liberty, further than the reasons it givs sustain it. The speech proved the necessity of the Liberal right of dissent, and that only by it had the country been saved time and time again. Is it not strange work for the President of a Liberal League to ask us to submit to the mere authority of a Court on questions that involve the whole of our liberties?

The editor's denial compels him to admit now the absolute authority of the Supreme Court, and to withdraw the admission he did make above quoted. Let the Liberals think twice before they follow him in this suicidal course of submission to the dictum of this Court!

II. He says I evade the question of the amendment of the Comstock laws so as to make them constitutional. I do nothing of the kind. I proved at length that this cannot be done, by showing that "espionage and decoy" were their very substance, and I showed by the example of Livingston the impossibility of it, especially in the case of national postal laws, and I demanded that the editor should show us "a reformed Comstock law," or forever hold his peace. He evades; he does not giv us such law; he says it is humiliating to say that it cannot be done, and that "where there is a will there is a way."

Very well! Now he has the will, let him show us the way! To the suggestions he made I answered, showing the utter folly of them. He makes no reply, except that he wishes to make the moral intent a matter of legal intent. My reply to that remains good: Only the Inquisition did that! And only an Inquisition can do it.

III. He says I evade the question that if Congress does not punish the mailing of obscene literature it must go unpunished, for no other power can. This was answered completely. It was shown that mailing was an innocent act, but that the circulation was the trouble; that Congress could no reach that, and that only the state laws could, and had, and should; that the espionage and decoy of these postal laws were wholly inefficient, and that the state laws must be applied and could punish the mailing as a part of the circulation, just as it could "expressing;" that to give Congress the right to punish crimes not committed to it to punish by the Constitution, was to giv it unlimited criminal jurisdiction, and practically to end our constitutional liberties.

The editor chooses to evade all this by asserting that circulating obscene literature was a crime at common law, which is not true, and is wholly immaterial if it was. This is the merest cuttlefishing.

IV. The editor says I evade his postal card objection. There was no evasion whatever. I answered

(1) That postal cards entirely differed from the ordinary inclosed postal matter; in that, the Department became responsible for the enforced publicity of their meaning. That therefore there were postal difficulties which would prevent the use of these cards at all, unless the meaning could be protected from injuring the receiver, or attracting the public, by some regulation that should take the place of the usual postal wrapper.

(2) That Congress could certainly do this as a condition of granting that new service which, as in the case of merchandise, related to new matter that was not originally included as postal matter under the Constitution.

The editor replies to neither of these answers, except by emissions of ink and vigorous shouting. He has evaded or missed the point of each one of these positions, which still stand conclusive, as the reader will see who will read the speech and the "answer" (pp. 29–45, Bennett's edition). There never was a bolder or clearer case of cuttlefishing. This ends the so-called "evasions."

The editor next drops his cry of evasion, and trots out five "men of straw," and endeavors to escape behind them; but, instead of being men of straw, they are so many logical policemen to arrest him.

1. He repeats that he believes that the Supreme Court "is substantially right on this subject."

This taking back of the admission he did make is no "straw man," but a real one, and ought to condemn his position, in the mind of every Liberal, at once. If the Supreme Court is to be taken as authority on questions of liberty, it is the end of us Liberals; we had better disband and let that Court do our thinking for us.

2. The next "straw man" is his attempted return to the second plank of the card platform, which he now denies that he ever really abandoned. I proved that he did do so, or else that he did not know the meaning of his own words. He does not reply to my showing, or answer, at all, and stands convicted of either one alternative or the other.

3. Straw man No. 3, he says, is my attributing to Congress the power of "creating a new crime" if we recognize its right to exclude obscene literature from the mails, i.e., to make a crime of that mailing. There is no straw man here, but a real one, for he makes no reply to my argument; he admits it, and he must. For if Congress can make a terrible crime of mailing one thing it can of mailing any thing. He therefore throws overboad the words of the Constitution as simply in the way of what he calls "a broad and healthy statesmanship," in which "the Supreme Court obeyed strictly the general spirit of the Constitution."

What are our liberties worth when Congress can "create crimes," or even punish those which are crimes at "common law," by its judgment of "broad and healthy statesmanship," and the "general spirit of the Constitution?" This is no straw man. The creation of crimes ad libitum by Congress is the logical conclusion to which the editor is brought, and which he admits, and it should end his story and cause at once with all thinking people.

IV. He says it is a "straw man" in that I claim that his position and quoted words confounded all distinctions, legal and practical, between the federal and state criminal jurisdictions.

He does not reply to my showing that he was guilty of mingled "ignorance and indifference" on this most vital of questions. He admits all I charged and a great deal more. He actually claims that "the necessities of governmental evolution" compel us to recognize a new "EXEGESIS of the Constitution!" That the national government for national purposes must be made to include what was never originally intended by its makers because it may become convenient or even necessary "to extend its criminal jurisdiction under new circumstances and new times."

This is his old story. My answer was, and is, Then it must be done by Constitutional amendment in a way in which the people can protect themselves, and not by unlimited and irresponsible Congressional and judicial usurpation of the right to create or punish crimes which the Constitution never gave. He does not condescend to notice my answer to the second plank of the Card platform in this respect, wherein I demanded that he should propose to the League to amend the Constitution if he wished to give it this general jurisdiction he claims. Until he proves my arguments to be wrong, or proposes this amendment, he has no right to land us in a new irresponsible "exegesis" of the Constitution. This word, exegesis, is a technical term of theology, and describes just what should never be admitted in legal or Constitutional construction.

V. His fifth and last "man of straw" is also a solid one. He says I have misrepresented him in saying that he represented the position of the Liberals as in favor of obscenity. I did nothing of the kind. I merely quoted his words, they did it if he is misrepresented. He insisted there was a "difference of principles;" "that all Liberals were in favor of liberty, but that it is not true that all Liberals are opposed to obscenity."

He said that the freedom of the press I favored "included the legal right to publish, circulate, and mail real obscenity." He said that the repeal position was "UTTERLY IMMORAL." He kept on repeating these misrepresentations in every form he could devise, and they are still his principal stock in trade.

I answered them conclusively. I proved that the repeal of these pernicious and unconstitutional laws would not leave the circulation of obscene literature, or even the "mailing of it," unpunished; that "it had been suppressed by Constitutional state laws before these postal laws were passed, and that it could and would be again, and I so guaranteed. He evades all this answer, and gives us a column of horror over his panic to the effect that the general consequences of the repeal of these laws will be to facilitate crime. The same might be said of every other unconstitutional criminal law, and proves only that such laws should be repealed at once, for their enforcement is a crime in itself often more dangerous than the crime it pretends to remedy.

But the repeal will not facilitate the crime, for it will at once call into existence the constitutional, lawful, and common sense means of repressing it which hav been and can readily be made effectual I know this from experience.

The opposite course will simply result in making the "Freelovers" the only advocates of constitutional liberty of free speech and of a free post-office in this country. Can we, as Liberals, afford to give them this position? To do it, is to give them immense power—it is practically to abdicate in their favor.

Feeling surer than ever that I am right, I cannot consent to join "the Liberals" who take this position. The editor likens me to a "lost Indian," who concluded the "wigwam was lost," not he. This is the greatest "misapprehension" the editor has made yet. He actually mistakes me for himself. It is he who is lost in the "necessities of the governmental evolution" of his new constitutional "exegesis." I, who have remained within the old "wigwam" of the Constitution as the Fathers built it, have never been lost at all. There I invite all who do not wish to be lost to remain with me.

T. B. WAKEMAN.

New York, Oct. 24, 1878.

National Liberal League.

Prof. A. L. Rawson, of New York, made a few very effective remarks. He said he had kept silent thus far during the session of the Congress, but he felt now that the time had come for him to speak. He opposed the re-election of Mr. Abbot for reasons which to him seemed quite sufficient. He could not approve of Mr. Abbot's conduct toward a brother Liberal editor who was stricken down by Anthony Comstock, and for whom the prison doors stood ready to open. His treatment of that brother had not been such as the head of the League ought to have extended. He alluded also to the efforts made by Mr. Abbot to defeat the petition which seventy thousand of the lovers of freedom had signed asking for the repeal or radical modification of the infamous Comstock postal laws, which doubtless defeated that important movement. He said it was a great mistake that the Liberal League had not taken proper ground upon that question, to stand by its editors and speakers. One of the Liberal lecturers is now under arrest awaiting trial, the prison doors standing open for him, and it was no more than the duty of the Liberal Leagues to extend aid and sympathy to him. He did not believe it was any part of the duty of the President of the League to turn the cold shoulder towards Liberal editors and speakers who were brought into trouble by the machinations of the Young Men's Christian Association. He could not vote for a man who could not be liberal enough to take a proper stand in this respect.

Mrs. Hope Whipple said she had had conversation recently with Mr. Elizur Wright and she knew that he did not want the office of President of the League. His cares and duties required his whole attention and she knew that he preferred the re-election of Mr. Abbot.

This was not regarded as as an authorized withdrawal of his name and after the mode of voting was settled upon ballots were prepared. The delegates remained in their seats and tellers went around with hats in which the ballots were deposited. Upon being counted the vote was announced thus:

For Elizur Wright.....76.
For F. E. Abbot.....51.

It should be remarked that Mr. Abbot had previously asked Dr. T. L. Brown to take the chair and preside which he did and continued to so preside through the meeting. The candidates for Secretary, Treasurer, and Assistant Secretary on the Abbot ticket withdrew their names.

Judge Hurlbut arose with the air of injured dignity and expressed his displeasure at the vote that had been given. He said he had now but a few words more to say, after that he would trouble the League no further. He wished now to sever his connection with the League, to withdraw his life membership as well as to resign his Vice-Presidency. After a few more words he took his hat and walked out, thus forsaking the League because its delegates had exercised the right of voting according to their wishes for the principal officer of its organization, and had not complied with the Judge's ideas in the matter. As he passed out, a few felt like cheering, and others said "Let him go; we can get along without him."

B. F. Underwood also resigned his position as Vice-President, and expressed dissatisfaction with the vote that had been given. Some of Mr. Underwood's friends regretted to see him take this course simply because the members of the Congress had exercised their legitimate natural right and had expressed their choice in the selection of its presiding officer.

R. B. Hallowell, of Boston, said, "As my name is on that list of officers, both as charter member and Vice-President, I hereby resign the doubtful honor." A voice said, "Good-by."

Henry Damon was elected Secretary, and Mrs. Hope Whipple was elected Assistant Secretary, whereupon she said, "I most respectfully decline to serve;" after which Mrs. Augusta Cooper Bristol was elected to the position.

Courtlandt Palmer, of New York was elected Treasurer, and H. L. Green Chairman of the Executive Committee.

The Rev. G. E. Gordon, of Milwaukee, said, "I wish to say, that as the minority are out of sympathy with this League, I invite them to meet me in the parlors of the Syracuse House in order that we may advise together as to what course we shall take to defend ourselves."

Then nearly fifty of the Abbot party seceded from the League and went across the street to the Syracuse House, where they held a conference and appointed a committee to report in the evening the course which should be taken by the seceders. This secession was, of course, regretted. It would hav been pleasanter to hav had the organization remained intact, working harmoniously in the cause of Liberalism, letting the will of the majority be the governing power in the selection of officers. The course of the secessionists seemed childish and with insufficient grounds.

Among those of the Abbot faction who declined to go with the seceders were Prof. J. E. Oliver of Ithaca, Judge Stephen Brewer of Cortland, and Mrs. Clara Neyman of New York. As an appreciation of their good sense in this matter they were elected Vice-Presidents of the National Liberal League.

Henry Damon, who had just been elected Secretary, addressed the League, thanking the members for the confidence reposed in him, but he felt that he was not quite fitted for the position, and he begged leave to resign the place. Several requested him not to resign, but he insisted that he must do so; that he was sure that by temperament and mental organization he was not fitted to the duties.

A. L. Rawson was then elected in his place, and at once entered upon the duties of the position.

A resolution was passed to the effect that the League should hav no special organ, but that all Liberal papers should be requested to act as such.

After the transaction of some other business the League took up the discussion of the subject of the communication of the Western German Radicals, as read by Mrs. Neyman. Several persons participated in it, and this closed the afternoon session.

SUNDAY EVENING SESSION

was made up of addresses by B. F. Underwood, on the "Conditions of Success," and Dr. Schlessinger of Albany, on "Morality and Liberty," after which a few remarks were made by Dr. Brown and Prof. Toohey, when the Congress adjourned sine die.

MEETING OF THE SECESSIONISTS.

Rev. Mr. Gordon called the meeting to order at the Syracuse House, and Judge Hurlbut was made chairman, and R. B. Hallowell was chosen secretary.

C. D. B. Mills, of Syracuse, Rev. G. E. Gordon, of Milwaukee, B. F. Underwood, of Thorndike, Mass., the President and Secretary were named a committee to prepare a paper giving expression to the feelings of the meeting and setting forth the causes which justified its withdrawal from the Wieting Opera House meeting.

The following committee to organize a new association was appointed: F. E. Abbot, C. D. B. Mills, the Rev. D. H. Clark, J. McDonough, Mrs. S. D. Otis, Judge Hurlbut, and R. B. Hallowell. An adjournment was then taken to await the report of this committee.

The above committee returned soon, and reported through Mr. Underwood:

WHEREAS, The Congress of the National Liberal League, assembled at Syracuse, Oct. 26 and 27, 1878, to which we were delegates, was radically divided into two parties, one favoring total repeal, and the other opposed to such repeal, of certain laws of the United States relating to the circulation of obscene literature, and

WHEREAS, The whole question was, by the proposition of the majority and the consent of the minority, dropped from the consideration of the present Congress; and

WHEREAS, The subsequent nomination and election of the chief executive officers for the ensuing year, including the President, were made by the majority dependent upon their expressed opinion on the question, which had been thus disposed of, to the surprise and deep disappointment of the minority, and

WHEREAS, The minority cannot but regard this action of the majority as a breach of faith and an unjust act toward the minority, therefore,

Resolved, That we, the undersigned, protest against the actions, aims, and results of such proceedings, and hereby withdraw from the session of the Congress to take such action as we may in the future deem advisible.

Resolved, That we believe that the existing United States laws against obscenity need to be reformed and amended, being now in several particulars oppressive in the modes of administration and in the penalties, yet we are in favor of proper laws, by state and national governments, against the publication and circulation of obscene literature, tending to corrupt the morals of youth.

The above protest was signed by the following:

Judge E. B. Hurlbut, Albany; F. E. Abbot, Boston; C. D. B. Mills, Syracuse; B. F. Underwood, Thorndike, Mass.; R. P. Hallowell, Boston; Rev. G. E. Gordon, Milwaukee; Rev. David H. Clark, Florence, Mass.; E. A. Sawtelle, Boston; Mrs. S. B. Otis, Boston; D. G. Crandon, Chelsea, Mass.; W. H. Hamlen, Boston; F. Goodyear, Cortland; J. F. Watkeys, Nettie C. Truesdell, Harriet A. Mills, Syracuse; Matilda J. Gage, Fayetteville; M. W. Dodge, Albany; J. H. Adamson, Passaic, N. J.; Thomas Dugan, Albany; J. B. Pike, Rochester; D. B. Morey, Malden, Mass.; Moses Hayes, Rochester; S. R. Urbino, West Newton, Mass.; W. D. Hunt, Scott, N. Y., Mrs. Hope Whipple, Boston; Charles Ellis, Boston; J. W. Truesdell, Syracuse; H. P. Stark, Rochester; Joseph McDonough, Albany; Rev. Dr. Schlessinger, John Prest, Catharine B. Hurlbut, Albany; E. York, Chelsea, Mass.

ADOPTING A CONSTITUTION.

At nine o'clock in the evening the seceders went into the parlors of the Syracuse House again and were called to order by Judge Hurlbut.

R. P. Hallowell submitted the report on the organization of the new League. The new League takes the preambles of the Constitution of the National Liberal League adopted at Philadelphia, 1876, and continues as follows:

Therefore we, the protesting members of the Second Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, convened at Syracuse, N. Y., Oct. 26, and 27, 1878, hereby associate ourselves together and adopt the following Constitution:

ART 1. The National Liberal League of America, founded on the principles originally adopted at the Centennial Congress of Liberals at Philadelphia in 1876.

The remainder of the constitution was the old one and all were adopted as a whole.

The following resolution was adopted:

Resolved, That all local Leagues that approve of the formation of the National Liberal League of America, are invited to dissolve their connection with the old League and to join this League.

The Index was adopted as the official organ of the League.

The following officers of the new League were elected.

President—Francis E. Abbot, Boston.

Secretary—W. H. Hamlen, Boston.

Assistant Secretary—Miss Jane B. Titcomb, Boston.

Treasurer—J. A. J. Wilcox, Boston.

Board of Directors—F. E. Abbot, J. A. J. Wilcox, W. H. Hamlen, C. D. B. Mills, D. G. Crandon.

Chairman Executive Committee—C. D. B. Mills, Syracuse.

The new League then adjourned after a vote of thanks to Judge Hurlbut.

DISHONESTY.

In the closing remarks in reference to the deliberations of the National Liberal League, it must be regretted that such an amount of dishonesty and unfairness has been exhibited from the beginning to the present time. The opponents of the Comstock laws hav been steadily denounced as being in favor of obscenity, as being immoral, Freelovers, etc., etc. This was begun in The Index in December last, when it took such positive grounds against the repeal petition, and the same slanderous imputations hav since been repeatedly thrown out, and also during the Congress. Several members of the Abbot wing held themselves up as the party of morality and decency, while their opponents were the advocates of obscenity, Freeloveism, indecency, and crime. The same false cry was taken up by the Syracuse papers, and the two divisions were continuously denominated the Freelove party and the moral party. We protest against the injustice of this. Not a word was said by either party in favor of Freelove, not a word in favor of obscenity; still the slanderers hav persisted in calling those opposed to the Comstock laws by the vile terms named. We wish to distinctly affirm that the anti-Abbot party are just as moral, just as free from indecency and Freeloveism, as those who so zealously follow him; and it is only meanness that makes them denounce those fully as spotless as themselves.

It is pretty well known that there are several persons in the Abbot ranks whose lives hav not been quite spotless, and to whom the term "libertine" may not be inaptly applied. It is not improbable that these persons feel the need of having their characters re-galvanized somewhat by joining what purports to be the moral party. Such men are the first to decry Freelovers and the loudest in shouting obscenity. These are those who are most offended because honest people are opposed to one of the most infamous laws that ever disgraced the statute books of our country.

A Bare Escape.

After our arrival home, we learned by the Syracuse papers of Monday last that our special friends of the Young Men's Christian Association had it in their hearts to cause us to be arrested once more, as the following taken from the Syracuse Standard will show. We took an assortment of books with us to Syracuse to sell to those who might wish to purchase them, but some one supposing that it might be some benefit to us, or for some other cause, induced the ruling that no books should be offered for sale in the Opera House; so accordingly we had our stock opened in the room of H. L. Green, in the Syracuse House, where a few friends called for what they wished. Among other books, we took a limited number of "Cupid's Yokes," and found a goodly number of friends who wished to purchase. It seems the excellent men of the Y. M. C. A. did not approve of it; but here is the extract from the Standard:

OBSCENE LITERATURE.

The man Bennett of the New York party, the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, New York, was busy yesterday, at least, circulating obscene literature in the city of Syracuse. He was at parlor No. 12 Syracuse House and there sold copies of a book called "Cupid's Yokes, or the Binding Forces of Conjugal Life," by E. H. Heywood. The pamphlet is composed of twenty-three pages; it is the book which caused such a sensation at the State Liberal Convention at Watkins and the sale of which caused the arrest of the party making such sale. Steps were taken last evening by Secretary Sayford, of the Young Men's Christian Association to secure the arrest of Bennett, and put a stop to this nefarious business.

So it seems, by our leaving Syracuse Sunday night that we might be ready to attend to our legitimate business on Monday morning, we escaped passing a night in jail. But if the very Christian Secretary, Mr. Sayford, particularly wishes us, he can easily find us, at almost any hour of the day, at our office at 141 Eighth St. We do not deny that we sold "Cupid's Yokes." We fully believe that, as an American citizen, we hav a right to sell it, and we shall continue to do so until we are immured in a prison for the vast offense; and we hope, when we are stricken down for this, that others will rise in our place who will hav moral courage and independence enough to do the same. We are now well along on our second thousand since our Watkins arrest, and if we are sent to prison for two years for each copy sold—according to E. H. Heywood's sentence—we will hav to lie in prison for only three thousand years. Who can complain of such a prospect as that?

The Two National Liberal Leagues.

It is to be hoped that there will be no further grounds for dissension between the two than there was in the old League before the Secessionists left it. It is to be presumed that both parties are sincere and honest in the positions they occupy; and if they cannot agree to think alike, they can at least agree to disagree, and can do so without quarreling. There is enough for all of us to do, and there are no reasons why we should not press on in our noble cause, each party accomplishing all in their power. Let as many new Leagues be organized as possible, and let the old Leagues be earnest and active in keeping up their organizations. Those who believe in the unconstitutionality of the Comstock laws are honest in their opinions, but they freely accord to their opponents the same liberty of opinion they claim for themselves. Let all dissension cease, and let an era of harmony and hard work now ensue.

Man, a Weekly Journal of Progress and Reform. A new Liberal paper by this name is just laid before the Liberal public by Mr. Asa K. Butts, of 15 Dey street. It is well gotten up in a mechanical point of view, and contains good articles from many familiar pens. The principal fault we see with the paper is the price. In clubs of four it is offered at 50 cents each, and in clubs of ten at 40 cents each. Now, we are very positive that a weekly paper of eight pages cannot be afforded at forty or fifty cents, and we are forced to the conclusion that it must fail at that price. We hav before this regretted to see Liberal papers brought out at a price at which they could not be sustained. That kind of business has been denominated a species of piracy upon those trying to do a legitimate business. There is a price at which a paper cannot be furnished without absolute loss. We do not say Man is gotten up on this principle, and we cannot do less than wish it all the success it deserves.

LET all petitions for the pardon of E. H. Heywood be sent in at once, and also let the amounts pledged for the National Defense Fund be forwarded to the treasurer, G. L. Henderson, 141 Eighth St., New York. It is wished to make an early effort in favor of Mr. Heywood.

IT should have been stated that in the Syracuse Congress Mrs. Augusta Cooper Bristol recited her poem, "When this old Earth is Righted." It is a beautiful poem and was rendered in a beautiful manner.

ALL the Liberal Leagues of the country who prefer to retain their connection with the old National Liberal League which exercised the natural right to vote for the officers that suited it best, are requested to notify the Secretary of the fact. Address A. L. Rawson, 34 Bond St., N. York.

W. S. BELL lectured in Salem, Ind., Oct. 29th, 30th, and 31st; in Bedford, Ind., Nov. 1st; and will speak in Brazil, Ind, Nov. 3d, 4th, and 5th.

B. F. UNDERWOOD lectured at Aylmer, Ont., Oct. 29th, 30th, and 31st; at Toronto, Ont., Nov. 1st, and will speak there the 2d and 3d; and at Toledo, Ohio, on the 5th and 6th.

Organs—Paris Exposition.

To buy an organ merely because it is offered at a low price is like buying a watch on the same principle, without considering whether it will keep time. But unfortunately more people are deceived in organs than in watches, because a less number are really good judges. The safe way is to buy only such an organ as is known to be the best, by a maker of established reputation, who has proved the excellence of his work. Such a maker is, undoubtedly, the Mason & Hamlin Organ Co. This company was the first to make the cabinet organ, and has always made the best. At all the great industrial exhibitions of the world they have placed their organs in competition, and at every one have carried off the highest honors for greatest superiority. Never was more capable and thorough examination and comparison than at the World's Exposition at Paris, where the competition was before four separate juries. Mason & Hamlin got the highest distinction in their power to confer—the gold medal—and the only one which comes to any American musical instrument maker.

Liberal League.

On Monday evening, Oct. 14th, at the residence of Dr. Corken, in Lynn, Mass., a largely-attended meeting was held, when an auxiliary to the National Liberal League was formed. The Rev. L. K. Washburn was elected President Dr. Corken, Secretary, and Miss Miss Myra M. Todd, Treasurer. The greatest unity prevailed. Ten dollars for a charter were speedily subscribed, and delegates for the Congress appointed.

The spirit of progress is moving in the city of shoes, and the advent of a larger and a grander faith begins to dawn. Welcome THE TRUTH SEEKER. W. D. C., M.D.

Voltaire in Exile.

HIS LIFE AND WORK IN FRANCE AND IN FOREIGN LANDS.

BY M. GASTINEAU.

(Translated for THE TRUTH SEEKER.)

VI.—CONTINUED.

"Far from seeking to publish the shame of me n of letters," adds Voltaire, "I only seek to cover it up. There is a writer (like La Jonchère) who wrote me one day, 'Here is, sir, a libel I have written against you. If you will send me one hundred crowns it will not appear.' I informed him that one hundred crowns were too small a matter; that his libel should be worth to him at least one hundred pistoles, and that he should publish it. I would never end with similar anecdotes, but they paint humanity in too ugly colors, and I prefer to forget them."

Voltaire terminated his letter by informing the Abbé Prevost that he intended sending him very shortly the twelve thousand livres which he needed, although in Brussels he was far from playing the part of a farmer-general and living in opulence. In reality, it was an amiable turn for a refusal.

Some months after having received that answer from Voltaire, the Abbé Prévost was himself obliged to take refuge in Brussels, after having been accused of collaborating in a secret gazette which circulated in Paris.

"For some time, reported a member of the "Memoires Secrets de la Republique des Lettres," a one-horse gazette filled with scandalous chronicles has been circulated. The delivering agents have been arrested and put in jail; one of them has denounced the Abbé Prévost. In consequence, the Abbe Prévost has received the order of leaving the realm, and he started this morning for Brussels."

The fate of pamphleteers had nothing very pleasant in the last century. They were not in security, even when abroad. Voltaire informs us that Henri Dubourg, a French publicist, was carried away, in Frankfort, by an officer in the French army, and taken to the Mont-Saint-Michel, where he died in a cage. That pamphleteer hid under the pseudonym of Dubourg his real name of Victor de la Castaigne. He belonged to a family in the south of France.

It does not appear that the Abbé Prévost remained long in Brussels. He saw Voltaire there, after which he went to Holland, where he published several novels before going on to London. He took with him to the capital of Great Britain a young Holland woman who was passionately fond of him, and who would absolutely follow him in his new retreat. The poor Abbé Prévost, whom ill luck and women pursued all his life, returned to France only to meet a tragic end. While crossing the forest of Chantilly, he fell struck with apoplexy. Two passers-by raised him up and carried him to the house of a village priest. He gave no sign of life. To ascertain whether he was alive or dead, an ignorant surgeon gave him a vigorous and mortal thrust of the lancet, which made him open his eyes. The Abbe Prevost lived a few minutes more—long enough to see himself murdered by that surgeon.

VII.

Frederick had ascended the throne of Prussia in the month of June, 1740. Once king, he altered his views upon the advisability of publishing the refutation of Machiavel. He had ordered Voltaire to have it printed at the Hague, but he requested him to stop the impression of the "Anti-Machiavel;" of which Voltaire would say jocosely that the King of Prussia spit in the dish in order to disgust the rest.

Voltaire flies to the Hague, but the publisher, Van Durel, did not consent to give up the manuscript of the "Anti-Machiavel," and was resolved on printing it nolens volens, in spite of Voltaire, who returned to Brussels defeated by the Dutch printer.

Notwithstanding the King of Prussia burned with the desire to see Voltaire, the philosopher remained for some time deaf to the invitations of the king, as is attested by this letter of the 28th of June, 1740, addressed to M. de Cideville:

"Withal, I remain in Brussels, and the best king upon the earth, his merits and his glory, will not draw me for one moment away from Emilie. Kings, even this one, must come only after friends."

But, Frederick having used new persuasions, Voltaire proposes to him to visit him in company with his Emilie, Madame du Châtelet; to which the King of Prussia answers:

"I shall write to Madame du Châtelet in accordance with your desire. To speak frankly to you concerning her voyage, it is Voltaire, it is you, my friend, whom I desire to see; and the divine Emilie, with all her divinity, is but the accessory of Apollo Newtonized."

Two days later comes another ironical letter from the king:

"If it needs be that Emilie accompany Apollo, I consent. But if I can see you alone, I prefer this last. I would be too dazzled, I could not bear so much splendor at once; I would need Moses' veil to temper the united rays of your divinities."

But suddenly all is changed. The King of Prussia has projected a voyage to the Netherlands, which he will extend to Anvers and Brussels. The colony of Grosse-Tour street is upside down. Voltaire writes to Frederick that he shall expect to offer him the hospitality of his modest retreat, and that Madame du Châtelet has already prepared his apartments.

"If it became true," adds he, "that your humanity should pass through Brussels, I implore her to bring me English drops, for I shall faint."

"It will be the most charming day of my life," answers Frederick. "I believe I shall not survive; but at least one could not choose a more agreeable manner of death."

Unfortunately, a fever made a change in the traveling arrangements of the king. On the 6th of September, 1740, he wrote to Voltaire from Wessel to beg him to come and meet him at Cleves:

"My dear Voltaire, I must, say what I will, give up to the fever, which is more tenacious than a Jansenist; and, however greatly I desired to go to Anvers and Brussels, I do not find myself in the condition to undertake such a voyage without risk. I would ask you, then, if the road from Brussels to Cleves would seem too long for you to join me there? Let us defraud the fever, my dear Voltaire, and may I at least have the pleasure of embracing you. Be good enough to present to the Marchioness my excuses for being deprived of the satisfaction of seeing her in Brussels. Sunday next I shall be in a little place near by Cleves, where I shall be able to possess you really at my ease."

The meeting of the two illustrious friends took place on the 11th of September, 1740, in the castle of Moyland, near Cleves. It was a charming one. The presence of Voltaire, face to face with whom he found himself for the first time, gave such a delight to the king that his fever was checked by it so much that he arose and appeared at supper, where literature and philosophy were discussed while flowed the champagne, less effervescent than Voltaire's wit. Frederick II. was delighted with the opportunity of at last conversing with the wittiest man of his time, the first of thinking beings. He cried out, like a jealous lover, "How happy is Emilie in possessing him!" To which the marchioness seemed to give an answer when she wrote from Brussels to Maupertius, bitterly complaining to him of the prolonged absence of Voltaire:

"I hope the King of Prussia," said she, "will soon send me back somebody with whom I intend to spend my life, and whom I only lent him for a few days."

Madame du Châtelet deemed it monstrous to leave a woman to go and meet a sovereign.

Pulled about between this marchioness and that king, Voltaire leaned to Frederick's side and competed with him in amiabilities and coquetries. Having left him to go to the Hague to correct the proofsheets of the "Anti-Machiavel," he had the cruelty of not returning to Brussels, where waited the disappointed Madame du Châtelet. He entered the Prussian realm under the jocular name of Don Guiscotte, and rejoined Frederick at Remusberg.

The time passed by Voltaire at Remusberg was a series of festivals, of merry banquets, a concert of mutual flatteries and admiration. However, Voltaire remembers the divine Emilie. The time for leaving Prussia has arrived. But Frederick still wants to detain the first of thinking beings. Voltaire sends him this last parting pastoral:

"In spite of your great worth, in spite of all your charms,
My soul is discontented yet.
No! no! you are but a coquette,
Who subjugates our hearts and yet would flee our arms.'

Frederick, defeated in his endeavor to detain Voltaire at his court and to separate him from Emilie, retorted:

"My heart doth fully know the value of your charms;
But do not deem it could thus be contented yet.
Ah, traitor! you leave me, and that for a coquette;
I ne'er could flee thy arms."

After visiting Berlin to pay his court to the queen-mother and the sisters of the king, Voltaire started on his way to rejoin the "coquette" Emilie, as she was called by her rival, the King of Prussia.

The marchioness, who, with feminine tact, had felt a personal enemy in Frederick, and who at heart was wounded at not having been invited by him, could not forgive Voltaire for having preferred a king to her, and for having left her alone in Brussels with Koenig, his physique and intellect, and her interminable lawsuit.

Voltaire displayed all the amiability of his nature, and succeeded in obtaining pardon for his too long absence.

Communications.

Lights and Shadows of Christianity.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: As you, more than most of us, are engaged, it may be, in a life or death struggle with a power you call "Christian"—using the term in its popular signification—it may not be inopportune to excerpt from leaves of my leisure hours some thoughts of my own, as well as those of others, together with some historical incidents, gathered in my readings, illustrative of what Christianity really is, if indeed there is anything of it that is distinctive or different from religions that preceded its advent. And if it shall be found that your persecutors—or whom at least you regard as such—hav stolen "the livery of heaven to serve the devil in," it may, indirectly at least, aid your efforts in pulling down this strong tower of Satan entrenched behind the name of Christian, or at least be of some service to you by weakening its power to do you harm. I doubt not that there are many who honestly believe that your vindication would be the condemnation of something really sacred, something that is good; whereas, if it turns out on the contrary that all that is good, or even divine, absolutely demands the vindication of your volitional liberty and freedom of press and person, untrammeled by any despotic power or human censor over your conscience, the truth will be vindicated and only good will result.

The writer has been a constant reader of your journal for many years. How much his views differ from its prevailing tone can be gathered in the sequel, but he has never met an utterance in its pages that has infringed legal constitutional liberty of the press. Its most prominent error, to my view, has been its lack of discrimination in the religion Christ taught, and which he and his primitive disciples livd, and that which is seeking to involve you, and which has involved so many before you, in its deadly anaconda folds.

I know of no better way, or more effectual, of disabusing the public of the idea that there can be merit or righteousness in any religion that sanctions these outrages, than to call attention to a better faith and to genuine merit and righteousness.

To this end, I send a few thoughts of my own and others selected from my scrap-book, written without reference to your recent troubles, but which, if you desire them, are at your service. I hav entitled them "Lights and Shadows of Christianity."

The term "Christian" has come to be used not as a synonym of discipleship, or a life patterned after the founder of Christianity; but, on the contrary, often covers a wide latitude of conduct which he wholly condemned. From an early day those hav borne the name who practiced coercion in religion, engaged in war, enacted and enforced laws with cruel penalties, to propagate their faith, which was some doctrine of belief only, to-day one thing and perchance to-morrow another, and was not a transactional subordination of the life to righteousness as in the days of the simplicity of the faith. It was impossible that many men should not see that such Christianity was destitute of merit, full of pretense and cruelty, and, judging the tree by these parasites, even to this day many regard it with honest loathing as a poisonous upas, fit only to be cut down as cumbering the ground. A few, more discerning, hav discovered that the tree itself has transcendent virtues, even to the healing of the nations, and hav labored to preserve its life and foster its growth, even at the peril of being poisoned by the deadly emanations from the parasites around it.

What a multitude now, more it may be than in any age before, are battling nobly with might and main to rid the world of these poisonous vapors! they humanely devise antidotes to the poison, thinking all the while these are of the tree itself, and many such are falling in the contest, not knowing that the poison which kills is exhaled from the parasites. Meanwhile the old tree itself, however preyed upon and choked, and its healing exhalations shut in, bears a charmed life, and is not mortal, or fifteen centuries of venomous preying parasites would hav destroyed it. When these are dead all may breathe freely the transforming divine ether of this tree of life.

At the risk of being tedious, let me quote and sketch a little to illustrate the truth of my symbol. "The gifted, spiritually-cultured Ernest Renan, although he made no claim of being a regenerate Christian, better apprehended the mission of the master than most so-called Christians." "An idea absolutely new," he says;" "the idea of a worship founded upon purity of heart and human fraternity made through its entrance into the world an idea so elevated that the Christian Church was upon this point completely to betray his intentions, and that in our days but few souls are capable of comprehending it. . . . The idea of omnipotence through suffering and resignation, of triumphing over force by purity of heart, is indeed an idea peculiar to Jesus. . . . The sentiment which has made of 'worldling' the antithesis of 'Christian' has, in the thought of the master, its complete justification."

When contemplating the happy, peaceful lives of Jesus and his loved associates, particularly at Capernaum, where Jesus set a little child in their midst and taught the ever-memorable lesson, that he who should humble himself as such would be greatest in the heavenly kingdom, Renan seemed "almost persuaded," saying, "Perhaps the world disclosed its secret to the divinely-lucid conscience of these fortunate children whose purity of heart made them worthy one day to see God."

We learn from Mosheim that the beautiful simplicity of life and doctrine of faith of the primitive Christian were soon obscured by Alexandrian philosophy, even during the second century.

We are not left to conjecture as to the nature of this new life and faith imparted by Jesus, nor how it was lived before it became corrupted; for, besides the gospels and the New Testament records, the early Christian fathers enlighten us.

Clement of Rome, in the first century, says to the Corinthians, "Let the rich impart to the poor;" and both he and Clement of Alexandria speak of those among them who delivered themselves into bonds and slavery that they might restore others to liberty, and many that let themselves out as servants, that, by their wages, they might sustain the destitute.

Athenagoras, of the second century, says of Christians: "When struck, they strike not again; when robbed, they do not go to law. They give to them that ask them, and love their neighbors as themselves."

Justin Martyr says: "We who once prized gain above all things, give what we have to the common use and share it with those who have need."

Origin declares that "To this day the name of Jesus produces a wonderful mildness, decency of manners, humanity, goodness, and gentleness, in those who embrace the doctrines of Christ." In reply to some taunt of Celsus, he further says: "It is not our dishonor, but our glory, that so many of us are poor; yet how can that man be poor who wants nothing, who envies not another's possessions, and who is rich in God? He, rather, is poor who, having much, desires more."

A very different picture is presented by the later fathers of the religion still called Christian. It had lost its savor, and was pregnant of a baneful superstition, whose out-birth has wrought only ruin and desolation. The stern, fiery Tertullian, openly, at Carthage, avowed the purpose of Christians to destroy the gods of Rome. He warns the magistrates of Carthage to beware how they persecute Christians; and says, "We are but of yesterday, and we have already filled your cities, your islands, and your armies." The latter were the Roman legions of the Emperor Septimus Severus.

In the year 295, Maximillianus, a noble Numidian Christian youth, had come to the age at which, by the law of the Roman empire, he was required to enter the army and perform military service; but, in his heart there remained an imperishable love of the now antiquated precepts and practices of the divine master—even the principles of that greatest of all contemners of war and carnage—Jesus of Nazareth. The pro-consul presented him with the usual garb and implements of a soldier of the empire, and which he refused to wear. He was informed that death would be his doom if he persisted in his refusal. He replied: "The service is wrong; I cannot enter upon it. I am a Christian. I already wear the badge of Christ my God." They expostulated with him, and told him he could be a soldier and yet remain a Christian; that many Christians were in the army of the empire everywhere. He was not convinced, neither was he intimidated at the doom of death that awaited him; but, on the contrary, counted it the highest honor to die in the maintenance of the precepts of his Lord. He was condemned and beheaded, and his dying words to the Christian brethren round him were, "Dearest brethren, strive with all your power to attain to the vision of the Lord, that he may bestow on you also such a crown." It is worthy of note, too, that his father refused to persuade his heroic son to do violence to his principles; and, returning home from his execution, expressed his thanks to God for having bestowed upon him so exemplary and pious a son.

There is no doubt that within three hundred years from the time of their promulgation, Christian peace principles had pretty generally been surrendered, or were not observed; but as belligerents, and warriors, and other carnal force advocates were accorded the name, the strange anomaly was presented of a Christianity with Christ left out. Not that non-resistant peace principles were all that was new in the religion of Jesus, but that this was the foundation stone upon which his Christian edifice was reared, and, lacking which, other religions called Christian are no better than Jewish and pagan ones.

THE true rule in business is to guard and do by the things of others as they do by their own.—Hindoo.

The Problem of a Future Life.

Man, it is supposed, has been an inhabitant of this planet for at least six thousand years. One generation has come and another gone for many generations, and still the question of life after death is as unsettled as it was in the time of Job, who asked the question, "If a man die shall he liv again?" Many hav essayed to answer this question; and many hav livd and died in the belief that it was satisfactorily answered in the affirmative. But, singular as it may appear, it is nevertheless true, that many eminent men hav failed to acknowledge the soundness of the arguments in favor of the doctrine.

John Stuart Mill, who for candor cannot be surpassed, thinks the doctrine may be true, but holds that it would be wrong to consider that it was proved to be so. He thinks the general belief of mankind in the doctrine the strongest argument in its favor; and this argument is urged by many as being well-nigh positive proof. But we do know that the general opinion of mankind, when unsupported by reason, has often been proved false; and it would probably puzzle the historian to prove that mere popular opinion, unsupported by sound evidence, ever was proved to be true. It was once the general opinion of mankind that the earth was the center of the universe, that all the other heavenly bodies were made merely for the use of the inhabitants of earth, that the sun moved around the world, that the earth was flat, that God made everything out of nothing in six literal days. All these and many more popular beliefs hav been proved false. Who can name a mere belief that has been proved true?

The Greek philosophers, Socrates and Plato, believed in the doctrine of life after death; but they attempted to prove it by a process of reasoning long since rejected by most modern philosophers. They held, first, that man always did liv. Having satisfied themselves of the truth of this doctrine, they argued that a thing that always did liv in the past must of necessity always liv in the future. Those, therefore, who respect the opinions of those philosophers must also respect the process of reasoning which enabled them to arrive at those conclusions, and consequently they must admit the doctrine of the eternal pre-existence of man. For my own part, I feel satisfied that if I had a pre-existence, it was a very happy one. My troubles, so far as I can learn, all commenced when I was born, and if I hav as good a time after death as I had before birth, I shall be abundantly satisfied. I shall not even envy those fellows who get to the eternal city, with its golden streets and pearly gates; I shall not long to stand before somebody's "great white throne" and practice making polite bows and waving of palm branches. I shall not care to join in the everlasting singing of Sunday-school music. I shall not regret that I was not appointed to blow somebody else's horn and sing his praises to all eternity. No, I shall be quite as well satisfied to retire to the same quiet and peaceful retreat which I occupied previous to my being forced into my present state of activity.

But the Christian holds this doctrine to be true because he says his Bible, which is the word of God, teaches it. But it is quite as easy proving the doctrine of life after death as to prove that the Bible is the word of God. And if we accept the Bible as the word of God without proof, we are no better than the Hottentots, for they thus accept their religion. But if we accept the doctrine of the future life because it is taught in the word of God, or the Bible, then we must accept everything else taught in the Bible. We must hold that this earth is the center of the universe and that the sun, moon, and stars were made as ornaments to the earth and to give light to its inhabitants; that the earth stands still and the sun, moon, and stars move around it; that the earth is flat and has four corners, ends, etc.; that a man made the sun and moon to stand still to giv him a chance to kill some people who never harmed him; that a man went to sea with a ship-load of animals, and got stranded on the top of a high mountain; that a man went to heaven in a chariot of fire, and did n't set heaven on fire either (though we would think such a chariot better adapted to run to the other place); that a man navigated the seas safely without steam, compass, rudder, mast, or sails, but simply got inside of a fish and took his soundings and bearings like a genuine navigator of the olden time; and that another man killed three thousand hogs without a knife or any other weapon, except some devils which he took out of one man. This proves that one man can stand three thousand times as many devils as a hog, which is truly wonderful.

If the doctrine of the life after death, as taught in the Bible, is no nearer true than the above doctrines and stories taught in the same book, then, in my opinion, we need not deprive ourselves of the comforts of this life in trying to improve our prospects for the next. We may feel safe in running the risk of going to the orthodox hell, on condition that we shall not be sent there until after the sun and moon shall stand still at the bidding of any man, or until after some man shall hav killed a drove of hogs by putting devils into them.

But the Spiritualists prove the doctrine of life after death by establishing a communication between the souls or spirits of the departed dead and those living. They pretend to be able to see the spirits of those who formerly livd on earth, and to talk with them, and therefore they know that this doctrine is true. Many of those Spiritualists are doubtless honest, and believe what they say, but they are not all so. The Holmses, Mrs. White, Bliss, Fay, the Davenports, Mrs. Miller, Huntoon, and Mott have all been detected in attempts to deceive the people by sleight-of-hand tricks. And the same may be said of many other, if not all the other, noted mediums. How many more mediumistic stars must be exposed and sent to learn more useful trades in the prisons, with Bliss, before people will be convinced that there is no truth in their pretensions time alone will decide? The good work of bringing their vain tricks to light is progressing very satisfactorily. Most of the celebrated mediums hav lived too long on earth to enable them to carry their laurels with them to the next world. If they could get Elijah's chariot of fire to help them out, they would be able to take their departure from earth with much greater honors than they now do.

But, as I hav said above, there is a class of Spiritualists who are honest. We find, however, that many of them are the victims of deception. R. D. Owen was a fair representative of this class. He was sure he had his arm around the waist of a spirit, but it turned out to be a spirit in the body. Knowing, therefore, that a large portion of Spiritualistic phenomena is mere sleight of hand and cunning trickery, how are we to decide that the balance is not of the same braud? If Spiritualists do sometimes resort to sleight-of-hand tricks in order to produce spiritual phenomena, how are we to know that they do not do this always? When the very elect, such as R. D. Owen, get deceived, how shall we decide between the false and the true? I can only see one way, and that is to apply more rigid tests to the phenomena. Let every investigator into these phenomena go to the seances prepared to test the truth of the phenomena to the utmost of his ability; and I would suggest that it is never a good plan to go and do as the medium tells you do. It is a poor plan to sit singing, or with the mouth open, and both hands held by believers in Spiritualism. The truth cannot be got at in this way. A much better plan would be to take a pistol or a shot-gun to the seance, also a dark lantern, a good supply of lampblack or nitrate of silver, for the purpose of marking spirits syringe. A charged with nitric acid is a good thing to test spirits with. Try to shoot some of it in the spirit's eyes. It will not hurt a spirit's eyes. It should also be remembered that there is no law against shooting a ball or shot at a spirit, and this is a good test. Let the investigator make a judicious use of such expedients as these and we will soon get down to bottom facts.

If the ancient philosophers hav failed to prove the doctrine of a life after death; if the Christians' Bible has failed; if the Spiritualists hav failed; if the scientist has failed, to whom shall we now look for the proof? If after searching for six thousand years for the proof we still are encumbered with doubts, when may we hope to be able to demonstrate it?

The desirability of a life after death has nothing to do with its truthfulness. Life in that respect is unlike greatness, for "some are born great, some achieve greatness, and some hav greatness thrust upon them;" but with life, it is thrust upon us all. "We ask not to be born," and many of us scarce "love the state to which that birth has brought us."

So in regard to the future life. The fact that some people are very anxious to get it is no proof that they will. Many people imagine they would like it without duly considering the question. There is really nothing very desirable about the future life as conceived of by most people. The American Indian conceives of it as his "happy hunting grounds," a country where game can be got with small effort. The Mohammedan heaven is a harem; to the average Christian it is an everlasting prayer-meeting. Paul's highest conception of its pleasures was that even the heart of man could not conceive of its pleasures; and when he was caught up into the third heaven, instead of hearing something nice, he heard things not lawful to utter. The Spiritualists set the departed spirits to working tricks to astonish those living on the earth, and conceive of them as being divided into castes, some on high and some on low planes. All believers in life after death conceive of it as a lazy, worthless, meaningless state of existence. No marrying, no eating or drinking (for these are evidences of change and consequently of ultimate death). No sleep (for there is no night there). No work (unless singing could be so called). It is a life where every man is a gentleman of independence, with nothing to do but to giv orders to the angels, who will supply all his wants in an instant of time. But this sort of life must, after about a million of years, become exceedingly monotonous and tiresome. Many of those who now imagine that it would be a terrible thing to lose such a life will, before a million of years hav ground out, be glad of a decent chance to commit suicide to get rid of the immense burden of their existence. ONE of the points which the editor of The Index has dwelt upon most emphatically, in his discussion of reform as opposed to repeal, is the extreme danger in which the repealers place themselves of having their motives misinterpreted, and their moral character questioned, on account of their position. It would seem, however, from the following sentence from a recent editorial in The Louisville Courier-Journal, that the reformers themselves are not wholly free from danger in this direction. "Congress very certainly will not repeal the law for the suppression of obscene literature, unless a congress of Bob Ingersolls and Francis E. Abbots is elected." You see, Mr. Abbot, one may as well be hung for an old sheep as a lamb. Are you willing to take the name without the game? You must either leave your reputation behind you, and join the ranks of freedom, or you must save your reputation by going over to the enemy outright. Between truth and popularity, choose this day which you will serve.—The Word.

MRS. CLARA NEYMAN would like to meet with some engagements to lecture in the neighborhood of Syracuse after the League's Convention—the 26th and 27th of the month. Subjects: "German Liberalism," "The Redeeming Feature in the New Faith," and other topics.

Address, 97 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

TO TAKE a needed step in the spelling reform, we have acted upon the advice of the American Philological Association to the extent of dropping the useless final e in the words have, give, and live, except in such matter as is used in making books and pamphlets. It is hoped other periodicals will see the propriety of this step and act accordingly.

Second Meeting of the National Liberal League Congress.

Pursuant to the notices which hav been published in the Liberal papers for a month past, the delegates to the Congress assembled on Saturday, Oct. 26th, in Wieting's Opera House, in Syracuse, at 10 A. M. Tickets of admission were given to such delegates as had the proper credentials. Thirty-two Auxiliary Leagues were represented by one hundred and thirty-eight delegates, about one-fourth of whom were ladies. Delegates only were admitted to the floor of the Opera House, while spectators occupied the galleries. The number of spectators was not large, two hundred, probably, being all present at any one time.

Francis E. Abbot, President of the League presided in an able manner, calling the meeting to order, extending a welcome to the delegates and asking that the deliberations of the Congress be conducted in a harmonious manner. He hoped there would be no personalities indulged in or any thing said that would be regretted hereafter. The aims of the League are high, being simply a search after truth. He then submitted the following resolutions:

Resolved, 1. That the proceedings of this Congress shall be governed by the general rules of parliamentary law.

2. That the Committee on Membership are hereby instructed to report a complete list of the members of this Congress, classified respectively as delegates, charter-members, life-members, and annual members, and to add the name of each delegate and the name of the local League which he or she represents.

3. That in order to secure the prompt and orderly transaction of the business of this important Congress, all resolutions, after being read, shall be referred to the Committee on Resolutions without debate.

The fourth resolution related to the general order of the business as laid down by the officers of the League.

Mr. H. L. Green, of Salamanca, and another delegate moved the adoption of the resolutions.

Mr. Rivers said the resolutions were out of order at this stage of the proceedings, and moved as an amendment to the resolutions that a committee be appointed by the Congress to arrange for the organization of the Convention.

After considerable discussion, the mover of the amendment withdrew it and moved that the original resolutions be adopted seratim. Carried, and the first three resolutions were unanimously adopted.

When the fourth resolution came up, Mr. H. L. Green offered an amendment that one member from each League should act as a committee to name the committees of the Congress.

A long protracted discussion followed, participated in by a large number of delegates, in which a variety of amendments were offered, withdrawn and offered again.

At this point it became evident that the two factions or divisions in the League were somewhere nearly equally divided, and that the contest between them was destined to become active.

Mrs. Colman of Syracuse, made an earnest speech, in which she declared that the Congress had a right to manage its own affairs. Finally all the amendments were withdrawn and the following resolution by Mr. Green was adopted:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed by the Congress, and that such committee nominate the members of the standing committees and officers of the League, subject to the approval of the Congress.

The question then arising upon the formation of the committee, T. B. Wakeman of New York, moved the following, which after a good deal of debate, was adopted by a rising vote:

Resolved, That the committee consist of one member to be appointed by each local League represented, and one by the life and one by the charter members, with power to appoint sub-committees.

Mr. McArthur moved that the number of charter members on the committee be increased to five. It was declared that this motion was out of order, the chair finally deciding that it was in order. Much confusion existed, the members rising and shouting at the top of their voices.

An appeal was taken from the decision of the chair, and the original motion in relation to the committee was adopted. The Convention then adjourned until 2 P. M.

Upon the re-assembling of the Convention, Mr. Rivers, of Boston, Chairman of the Committee on Organization, reported transferring the addresses of Messrs. Wakeman and Hurlbut, on the programme arranged by the Board of Directors for the morning, to the afternoon; these to be followed by the discussion of the main question, and limiting the time of each speaker to fifteen minutes.

The report was adopted after being amended by changing the limit for speakers from fifteen to ten minutes.

The report of the Committee on Credentials and Nominations was delayed till a later stage of the proceedings.

A brief discussion was held with regard to the question to come up; Mr. Hallowell, of Boston, objecting to the consideration of the obscenity question to the exclusion of that for which the League was formed, namely, the separation of Church and State. The convention should hold to its first principles.

Mr. Fox, of Rochester, denied this statement regarding the single object of the League, and declared that all live questions were to be acted upon, and inquired if the society was to delay considering the obscenity laws until more men and women were thrown into dungeons.

T. B. Wakeman then took the platform and proceeded to read his Faneuil Hall speech on the "Constitutionality of the Comstock Laws," in which he took strong ground against the postal laws of 1873. The speaker made particular reference to the case of Ezra H. Heywood, editor of The Word, at Boston, who was tried and convicted of issuing an obscene publication, and sentenced to prison for two years, which sentence he is now serving out.

Mr. Wakeman argued the illegality of the enactment under which the conviction was made, quoting many technical points. His address had an excellent effect, and the soundness of his arguments could not be questioned.

Judge Hurlbut, of Albany, then read an address, on "The Liberty of Printing." The press was the educator of our race; it had broken the fetters of kings and emperors, and compelled them to renounce their leadership of mankind. In France it abolished the Bastile. Public sentiment, stimulated by the press, abolished slavery and made Italy free. Without the liberty of the press a democratic government can not exist. Law, order, and free government are founded upon public opinion, and the press is guardian of opinion. A censorship of books was never established until printing was invented. A censorship was never established in America until the modern Paul Pry Anthony Comstock sprang into existence. Now the essense of all morality and all law may be summed up in the command, "Be ye just to all." Constitutions declare that speech shall be free, and that men shall be responsible for the thoughts that they utter. Government, both state and national, now controls the liberty of the press. To-day the state can punish the writer of a book—but the United States can profit by his book in carrying it through the mails. The government ought to prevent the carrying of obscene matter through the mails and protect the mails from being robbed.

The Judge's address was excellent in a literary point of view, and was delivered with much oratorical ability, but it seemed hardly consistent in its various parts. He seemed to "flop over" from one side to the other on parts of his subject. He attempted to show that the Comstock United States postal laws were constitutional, and we watched closely to see how he accomplished this difficult feat. He read part of Judge Livingston's Code of Criminal Law, which declared that obscene prints and pictures which were calculated to deprave the minds of youth and unduly arouse the baser passions were criminal, and should be subjected to punishment by fines of fifty dollars or imprisonment not to exceed six months. This code practically became the law of the states, and from this fact the United States were empowered to take cognizance of the crime and to provide against it by refusing to carry such matter through the mails, empowering postmasters and deputies all over the country to examine the mail matter of the people, constituting them judges and courts, or judges to decide whether it was fit to be carried by the Government or not. This kind of doctrine sounded exceedingly singular, coming from the mouth of a learned Liberal who had been many years a judge. If obscenity can be aided by the postal department by transporting it over the country, and the General Government is therefore empowered to punish it, the same might be said of the crimes of libel, fraud, conspiracy, sedition, seduction, adultery, incendiarism, burglary, robbery, arson, and murder. These crimes, with many additional ones, may all be aided by the postal department, letters bearing upon them being frequently transported from one point of the country to another. If, therefore, the General Government is empowered to take cognizance of obscenity and punish it because, first, the states had recognized it as a crime, and because it was aided by the postal department, the General Government has an equal right to legislate upon and punish all the crimes just mentioned, and many more that might be added to the list, which were pronounced crimes by the state codes and are materially aided and furthered by the postal department. The Judge's theory, then, carried out to the full, would constitute every postmaster and every deputy and every clerk a censor of the mails, who would hav the power to examine what the people deposit in the mails and to decide whether it should be allowed to pass on to its destination or not.

The Judge's position seemed extremely weak on this point, and many were surprised to hear such utterances from so sound a head. There was a weakness in his logic and in his arguments that most persons could easily see.

SATURDAY EVENING

Mrs. Clara Neyman, of this city, read an essay upon the duties of the League, and plead for unity and harmony. She showed very strong partialities towards Mr. Abbot, and emphatically condemned those who had seen fit to oppose his views. Mr. Abbot had few warmer partisans than this lady. She lauded him to the skies, and denounced those who could not agree with him, and said that they were not Liberals, but mere pretenders. She said social physics is a most intrinsic subject, and ought to be studied closely. It is not so easy to throw overboard a Liberal leader like Mr. Abbot. She appealed to the Congress to keep out all intruders who attempted to bring about discord. The League has no business with this fight in regard to the right or wrong of the Comstock postal laws. Let us save our powder and shot for higher issues. The establishment of a secular government is our next work. Our first duty is to free the state from orthodox domination. The transitory state of society will not disappear until we are rid of Christian dogmatisms. The remarkable progress of science has had no effect as yet upon governmental affairs. Our wise men hav learning enough, but they are blinded by their own selfishness. The League is but an idea. It is a long work to change the ideas which have predominated for a thousand years. In speaking of politics, the speaker said: "Before we go into political matters, let us introduce a better system than is now practiced by the old political parties. In whatever we do let us be magnanimous and just; let us not be unchristian; let us master the unruly and passionate; let us be kind and forbearing. If Liberals cannot rise above petty squabbles and personal quarrels, they are illiberals. The trouble is that Liberals do not have sufficient patience; they look to the quantity instead of the quality. Life is a continuous mystery full of new events. Let us gather for the issue—the advancement of Liberalism.

Prof. J. E. Oliver, of Cornell University, next addressed the Congress on the "Nature of the Liberal League Movement." We have a single purpose; a single creed; and that is an equality of rights between all thinkers; that the state should be absolutely impartial in regard to the opinions of all. This is our creed, and upon that creed we invite all to join us. There is of course more heresy about us than orthodoxy, but all are welcome to come and unite with us. Those who will not unite with us have no excuse, except that they are not willing to accord equal rights to others.

Mr. H. L. Green moved that the thanks of the Convention be tendered to the speakers of the evening, which was unanimously adopted.

Mr. Green made a personal explanation in regard to an item which appeared in the Journal Saturday afternoon, calling him a "Freelover." He had known the reporter of that paper for fifteen years. He knew him as an active member of the Young Men's Christian Association, and that was probably the reason for his misrepresenting him. He then administered some strong invectives upon the head of the unfortunate reporter. He also stated that he was not a Freelover; that he was in favor of a constitutional law for the suppression of obscene literature, and concluded by saying that the only reason for his voting for the repeal of the Comstock laws was that his experience as a lawyer led him to consider them unconstitutional.

Ten-minute speeches were then announced.

Mr. Butts appealed for peace and harmony. He stopped short off, finishing his sentence thus wise—

Mr. Palmer then offered two resolutions—that the committee on platform be instructed to report in favor, first, of the repeal of the Comstock laws; and, second, in favor of constitutional and state laws against obscenity.

A vote of the Congress decided to take up the question for discussion.

Mr. H. P. Stark said he thought the introduction of the resolutions inopportune. He then took up Mr. Green's complaint. He considered it "one of the meanest of tricks to use a power like a newspaper for vilification," etc. He felt just like offering a resolution to expel from the Congress the representative of the city daily which had slandered the members of the Congress.

Mr. Hayes, of Rochester, then took the floor. He said he had been a listener here, and had become disgusted with the proceedings. He had thus far during the Convention heard about nothing but obscenity, and he began to feel as if he was obscene himself. He hoped the Congress would finish up this "obscene" business, and then proceed to the legitimate business for which we are called together. He continued at some length in this strain, creating much laughter in the galleries.

Mr. Stillman said that the circulation of obscene literature was immoral, but that it was not a crime. He made several stinging hits at Christianity. His remarks were substantially an argument for equal rights for all—liberty in all opinions. Mr. Stillman is a quite forcible speaker, and his remarks were well received by those on his side of the house.

Mr. Hallowell opposed a repeal of the Comstock laws.

The Convention began to get a little mixed at this juncture, and some little feeling was manifested. The opponents of repeal began tactics in the way of offering amendments to and substitutes for the resolutions under discussion. They showed an unfairness not exhibited by the repealers and evinced a disposition at this point to retard the work of the majority.

Dr. Winslow then offered the following amendment to Mr. Palmer's resolutions, which were agreed to:

Resolved, That however its members may differ as to questions of constitutionality, the National League fully recognizes the necessity of suppressing obscene literature, by such legislation as shall be proper and constitutional, and shall also protect absolute freedom of discussion upon all subjects.

Rev. G. E. Gordon of Milwaukee then spoke with a good deal of bitterness and more untruthfulness than any other person who spoke in the Congress. He said he belonged to a League of some one hundred and twenty-five members every one of whom was opposed to the repeal of the Comstock laws. He was also well acquainted with the Leagues through the Northwest and he knew that they were all opposed to repeal, and nearly all those who signed the petition to Congress in favor of repeal had regretted it, and many had told him that they signed it without understanding the nature of the subject, and had they to do it over again they would not sign such a petition. He believed in an entire suppression of obscenity—both by state and United States laws. He aspersed those who differed from him as being advocates of immorality and indecency. He said the waters are dividing; on the one side is decency and morality, on the other impurity, indecency, and immorality. He appealed to those present to decide which side they would choose. "Who desires," said he, "that obscenity should hav free passage through the mails? What mother would not rather that her daughter should be raped in body than in mind by obscene literature?"

In a subsequent brief conversation we had with this individual he said he was in favor of Comstock and the work he was doing and that he was in favor of the Comstock laws. He approved of Heywood being sent to prison, and thought any man who would write such a book and publish it ought to be sent to prison. We told him that he was the most indecent, untruthful, and ungentlemanly of any one who had spoken in the Congress. It was noticeable that many of the Abbot party disapproved of his bigotry, vituperation and falsehood. He harmed his friends more than he helped them.

Col. D. M. Fox, of Rochester, in a dignified and candid manner disputed the representations made by the Rev. G. E. Gordon, in reference to Western Liberals. He said he was himself directly from the West, and he was familiar with the Liberal Leagues of that part of the country. He was President of the Liberal League of Springfied, Mo., and he had assisted in organizing several other Liberal Leagues, and he was acquainted with the Leagues in Joplin, Moberly, Kansas City, St. Joseph, and other points, and he knew what their sentiments were upon the question of repeal. The Rev. gentleman had misrepresented them. A large majority of them were in favor of the repeal of the Comstock laws, believing them to be unconstitutional and inimical to the liberties of the people. He denounced those laws as "vile and damnable." The Colonel's remarks in all instances were well timed, and his style of candor, fairness, and ability produced an excellent effect upon his hearers.

Mrs. Lucy N. Colman of Syracuse, repelled in an emphatic manner the aspersions of the Rev. Gordon, and said he acted ignobly in trying to do injustice to those in favor of repeal, by casting the imputation of immorality and indecency upon them. She knew the charge to be false. Those who favored repeal were as moral and as much opposed to immorality of all kinds as those who professed an extra amount of purity and holiness. She sustained Mr. Green in the position he had taken as to his own conduct and standing for the fifteen or twenty years she had been acquainted with him. She had never heard the first word of suspicion or defamation breathed against his private character, and she thought it very unjust to asperse him in the way it had been done.

Mr. T. B. Wakeman made an able legal argument partly in reply to the position taken by Judge Hurlbut. He said that in the brief time allowed him he could say but little by way of a legal argument. He recounted how, on the 12th of November, 1877, at about four o'clock in the afternoon, he found the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER in the custody of a U. S. Marshall and about to be taken to prison, and who, but for his timely interference by way of bail, would hav been consigned to a felon's cell. Upon the editor's requesting him to draw up a petition to the Congress of the United States for the repeal or radical modification of the law under which he had been arrested, he complied. He gave the case a careful examination. After making a draft of it he submitted it to his brother, Abram Wakeman, a sound lawyer, much older than himself, a man who had been Postmaster of New York, Collector of the Port, and representative to Congress, and who was as thoroughly versed in United States postal laws as any lawyer in the country. His brother pronounced the petition without fault. It was submitted also to some half-dozen other able lawyers and several scientific men, who pronounced it as good as could be drawn. When Mr. Bennett sent the petitions over the country for signatures, the opposition to it was manifest. It was asserted that it was in favor of obscenity and immorality and should not be signed, altho' there is not a word in it that can be construed to indorse obscenity or immorality in the least. That was the time when the opposition to the repeal movement first showed itself, and it had since been actively kept up. He regarded it as a misfortune that this hypercritical opposition had been raised, as it had only tended to divide the Liberal ranks and make room for discord. Had this not been done, we, as Liberals, should doubtless hav succeeded in the effort that was made to get the law changed, and should to-day be far better united than we are.

The members of the opposition grew restless, and evinced a disposition to prevent Mr. Wakeman from continuing, and the opposition was so marked and uncalled for that he took his seat before he had completed his remarks.

Mr. Stark said Mr. Wakeman had been heard two hours during the day, and the League could get along without hearing anything further from him to-night. He moved to adjourn, but his motion was voted down.

Mr. B. F. Underwood did not believe in being "choked off," and was not so narrow-minded as not to allow a full and free discussion. The most reprehensible part of his remarks was where he showed impatience towards those who occupied the anti-Abbot position, and said if the vote on repeal was pressed that those who opposed it would be justified in withdrawing from the organization. This position caused pain to many of Mr. Underwood's friends, and they regretted to see him unwilling to accord the same rights to those who differed with him that he claimed for his own party. It looked too much like the big surly boy who engaged in sport with the other boys, got mad and said if matters could not go as he wished, he would not play. The idea that the wish of the majority should not prevail, and that if they pushed their principal theory in favor of repeal, the minority would not submit, but would withdraw was expressed by several. Those in favor of repeal expressed a desire to preserve harmony, and said they would not withdraw from the organization if they did not succeed in carrying the measure they considered of vital importance.

Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr., read a series of resolutions as a substitute for those that had already been offered, and which, he thought, might be accepted as a compromise by both divisions. The resolutions he read expressed the opinion that there were strong grounds for supposing the Comstock postal laws unconstitutional; and, as they had been used to the injury of many innocent persons, they ought to be repealed, etc. Considerable opposition was made to the resolutions, and, after not a little heated debate, they were referred to the Committee on Resolutions. In the confusion that arose, another motion was made to adjourn, and as the President called for the vote, which he declared to be in favor of adjournment, the janitor began to turn off the gas, and the delegates quietly left the hall at near the hour of midnight and sought their places of rest.

SUNDAY MORNING.

The proceedings opened quietly. The leaders of the Repeal party, during the interval since adjournment, had decided, as a matter of compromise, to not press the question of repeal at this session, but to lay it over for further examination and discussion till the next meeting of the Congress.

Mr. Courtlandt Palmer, of New York, offered the following compromise resolutions:

Resolved, That this Congress does not, at the present session, express any judgment in regard to the Comstock postal law question, but that it hereby recommends that the members of the League and all Liberals inform themselves, as far as possible, as to its constitutionality, with a view to decisive action at the next Congress.

Resolved, That the freedom of the press, which is guaranteed by the United States Constitution, includes freedom to publish and freedom to circulate, by the customary channels, all opinions on literary, scientific, political, social, moral, religious, or other subjects.

Resolved, That while we recognize the supreme importance of extinguishing, as far as possible, the demand for obscene literature by educational and moral means, we also recognize the practical necessity of legislation by the proper and constitutional authority against the crime of publishing it, and laws for the punishment of the same.

Mr. Wakeman supported the resolutions, and said he appreciated the position of Mr. Palmer, who did not desire to force a conscience not prepared for conviction. He regretted, however, to return home while two League members lay under arrest, and that arrest instigated by Church authorities, without an expression of condemnation from this League. He believed the arrested parties guilty of no wrong whatever, and yet, before generally asking the Congress to favor the repeal of the Comstock postal laws, he thought it better to take another year for consideration and increased information on the subject, and to fully think the matter over. He said he yielded this much to save the feelings and heartburnings of the opposite party. This was a decided concession for harmony by the stronger party, for they well knew they had a handsome majority, and could easily pass a vote in favor of repeal if they wished to. How much this concession, however, was appreciated by the opposite party remains to be seen.

The Rev. Mr. Gordon, the troublesome spirit of the Congress, was in favor of meeting the question now, and of not postponing it till another year. The Comstock laws had been decided constitutional; the question was now higher than the Constitution; it was what is pure and clean and right. The movement for the repeal of the Comstock laws came from parties who sold obscene literature themselves; it was time the League proclaimed itself for purity and morality, and not rest under a cloud for a year. They must stand on principles of decency and order, or they would die. The American people were a clean people. If the unclean ones carried their point in the Congress, those who loved decency would uphold the hands of those who sought to suppress obscenity, and he himself would go to Washington and work for the Comstock laws.

Mr. Underwood presented the following resolutions in connection with those already offered by Mr. Palmer.

Resolved, That since the growth and influence of the Liberal League movement depends primarily on the multiplication of local auxiliary Liberal Leagues, and since the multiplication of these Leagues depends chiefly on the zeal and activity of the members of the Executive Committee of the National Liberal League we recommend to their earnest attention the following points:

1. That they appoint at least three of their associates in their own immediate neighborhood to the end that the several state sub-committees may hold frequent and regular meetings for consultation and action.

2. That they use all diligence in forming as large a list as possible of the names of prominent and active members throughout their respective states.

3. That they enter into correspondence with the latter as local agents for the purpose of stimulating them to initiate the organization of local Leagues in their respective towns.

4. That they continually impress upon these local agents and through them upon Liberals everywhere, the innumerable advantages which must acrue to themselves and the Liberal cause by building up numerous local Leagues and thereby creating a vast and strong constituency for the National League.

5. That if any of the Executive Committee finds himself unable to discharge the duties of his office, he should nominate to the directors, as his successor, some capable and energetic man or woman who is willing to assume these important duties.

Resolved, That it is inexpedient at this time to nominate candidates for the Presidency and Vice-Presidency of the United States, and that it must remain inexpedient to take this step until the local constituency of the National Liberal League is vastly increased.

Resolved, That the sinister and ruinous bearings of the Edmund's constitutional amendment upon the cause of state secularization are dangerously misunderstood and disregarded by nearly the whole people, and especially by Liberals; that notwithstanding the excellence of the major part of this amendment, the proviso that it shall not hav the effect to exclude the Bible from the public schools would indirectly but completely Christianize the now secular Constitution by recognizing the Bible as having a divine right to be read in public schools which is superior to the right of Congress and of the people, and would thus plant the nation unawares on the foundation principle of orthodoxy, while the further proviso that this amendment shall not hav the effect to impair the rights of property already vested, is designed to secure the perpetual exemption of church property from taxation, with all the growing evils of that mountainous injustice.

Resolved, That we earnestly counsel all local Leagues to hold frequent public meetings for the purpose of enlightening the people as to the unspeakable importance involved in this still pending attempt to Christianize the Constitution by stealth, and as to the paramount necessity of defeating the proviso now attached to this proposed amendment.

After considerable discussion, the resolutions were passed and a better feeling seemed to prevail.

Before this, J. H. Adamson, of Passaic, N. J., rose and alleged that he could show up the tactics of the New York party. He represented that D. M. Bennett, of THE TRUTH SEEKER, had written a letter to his League urging them to send a full delegation, and offering, if they would send delegates who would vote with him and his party, that he would present them with ten dollars' worth of Liberal books, which was a species of bribery. Bennett, perceiving that his letter was misquoted and that it was not fairly presented, demanded that the letter be read, saying that he did not want a garbled or misquoted copy of the letter to be palmed off for the letter itself. Several called for the letter, and upon his assertion that he had not the letter with him, he was asked to take his seat. The Chair ruled that Adamson must produce the letter or make no further allusions to it, whereupon the gentleman from Passaic City was compelled to take his seat.

It may be stated here that we wrote to several Leagues, urging them to send delegates to the Congress, and to several friends we also wrote, asking them to organize new leagues, but in no instance did we attempt to bribe them, but simply hoped they would see the importance of Liberals sustaining free speech, a free fress, and free mails. New leagues hav been organized in the interest of the Abbot side probably nearly as extensively as by the opposite side, and it is difficult to see why it is not as legitimate for one side as for the other. Mr. Green was paid $35 for being instrumental in organizing seven new leagues. Prof. Toohey was paid $10 for organizing two leagues, and L. K. Washburn the same amount for two more. Now if we procured the organization of a few Leagues without pay, where is the wrong? Perhaps if we would present a bill for $30 or $40 for services thus performed, and the same were paid, they would feel better about it. If it is legitimate in others to get up Leagues, it ought to be for us.

Mrs. Clara Neyman read a somewhat lengthy communication from Western German Radicals, including Carl Doerflinger, of Milwaukee, and others. It touched upon political, moral, and social topics, and was couched in fraternal and well-expressed language. A discussion upon the merits of the communication was reserved till the afternoon.

SUNDAY AFTERNOON.

The most important business of the Congress came off during this session. It opened by the majority and minority reports of the Committee on Nominations. The majority report presented the names of F. E. Abbot as President, with the other officers elected last year. The minority report nominated Elizur Wright for President, with a few new names for Vice-Presidents, to wit: Mrs. F. W. Titus, Mrs. Lucy N. Colman; for Treasurer, Courtlandt Palmer; for Secretary, Henry Damon; for Assistant Secretary, Mrs. Hope Whipple; Chairman of Executive Committee, H. L. Green; Finance Committee, Henry Damon, Mrs. E. B. Otis, and J. S. Verity.

Judge Hurlburt made a strong appeal in favor of the League's adhering to Mr. Abbot and re-electing him President. Among other things, he said Mr. Abbot had "made us," and we could not get along without him. It is hardly to be supposed that the Judge really meant that Mr. Abbot made him and others much older than Mr. Abbot.

Mr. Abbot made a few remarks, a part of which were thought to be not in the best of taste, and that they lost him a few votes. After making an appeal for his brother officers, Messrs. Hamlen, Willcox, and Crandon, and asking that they be re-elected, giving as a reason that they had worked faithfully and for small compensation, he said he did not wish to be re-elected unless they were. Here he became insolent, and snapped his fingers in the face of the audience and said he would not giv that for their suffrages, etc.

J. S. Verity, of Boston, made a short, earnest, telling speech. He said he had come all the way from Boston to vote for the repeal of the Comstock postal laws, and he felt as though he had been sold out in that respect by his friends in the morning, but he did not want to be sold out now in his vote for officers of the League. He said he opposed Mr. Abbot because of the course he had taken with reference to the Comstock laws, and because of his dictatorial manner. He felt as though Mr. Abbot had not taken the right means to promote the harmony of the League, and had been instrumental in throwing in a cause of discord and contention. Mr. Abbot's course in this respect he could not approve, and he could not vote for his reëlection. He disapproved of the pronunciamento and platform which Mr. Abbot put forth declaring that he would not accept office on any other basis; as he, Verity, could not approve of that platform, he could not vote for Mr. Abbot; and in reference to the young men who had served so faithfully for two years as officers of the organization, he thought it was unreasonable to ask them to continue to work so hard, and that it would be only fair for them to take a rest and let others bear the burden. Communications.

The Critic Corrected, or the True Causes of our Financial Distress.

President Hayes, in his inaugural, stated that there were indications of the nation's speedy return to prosperity all around us. As this statement was made a year and a half ago, and the flattering promises of the President, so far from having been realized, hav been most signally falsified by the deplorable increase of our financial adversity instead of a revival of our prosperity, the circumstance shows that the chief magistrate was most lamentably ignorant of the true causes of the nation's financial distress. And if a man who is assumed to represent the intelligence of the whole nation can be thus ignorant on such a vital question, we should not think it strange if a large majority of the voters of the country are equally ignorant. Indeed, I hav never observed during my life such a general, such a profound, and such a deplorable ignorance on any other important political question as that which is displayed with respect to the question of financial reform, or "the money question," simply because the majority of voters, instead of investigating the question critically for themselves, depend upon the newspapers and the leaders of their political parties for their intelligence upon the subject. This negative policy furnishes designing political demagogues ample opportunity to deceive and mislead the people by the propagation of false theories relative to the real causes as well as the true remedy for our present pecuniary suffering and distress. Even some of our able writers, who display a considerable amount of intelligence on other subjects, show, by the productions of their pens when writing on this question, that they, too, hav been deceived and misled; that they, too, hav fallen victims to the false arguments and delusive theories of tricked and bought-up, or, at least, biased politicians. Among this number appears to be your able correspondent, Mr. J. W. Truesdell. It is a source of sorrowful reflection that men of talent and influence like Mr. Truesdell should, for the want of proper intelligence on the subject, vindicate those false, popular theories which serve as chains to keep the people enthralled in ignorance, by which means this hydra-headed and distressing evil is still further augmented and perpetuated instead of being extirpated. Mr. Truesdell should be sure he is right before he lends his influence to support and rivet upon us still tighter this monstrous and widespread evil. But I perceive, by several questions which he raises in his article published in THE TRUTH SEEKER of September 28th, that he misunderstood the whole question; that he has not read history sufficiently to understand either the causes or the remedy for the suffering condition of the country. Floating on the tide of common delusion, our good, but mistaken, friend seems to hav borrowed one of those false tables of figures made out by the interested banker and bondholder to delude and deceive the people and make them believe there has been no serious contraction of the currency, and therefore the statement that our financial distress is assignable to that cause is all a lie. They know that our present ruinous financial system, which is robbing the people of millions of dollars and putting them into their pockets, cannot be changed while they can succeed in blinding the masses with false tables of figures to prove that we hav nearly as much money in circulation as we ever had, and therefore the greenback men are a set of fools or liars in attempting to show that the currency has been contracted and that this is the cause of our great commercial calamities.

But if the position of the banker, and bondholder, and Mr. Truesdell were correct—that there has been no sensible contraction of the currency—it would prove that our lawmakers are a set of consummate fools to pass laws for the special purpose of contracting the currency, and make many speeches in favor of it, and create the impression throughout the nation that this was necessary to bring greenbacks up to a par with gold, and the people now generally suppose it was contraction that produced this result. But they are all a set of ignoramuses, according to Mr. Truesdell, for he attempts to make it appear that no contraction of any importance has taken place.

Does not friend Truesdell know that a law was passed which required greenbacks to be burned up at the rate of $4,000,000 a month, and that Hugh McCullough destroyed $44,000,000 under the operation of that law? Does he not know that Mr. Sherman made bonfires of the greenbacks at the rate of from one to two millions a month? Does he not know that a large number of bank notes also hav been withdrawn? And that various other species of paper currency hav also been destroyed, or "retired," amounting in the whole to about $14 000,000, making on an average for ten years about $300,000 a day? Is it possible that he is ignorant of all these facts? I suppose we must conclude so, for his use of the odious term "inflationist," and his disposition to support and justify the present fraudulent financial system, show that he is floating with the ignorant multitude and needs light on the subject. He says that "it is to be regretted that not a few of our new-born economic writers, either from a defective memory or a lack of opportunity to correctly inform themselves, appear to be sadly deficient in their knowledge of our financial statistics." This is true; and I know of but few persons to whom this remark will more forcibly apply than to Mr. Truesdell himself. His erroneous (and, as I suppose, borrowed) statistical table shows that he is sadly deficient in statistical knowledge. It shows the amount of bank notes, greenbacks, compound-interest notes, demand notes, and fractional currency in circulation for a number of years, but leaves out nine or ten different kinds of currency, or paper issues, used as currency during the war. What does this mean? What is this done for? In this way he makes the maximum circulation during the war only $483,000,000. This is done, let it be noticed, by confining his calculation to only one-third of the currency. This is a trick that Republican politicians hav been gulling and deceiving the people with for years; and, as I hav the utmost confidence in Mr. Truesdell's honesty, I hav to assume that this table of Mr. Truesdell's was borrowed from some of those Republican tricksters. I go to headquarters for my statistics. I draw from an authority that cannot be disputed. The Secretary of the Treasury I regard as the most reliable authority in such cases. And here is his report with respect to the currrency circulation of 1866:

	1. Temporary loans.....	$107,000,000
	2. Certificates of indebtedness..	85 000 000
	3. Five per cent legal tenders...	83,954,000
	4. Coin-interest legal tenders....	217,000,000
	5. Seven-thirty notes.....	850.000,000
	6. Greenbacks	433 000 000
	7. Fractional currency.....	344,000,000
	8. Cash, or coin.....	88,218 000
	9. National bank notes.....	131,452,000
	10. State bank notes.....	240,000 000
I add	11. Confederate notes.....	450,000.000
		$2,612,395,000

Here, it will be observed, the Secretary's list includes ten kinds of currency, while brother Truesdell's includes but five—only one-half. What does this mean? And it will be observed, also, that the Secretary's report makes the minimum circulation nearly three hundred per cent greater than friend Truesdell does. And as the Secretary's report for 1875 makes the currency circulation only $674,000,000, it shows a contraction of $1,938,395,000, that is, nearly three-fourths.

The good brother says, "Nothing can be more fatal to a logical conclusion than a perversion of the facts." And yet I find the facts perverted in four or five cases in his article. His statement that the per capita circulation of the United States for twenty years was only $5.92, is a most egregious error, which I would show if my article were not too long already. He says that my statement—that two billions were in circulation—is more than double the real sum. But I hav proved it by the Secretary of the Treasury, and am prepared to prove all my statements. I never pervert facts. His question, "What new system can we adopt that will be an improvement?" shows that he is ignorant of history and also of the greenback principles. We want no new system, but one that has been tried for more than a thousand years and has always proved a success, while the present system has always failed to promote the interests of the people. Hence the importance of the change.

Liberal Organization.

It is cheering beyond expression to see the suggestions on organizing the Liberal forces made at the Freethinkers' Convention acted on so soon, and with candor and zeal. Let this go spiritedly on, and we will call our own to the bright humanitarian banner, and stand a phalanx for truth and justice, able to defend its whole and its individuals against assaults and encroachments of dark, struggling churchal tyrannies, and do many great things. When the State of New York is put in easy harness of county committees, let the work spread in all directions; Canada will probably be waiting with open palms, the West will shout, "All ready!" New England will cry, "Our once hated Garrison is a victor, and our veteran Elizur Wright shall be upheld by liberty!" all the South shall slowly put on the armor and recognition of mental freedom, swelling the ranks of right till the present Washington, environed by equable principles, shall totter and falter, while the future Government, worthy to be called a free people's, shall indeed be born.

Make general this now begun movement, and its salutary action will ward off the threatened sanguinary conflict, and hasten financial and judicial reform. Hold good courage, brothers all, and forget not that success depends on woman's coöperation, and that on your encouraging her to free action, on standing by her in declaring herself physically and mentally emancipated. While she givs her influence to the priestly rule, called fashionable and proper, it will hav power to sway the most of men, and smite the rest. This is the mountain barrier so long overlooked. Gaze deep and speak.

Now, who are Freethinkers, believing in and advocating mental liberty? If I see clearly, about everybody but those rabidly claiming the name Christian, and those so swayed by their control as not to be free in any sense. Those who cling, as if thoughtlessly, to pernicious customs, known shams, ignore in practice, if they own in theory; they tie their own hands, and degrade the world by teaching that they cannot rise to the status of science, simply because wrong old usages blend with trades that grasp their money, colleges that culture vanity and shrivel nobility, and churches that flatter with guile, while they appropriate the victim to selfish, deathly ends. The because belongs on the other side. Because these crafts permeate and paralyze all things, they should be wholly discarded. They are the powers that make up popularity to-day. What a forbidding field for sovereigns of thought and creators of character! A field that stifles liberty soon as entered. But most women hav been reared in its vassalage, hence need and deserve assistance in rebelling; and free men should extend strong, kind hands from every platform and speech, journal and document.

People termed positive philosophers are usually Freethinkers, amiable, and profess to aim at living the Golden Rule. No proof of a sentient immortality appeals to their minds. They believe in reward of well-doing here, growth in knowledge, joys of kindness, etc., etc., are ample to incite to goodness and all possible wisdom. Spiritualists believe all this with them, are Freethinkers, positive scientists too, and further believe in continued identity and progress after the spirit that animates the flesh is decarnated. Evidence of this induces free thought, wide investigation, and, they think, elevates their joys and affections; hence, they countenance all phases of honest belief, and coöperate with all aims for common welfare and freedom. It is fitting and noble for these two schools of Liberals to heartily unite in maintaining mental liberty against either sects or states striving to usurp undue authority, Spiritualists who, by crafty scandal and abuse, hav been impelled to fall back on more popular conformity, which in effect is surrendering their influence to the Church, will honor themselves and their cause, and bless humanity, if they come frankly and fearlessly to this organization for redeeming the United States, and bravely work with the good and true, whether they be called Infidels, Deists, Pantheists, Theists, or Atheists, for all these names are good enough while needed, and imply very good people. Their preferring to study but one world at a time does not make them bad, and all should scorn to shun them or their true work for human justice. The times are critical, and demand the aid of all the good. MARY E. TILLOTSON.

Money.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I see that brother Newell kindly undertakes to enlighten me on the money question. Well, light is what we need. We hav had enough skirmishing on the money question. Let the disputants come to close quarters.

It is true, the law is what designates what shall be money; but the idea I wish to convey is that the gold and silver finder holds a premium over the potato raiser. The farmer must mortgage his property, and give a big per cent to get money, or sell his potatoes at a small price in comparison to what the gold finder sells his bullion for. The making of gold and silver money greatly enhances the value of those metals to the detriment of their use in the arts and sciences. If the Government reaped the benefit of the premium alone, it would not be so bad. But to keep private parties from coining those metals Government is compelled to keep bullion value near coin value.

Gold-diggers often become millionaires; pototo-diggers never do. Government gives the gold-digger a big price for his bullion; the potato-digger can rarely sell his "bullion" to the Government for anything. The bondholder can issue currency on his bonds. The landholder is denied that privilege. I agree that paper is the cheapest and best material to make money out of. I am also convinced now that there is no use in redeeming money in anything. Issue it upon good security and let it circulate forever. I do not think our gold and silver mines should be managed by the Government. The soil should be free to all regardless of what metals they contain. Then mines would be free too. Let the soil be free to all who will use it, whether for digging potatoes or gold.

Brother Newell says, "Let the dollar never change in value." I agree that our money should be uniform and constant. And if possible, the dollar should never vary in purchasing power, only from supply and demand of the things purchased.

But has there ever been, and can there ever be, such money? The dollar, the world over, is represented by so many grains of gold and silver. And, in spite of all laws, the purchasing power of the dollar has ever varied in proportion to amount of money in circulation (whether paper or metal) or supply of bullion. Reissue the greenbacks that hav been destroyed, and prices will rise in proportion as they hav fallen from contraction, or the same addition to our bullion would do it, unless absorbed by the arts and sciences or foreign demand.

Paper money with the dollar represented by nothing, and circulation kept in proportion to trade and population, might give us an unvarying currency, but I doubt it. In the first place I think it would take thirty-seven Philadelphia lawyers to keep circulation in proper proportions; and the whole world couldn't find out the value of a dollar unless represented by something of known value.

Brother Newell says, "The value of the 'fiat' dollar, as our friend calls it, is the value given it by law, and not what the various commodities giv it." The Government puts its stamp on a piece of paper or metal, and says, "Here is a dollar." And the law of the land says so many grains of gold or silver with the Government on it is a dollar. Now the world learns the exchange value of a dollar by learning the exchange value of gold and silver as property. With gold and silver demonetized, how would you know the exchange value of the "fiat" dollar. I ask you now what a dollar is, and you would reply that so many grains of gold and silver were. I ask you what a "fiat" dollar is, and you would say, "It's—it's—a dollar."

It seems pretty clear to me that the dollar must be represented by something. If represented by property, its exchange value fluctuates with the exchange value of that property. If the representative of the dollar is money itself, that will enhance its value and stimulate its production to the detriment of its other uses, and to the detriment of other more useful industries, as a much cheaper material can be found of which to make it. Besides, when the representative of a dollar is stamped and made a legal tender, any other money will partake of its nature and the amount in circulation will govern prices. But stamp a dollar on paper, letting the dollar be represented by property, and that property not a legal tender, and quantity in circulation will not affect prices. And there would be nothing in it to stimulate over production in that property.

Now, in hunting about for something to represent the dollar, I find nothing less fluctuating than labor. Let so many hours' labor represent the dollar. Let every one issue money in any quantity that they can secure the public.

Then, and not till then, shall we hav a uniform, just, and stable currency. Am I entirely alone! Help, O Israel!

He regreted az deeply az eny person kood, the falling ov so good a person into the mazes ov heresy and unbelief. It had ben a surprize to him how so sensibul and good a person az Brother Skid-more iz, kood be left to be so ensnared by the wiles ov the evil wun, and he kood not think it waz eny rong intenshun on the part ov the deeken. In hiz opinyun, the Infidel editur ov that paper waz far more to blame in this hul biznis than enybody else, and he waz only sorry that that same wiked editur waz not within the reech and power ov Zion Hil Church, for in that kase severe justis wood be dun to a very vile man, and the church wood take unfaned plezure in making him a terribul exampel to all evil doers. He had no dout that had this kongregashun had the passing ov the sentense ov justis upon that Infidel Bennett, he wood ether be sent to prizen at hard labor for 20 yeers, or hiz life wood be taken from him in the most approved Kristyan manner, by which meenz he wood be plased whare he wood drag no more soles down to hel. He felt impeld to sa however that he kood not beleev that Bro. Skidmore had given wa to eny bad intenshuns, or that he had ment to be gilty ov eny grate offense before God or man. He hoped to heer from the good deeken, and hoped to heer that the feers and apprehenshuns ov Sister Jones and uthers wer without sufishent grounds. It kood not nesessarily be held bekauz a man took a paper ov eny kind or no paper at all that he waz deserving ov punishment, or that the brethren and sisters ov this church aut to expel him in disgrase. He thawt we aut to moov sloly and karefully, and not be to eeger to punish a brother. The good brother kontinude on in this wa for sum time, and when he sat down I thawt I kood see that a good impreshun had ben made.

The next speeker was Brother Steven Karter. He iz not konsidered an over-relijus man, and kriticisms hav ben made that he did not hav az much Jezus relijun as a member ov Zion Hil Church aut to posses. He duz not often speek in publik, and hardly ever haz much to sa about what God haz dun for him, nor about the workings ov the Holy Gost in hiz sole. He iz a good thrifty farmer, hoo attends klosely to hiz own affares, and haz a good farm ov 75 akers entirely pade for, with 700 dollers at interest. Such zelus Kristyans az Sister Jones kall him a man ov the world, hoo thinks more about raising good kattel and hogs than he duz about foreordination, elekshun, total depravity, and the final perseverence ov the saints. He sed while he belonged to the church he beleevd in paing hiz share ov the expenses, and to do so when it waz du. He beleeved it waz a pretty good kind of relijun for a person to pa thare honest dets, and to make no wun wate a da longer than waz nesessary for what belonged to them.

He sed, in addition, that he had hiz noshuns about taking papers to reed. He did not kare for so meny as sum, for he kood not find time to reed them; hiz work demanded hiz konstant attenshun, and hiz reeding time waz limited; but he beleeved in the rite to take such papers az he pleezed, and az long as he pleezed. He hoped he wood not want to take eny paper that wood make him wiked, or that he waz inklined to hav enything ov the kind in hiz house that wood do hiz family eny harm. And he had that much konfidense in Deeken Skidmore that he wood not subskribe for and kontinu to take a paper that waz really vile. He did not beleev that the reeding of THE TRUTH SEEKER had dun the deeken a bit ov harm. He seems just az fine a man, just az good a Kristyan, az he did 6 munths ago, before he ever saw a TRUTH SEEKER. For hiz part he did not beleev it waz eny part ov the bizines ov this church to trubbul themselves about what nuze-papers or magazeens the members saw fit to take. If the members pade thare just duze to the church and to all men, if they minded thare own bizines and let uther peepel's alone, if tha ronged no wun, and did what good tha kood as tha past thru life, he did not beleev the church had eny rite to kondem that man or to hall him up here before the church to lekcher him and examin into all hiz privat affares. "Now," sed Bro. Karter, "yu hav just az much rite to kall me up and hall me over the koles az yu hav Brother Skidmore. Perhaps meny ov yu dont no it, but I do, that I take THE TRUTH SEEKER, and from the wa I feel now I think I shal keep on taking it for sum time. I herd Deeken Skidmore and Kaptan Smith tauking wun da about THE TRUTH SEEKER and Kaptin Smith prazed it in the hiest terms. Dee-ken Skidmore sed if I wanted to try it for a while that I kood hav it 3 munths and a good dikshunary for 60 sents. I sed I wood take it and giv him the munny, and he rote to the editur for it, and I am bold to sa that I find a good menny things in it that I like. I don't endorse all it sez, but it don't do me a bit ov harm to read it and az thare iz no law agenst my reeding it, and az I hav a perfekt rite to read it I think I will kontinu, whether Sister Jones likes it or not. And I will also sa this much to yu all: If yu take it upon yourselvs to kondem me for taking what paper to reed I pleez, then my konnekshun with yu az a member ov yure church seeses. If our sistem ov religion kannot bare all that THE TRUTH SEEKER kan sa, if it is so eezy to be noked over that wun old editur kan nok it, I sa let it go. If our church and our religion hav got to be kept up by the destrukshun ov our individual rites, then I say let the religion go. Let us manetane our rites ov lib-erty whatever else we loze or keep. My advise to Deeken Skidmore iz to just take what papers he chooses to, and let thoze hoo don't like it help themselves. That iz what I shal do, and I no thare are a fu more in this church hoo feel the same wa. If Sister Jones and a haf-dozen more like her wish to draw the lines, let them do so."

Bruther Karter spoke thoze last wurds with more emfasis than iz kommon for him, and when he took hiz seet a littel buz went round amung the audiense, and I kood see that the speech we had just hurd had made an impreshun. Sister Jones' fase kullered up to her eers, and in haf a minit she sprung up, show-ing by her are and manner that she waz governd by sum spirit, not gospel charity. She spoke vary has-tily and in a loud voise. Sally sed she akted for all the wurld az tho she was skolding her hired girl for getting a batch ov butter too salt. She went on in this wa:

"For my part, I think we had better giv up our relijun altogether or else stik to it. We had better eether be Kristyans or Infidels; if we ar Kristyans, we hav no biznes to be reeding Infidel papers. I kan understand what makes Bruther Karter tauk the wa he duz. He iz just about az deep in the mud az Bruther Skidmore iz in the mire, and it iz nach-eral enuf that he shood defend him. But I wil raze my voise in behaf of Jezus and hiz holy relijun. I don't beleev in mixing. I want the pure artikel, and meen to hav it. I don't want eny Infidelity nor TRUTH SEEKERISM in mine, and wat iz more, I won't hav it. Thoze hoo want to reed THE TRUTH SEEK-ER, I suppoze tha hav a rite to do so, and thoze hoo want to go to hel, have a rite to do that also.

"I don't beleev eny tru Kristyan wil take an Infi-del paper into hiz house, and hardly into hiz hands; and, for my part, I don't think much ov thoze hoo wil do so."

At this moment Elder Goodly roze and askt Sister Jones to wate a littel and allow him to sa a fu wurds. "It iz my opinyun that it iz vary eezy to sa too much. It wil not anser for wun haf ov the church to drive out the uther haf. If we go on in this wa our church wil be broken up and we shal fall to the ground. It haz greevd me to lern that skeptisizm and unbeleef ar wurking into our midst, but, if pos-sible, kontenshun and a want ov charity iz wurse. I am vary slo to beleev that eether Bro. Skidmore or Bro. Karter haz ment eny harm by taking the paper that haz ben menshund, and I wood hope tha mite se fit to remoov the kauze of diskord; but ov wun thing I am vary shure, and that iz that it iz not for the interest ov this church to get rid ov such members as our first deeken and Bro. Karter. Tha ar the pillers that the church depends upon, and it iz far better that we extend charity and the rite hand of felloship to them. I am not afrade that tha wil do eny harm, but tha hav dun and wil stil do a grate deel ov good.

"Now let me sa to all here prezent that I kan't se that it iz going to do eny good to kontinu this tauk any further. No good kan kum ov it, and I am shure the sooner it iz diskontinued the better. We want our good Deeken and our good Bruther Kar-ter to remane with us, and to help bare the bur-den az tha hav dun. If tha want to reed any paper publishd in the wurld, tha hav the rite to do so. My desizhun iz that we return to our homes and laber to kultivate the spirit ov charity, and not to be looking for falts in wun anuther. Thoze who kan so eezily se rongs in a brnther or sister had better serch thare own harts and be sure that tha ar not harboring wurse falts in themselvs than tha ar kondeming in thare bruther. I sertanly kan still take Bruther Skidmore by the hand az korjally az ever; and I must sa I hav strong pursonal reezuns that no rupcher is made with him or Bruther Karter. Let us pra."

Then the elder made a very smooth, passifying prare, asking God to fil all our soles with charity and to inkrese the luv element in us, &c.

After this he dismist us and requested that fu or no remarks be made about what had past here.

We drove direktly home, and Sally sed on the wa that she thaut that Mrs. Jones mite feel cheep enuf, and that for her part she waz ashamed ov her.

Suzan laft out loud and sed she kood feel nothing but kontempt for Mrs. Medlesum Jones; and she hoped the old bizzy-body wood attend to her own bizness and let uthers alone.

I do not feel at all disturbed. I shall kontinu, Mr. Editur, to red yure paper. My 3 munths iz now out, and I send yu herewith $3 for a yeer. I also inklose $1.80 for 3 trial subskribers for 3 munths, with the premium. Send, to, the "Age of Reezun" and wun dikshunary. Very respektfully yures,

JOEL SKIDMORE,
1st Deeken ov Zion Hil Baptist Church.

Soul-Bathybius.

MR. EDITOR: Must we not consider the orthodox as in-significant, forlorn, and God-forsaken to be controlled by such a man as Torquemada-sneak Comstock, whose soul was never touched with a live coal from God's altar. In fact, I do not think he was ever properly baked.

I came near attending the Watkins Convention, and won-dered if the delightful Anthony was present. We must all make some great effort or his "dear soul" will be lost for-ever.

We hear of star-dust, and we willingly concede to astron-omers the consideration that cycles are occupied in con-structing from such slender materials the splendid whirling globes which revolve round their proper suns. Why, then, should the bathybius or soul-matter of the spheres be any more potent or speedy in its operations? If this sub-stance were refined or sufficiently advanced to be used in the manufacture of souls, it would possess all the faculties necessary for complete individuality, and this, too, of a superior being. Thus would the Smith and Brown family be made out of God, and godly they should be. Bathybius, whether in space or under the sea, must be composed of the simplest materials. The soul-atoms of Leibnitz, or other scientist, could only be the mature thoughts of an intelli-gent being. Nothing else could deserve the name.

Democritus, that archangel of intellect, proposed, accord-ing to Bayle, the idea that the "images of things" were created and prepared by God for the use of the mind of man. But who holds the balance-wheel of the universe, and turns it too? If it is God, then he himself is the crea-tion, balance-wheel, and all; and this Mumbo Jumbo is a great animal—we having the inestimable privilege of being parasites living upon his juices and drinking his very blood. But the baseness and cruelty which characterizes many of the operations of nature forbid our acceptance of this view, and we are forced to admit that nature, after all, is chief cook and bottle-washer, that a subtle, hawk-eyed, and rather ill-humored God only turns a crank or two, or whenever nature's works wish to go ahead he shoves them along a lit-tle, which I should call playing second fiddle with a wit-ness (I speak with reverence!) to the great dame who has upheld us from the earliest period of our existence.

But with regard to soul, Voltaire (who, like Bennett, planted a torch instead of a cross at every corner) has elab-orated and brought forward this subject in a way which may be expanded, but not contradicted or set aside. He made the character of soul phenomena depend upon the refinement of sensation, and modern scientists concur in predicating the highest order of mental manifestations only upon refinement of tissue and its necessary concomitant, complicated organization.

What has germinal matter or God, floating through the universe, to do with such an arrangement?

And with regard to the two elements being present in the human body, presiding over all that transpires in that colise-um of nature, I should rather say, count ten thousand degrees of activity. "Tenth or ten thousandth, breaks the chain alike," and you will only giv a sufficient result to the never-ceasing and accumulating operations and influences in the field of animated nature.

But, Mr. Editor, I was shocked and disgusted on meeting in your magnificent paper with the announcement that a gentleman came near being arrested for selling the works of Thomas Paine, and yet such people will not believe that they are lineal descendants of monkeys and apes.

Respectfully yours, ZILLAH.

THE way for a man to secure himself from wickedness is to withdraw from the examples of it.—Seneca.

Letters from Friends.

NORTH HUDSON, WIS., Oct. 12, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, ESQ., Dear Sir: "Cupid's Yokes" and the Trinity came to hand, but not the "Bible Abridged." I hav carefully perused the dreadfully obscene work, and I am only sorry to hav to say that the social abuses referred to are, alas! too evident, and need reforming; and although Mr. Heywood's reforms are what might by some be considered too radical, only the future can establish that point. I cannot set myself up as a judge as to whether his views are altogether right or altogether wrong. Probably they are a little of both; but that they are honest I do believe, and I cannot think he meant anything obscene. By that I mean anything that would vitiate the taste, corrupt the morals, or pollute the senses of either youth or adult who might read them. It may open their eyes pretty wide, and cause them to ponder over matters pertaining to social reform. But in this boasted free country to put a man in "durance vile" for sending through the mails or selling at a bookstand to those who desire them these opinions, however radical they may be, is, I think, an outrage on humanity, and I do most unqualifiedly indorse the Declaration of Rights, and as such put me down on the list.

I am sorry that you, with others, hav been arraigned before the courts on that account too, but let us hope it may be the means of pushing the matter to a climax, and that they cannot be construed into anything that they are not by any religious or professional bigot who has a grudge or spite against his neighbor who does not think as he does or follow in the same rut. Why should there be so much fuss about this obscenity business and its qualifications? Most people know what it is. Strange the word has so many interpretations. One would suppose the douple-distilled and concentrated wisdom of the country, that ought to be found in Congress (but I am afraid is not), could frame some law and define obscene matter so that the inherent rights of the individual would not be interfered with. But so the never-ending fight against orthodox intolerance must go on, and Excelsior must be our cry, and Vigilance the watchword, for it is the price of liberty.

So you intend introducing the spelling reform in your paper. It will seem queer, but its utility I hav little doubt of. But of course you will meet with opposition and probably ridicule, but by and by, when we can get its utility through our thick conservative heads, we will all say, "Brother Bennett, you were sound after all." By the way, what has become of Dr. Sara B. Chase's Physiologist? does she publish it still? I am afraid the persecutions of Comstock hav done her much damage. Her journal was an excellent effort in the right direction, and I hope it may not come to an untimely end thereby. It is not much I can do for the cause financially, but put me down for one dollar, and call on me when needed and I will remit.

Sincerely yours, JAS. S. FIELD.

BELLE PLAINS, IOWA, Oct. 1, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Brother: I have read your paper for about six months. Have never fully believed in Infideiity until very recently I took hold of it very carefully, and after serious thought and hard study I find I cannot reject its convincing power. I do not wholly attribute my convictions to the influence of your paper, but it gave a light to brighten my dark path of doubt. I hav often heard of the "millennium" to come, and I think it will be here soon if Infidelity keeps up its rapid strides for a few years more. I am surprised to find so many of the young people of our town expressing boldly their Liberal sentiments. The minds imprisoned by myths and fables are slowly but surely making their escape. Go on in your good work, and as soon as I get settled in the West I will subscribe for your paper and some books. Yours very truly,

COL. RUCKER.

MR. YOUNG BEHOLDETH THE MOTE IN BRO. JAMIESON'S EYE, BUT CONSIDERETH NOT THE BEAM, ETC.

MEMPHIS, MO., Oct. 11, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT: I see by THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 5th that W. F. Jamieson has given vent to another installment of his spleen and spite towards Spiritualism in general and Mr. Jenkins and "the motley throng of Mott & Co." in particular.

Mr. Jenkins is abundantly able to take care of himself, but as the "motley throng" includes my humble self, I hope you will allow me a few words.

Mr. Jamieson is said to be very courteous in his oral discussions with the defenders of the old theology, but why he descends to the plane of the blackguard the moment he puts pen to paper against Spiritualism I can account for on no other hypothesis than that in the former case he is conscious of being able to refute his opponent's arguments by reason and common sense, while in the latter he is aware that the living facts of to-day, which any one who wishes can verify by the evidence of his own senses and the normal exercise of the reasoning faculties, completely refute his position; and thus, as calm reason cannot avail him, he becomes irate and lays hold on invective and opprobrious epithets. Hence his classic expressions, "foolish clap-trap," "contemptible, dirty doings," "humpbacked spiritualistic camels," "your mouth open, and gulp," etc.

Along towards the middle of his article he says: "I have seen the Mott performances." Now, any one putting confidence in him would understand that he had given the Mott materializations at least a fair investigation. But such is by no means the case. He never attended but one seance, and there are numerous witnesses to the fact that his manner of conducting himself indicated but little desire to come in contact with the phenomena.

The seances are conducted in this wise: The members of the circle go in rotation and exchange the compliments of the evening with Gen. Bledsoe, the presiding spirit; the strangers being introduced and invited to ask any questions they choose. Then the spirits call for their friends present. When Mr. Jamieson was called he advanced to within about two feet of the aperture, and remarked, "That looks like my mother," and immediately turned on his heel and retired to his seat at the opposite side of the room without the least attempt at investigation; not a question did he propose!

No one knows whether his mother was living or dead. But whoever it was undoubtedly saw that he would doggedly ignore the whole phenomena as of spiritual origin, and consequently he was not again called.

Both Mr. Mott and Mr. Pitkin chanced to hav as many guests as could be comfortably entertained, and Mr. Jamieson went to a hotel for lodgings. But Mrs. Mott invited him to come and investigate free of charge. But he never returned. And yet he has the audacity to call the hundreds who have attended from four to hundreds of seances fools and dupes because they trust the evidences of their own senses in preference to his slang!

In another place he says, "I am in favor of a union of all Liberalists of the country under one broad banner." Well, friend J., if none but Liberalists were admitted, you would most assuredly be left out in the cold, as the average orthodox preacher is no more bigoted than yourself. You don't find Spiritualists denouncing Materialists simply on account of their belief, as you denounce them. If a man hopes for annihilation, let him hope on; but if, on the contrary, a Materialist would rather believe in a future life, Spiritualists would gladly assist him. It requires no credulity, but simply a self-poised, honest investigation at Mott's or other places to know it to be a fact, Jamieson to the contrary notwithstanding. STEPHEN YOUNG.

ASTORIA, OR., Sept. 28, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Brother: I see they have you again. Well, that is all right; it is only another drop in the bucket, and it will soon be full to overflowing. Don't you know a rat will turn if too hard pressed, and by and by the great Liberal heart of America will give one mighty throb and declare this must stop, and then, and perhaps not till then, will the army of the Church feel how insignificant they are when Right says, "Thus far shalt thou go and no further." I am sorry for you, but I am glad for the cause it is so. Go on, you noble old martyr, we will all stand by you, "sink or swim," and any one that professes to be a Liberal and does not is a coward. Put me down for $2.50.

Yours for the right, A. A. CLEVELAND.

BROOKLYN, L. I., Oct., 1878.

FRIEND D. M. BENNETT: I continue to receive great comfort in reading your TRUTH SEEKER. It is a daring work, and you hav many able contributors. I hav gone through with your valuable work entitled "The World's Sages." It is of inestimable value from the broad view you take of the world's thinkers and benefactors. It should be more generally read and found on the shelves of every library. I am now getting much entertainment and instruction from your more recent work, "The Champions of the Church." For myself, I do not require at my age (seventy-six) much information on the frauds and hypocrisies of Christian theology; but your last work makes me wonder much at your research, industry, and perseverance. Were it an orthodox theological work, the priesthood would hav affirmed you entitled to a front seat among the "four-and-twenty elders," topped off with a little golden crown. But, alas, friend Bennett, it is evident from your extreme cussedness, and, perhaps, a wicked habit you hav of "telling tales out of school," Christians will consign you to that place down below where the fire is not quenched! Ah, yes; you will get a warm front seat and be compelled to stir up hell with a short poker.

I feel like complimenting you on your choice of type—I mean its size (small pica). It is very comfortable to the eyes of elderly people.

I read with much interest the contributions to your paper of Mrs. Elmina Slenker, the spoilt Quakeress. By the bye, I had to vindicate Elmina to several of my friends recently. They contended she must be a cold, heartless, unfeeling woman. Now you, and thousands, with myself, who hav studied her works, know this to be a totally unfounded conclusion. True, she contends that man has no immortality; that death is an eternal sleep; that "our only future is in the future of our race." I contend with my friends that, with her, this must be considered a mere "figure of speech," perfectly admissible in these days of pious swindling, murder, and fraud. Nor should we wonder, in these days of fashionable hypocrisy, that even sensible minds like Elmina should swing over to the other side of faith and credulity, and even doubt the evidence of their five senses.

No, no, friend Bennett, Elmina, whatever she says about death being an eternal sleep, is all well enough; but we may rest assured that every time she is compelled to stand by and witness the departure of the spirit from the form of some cherished friend, relative, brother, sister, smiling infant, or cultivated toiler in the cause of truth and morality, she keenly feels the pangs of separation, a species of hell! Nature inwardly revolts at the blasting idea of oblivion—of gone, and gone forever.

And, again, is it to be supposed that, years hence, when exhausted Nature imperiously demands that our friend Bennett lay aside his writing implements, and says, "Pass right on thou true and faithful servant," will she not say, "Perhaps there is yet a domain unexplored by skeptics. Perhaps, after all, there may be some truth in the myths of Spiritualism?" and then, despairingly clutching at old orthodoxy, frantically exclaim, "O that I also had a pair of wings!" Yours as ever, DAVID BRUCE.

UNION, OR., Oct. 6, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Inclosed please find $2.00, which please carry to my credit. I take several papers, but consider THE TRUTH SEEKER as good as the best. I notice by the Daily Oregonian that some foolish English people are about to offer up prayers of praise to Almighty God because peace has been proclaimed between Russia and Turkey, which they are foolish enough to think is the result of their prayers. Such nonsense reminds me of an expression of one of our townsmen. We have not had any rain for some time, and the roads are very dusty. A few days ago the party referred to was standing on the street, the wind was blowing and the dust flying in such dense clouds that one could hardly see across the street, when he remarked, "I am going to pray for rain, and if it don't rain, by God I'll keep on praying till it does rain." And so if we want peace, we will keep on praying till peace comes. A very little faith (less than a grain of mustard seed) and a great deal of patience. And so sure as to-morrow's sun shall rise, peace will come—in answer to our prayer of course. Very truly thine, J. B. EATON, JR.

RUSH CENTER, KAN., Oct. 7, 1878.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Inclosed you will find $1.00. For this sum send one copy of the "Age of Reason" and "Examination of Prophecies," by Thomas Paine. I have read the "Age of Reason," and now I want to examine the "Examination of Prophecies." I received the "Interrogatories to Jehovah" last week, and I must say that it beats God, it beats Christ, and it even beats the Devil!

I did not know there were so many inconsistences in the holy volume before, and I must say that the God of the Bible is a Jew with all of a Jew's imperfections. He selected that murderous tribe of marauders as his chosen people, gave them a roving commission to rob, steal, murder, and plunder all other nations, and now and then in places of unusual difficulties he would come to the rescue and slay his thousands. Take the whole array of the Bible characters, and what do we find? Sir, we find a set of murderers, adulterers, thieves, persons guilty of incest, and in fact, guilty of every offense known to the criminal law. The Devil is far ahead of God and his patriarchs, and even Nero is respectable in comparison with them; Caligula appears like a fair man, and the enormities of Dionysius are thrown completely in the shade. And think! we are asked to believe it, to not doubt that God understood it all, and that it is perhaps not for us to know all his ways!

See how absurd: God has written his children a letter, but has written it in such jargon that no man can gather an intelligible idea from it, and tells us if we do not believe that he is just, is reasonable, is merciful—if we do not believe everything contained therein—we are doomed to everlasting hell.

I have not time to write, but I still say, go on, my dear Bennett, and give them such a "shaking up" as they never had before. Respectfully yours, POLK CLUIL.

BURR OAK, MICH., Oct. 20, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Friend and Brother: I send you the name of another trial subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER; will send you two or more permanent patrons to the same as soon as their subscription to the Index expires, they having become heartily disgusted with the course its envious, false, and orthodoxical, cultured editor is pursuing. They affirm they will patronize him no longer. He is truly making himself ridiculous by following in the footprints of his illustrious predecessor, S. W. Paine, and may he soon reap the same reward, the neglect and contempt of Liberals everywhere.

Since writing you last, that eloquent apostle of truth and reason, and the pulveriser of old dogmas and rotten theology, Dr. J. L. York, has again been with us and delivered two powerful and highly instructing lectures to an audience of five hundred attentive listeners, which, with his former lectures here, and those at Sturgis, eight miles from here, have cracked and broken many mental shackles and superstitious fears. The good seed sown is taking root through the land.

Please add my name to the Declaration of Rights, and send me the following list of books and oblige your old friend, M. P. THURSTON.

BURNSIDE, PA., Sept. 8, 1878.

FRIEND BENNETT: I hav been in receipt of your TRUTH SEEKER for about a year. I cannot here express fully our appreciation of it. We call it our "New Testament." I rather guess it was my husband who "made an Infidel" of me, for I was reared in the M. E. Church, my father being a local preacher for that denomination. I hav been married about six years, and live in a little village of about two hundred inhabitants, and during the last three years there has not a woman of the village or surrounding country paid me a single visit, all on account of my religious belief (or theirs).

An old gentleman of eighty years, and who has been an Atheist for thirty years past, residing some eight miles distant, sent me word that he was coming to see me, as he had never seen a woman who was an Atheist in the course of long life. I am one of Mrs. Slenker's many admirers. I believe I really love her. I like the proposition in a late number of THE TRUTH SEEKER, of debating, although it is not a new idea to us. We do not write any, but we hav a little argument every day with some one, and to our business disadvantage in some cases. We keep a small drug store, and as an instance of how they "go back" on us sometimes, I giv you a case.

A gentleman—no, only a man according to Frothingham—came in and was admiring some gold-fishes, when my husband began began to explain their nature and history, in which conversation he happened to speak, as the man thought, disrespectfully of the Bible or Jesus Christ, which is contrary to the laws of Pennsylvania. He got up to leave, saying that he had come in to buy some drugs, but "if that is the kind of a man you are, I shall never buy anything of you again."

He went to the justice to get law against my husband, but failed, as the justice was a man who had better reason or more charity than he. But no matter, if we do suffer these drawbacks on account of our religious opinion, we will contine to teach what we believe to be true. At any rate, we will expose to the extent of our ability what we know to be false.

Inclosed is a "greenback" dollar, for which credit John H. Reed, Burnside, Clearfield county, Pa., on his subscription. Bro. B., "don't give up the ship." Keep afloat; there is an open sea and fairer sailing just a little ahead. This is my first letter to any paper, and only the zest which I have for our cause has induced me to write this for your encouragement. Fraternally, M. C. G. REED.

PORTLAND, ME., Sept. 27, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Inclosed you will find $3.00, which I send for "The Champions of the Church." I like the book very much, and I wish that every orthodox man and woman in this country had it, and had to read it through inside of three months.

I am happy to inform you and the readers of your valuable paper that our free meeting which the Liberal people of this city established here last June is flourishing finely. Every Sunday our hall is well filled, and we hear a large number of very interesting speeches. I hope that free thought and free speech may roll on until they fill the earth with the glory of God. H. A. LAMB, M.D.

ROCKFORD, ILL., Oct. 16, 1878.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: In the last three or four numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER I see quite lengthy articles in regard to what The Seymour Times had to say about the arrest of yourself, W. S Bell, and others at the Watkins Convention, and I could not help thinking but that you were undeservedly giving that prurient sheet altogether too much free advertising, and by so doing might be instrumental in inducing some one to foolishly waste their money by sending for it. Some two or three months since there were three numbers of that paper sent to me, and I hav known of several others who received some of the same, doubtless with a view to getting subscriptions; but, as far as I hav heard, without any success. And from the style and literature of the paper I should say that I think its editor ought to be the last man to say, "We are willing that any prurient idiot may print his thoughts if he can express them in decent language; if he can't, the jail is the best place for him." In what the Times styles its "Latest Proclamation," it says that "The Seymour Times is supposed to be the wickedest paper in the world," etc. And the manner in which it speaks of "a girl-baby of sixteen," and much more of such silly twaddle, I am led to think that the statement as to the wickedness (as well as the slimyness) of the paper is correct. I hav not seen a late issue of The Times, but as to what W. S. Bell says in regard to the editor of The Times claiming that "thousands of good Christians read The Times," according to our way of thinking, such good Christians must be of the class of Christians who would find reading as well, or better, suited to their tastes in the "Holy Bible Abridged."

On glancing over the first number of The Times sent me, I was lead to wonder why Comstock or some of his minions were not after the editor of that paper; but perhaps Comstock & Co. think that he is too small fry for them to meddle with. And it may be that the editor of The Times is only throwing mud at you and Bell and others in order to blind Comstock & Co. in regard to his own cutting up. And if he can save his scalp by "sucking ears" with Comstock and his delectable Christian readers (calves), for pity's sake let him do so. But I fear he will find it no easy trick to ride two horses at the same time, especially if one is a little pony and the other seventeen hands high.

A short time ago a friend gave me a short clipping which he thought would be about suitable for the Seymour Weekly Times, with a request for me to send it, which I did, but I do not know whether it was used in the paper or not. The morality of the Times may be good enough for certain Christians, but I don't think it good enough for Infidels, who hav no Savior to look to to take away all of their sins. We Infidels hav got to stand or fell by our own merits and atone or suffer for our own misdeeds. Therefore, let us lead true and virtuous lives, and by our example, as well as our words, teach and lead all with whom we come in contact to do the same, and the world will hav no more use for obscene literature. Let us battle ever for right, justice, and liberty; but let us do it in a manly way. Yours for liberty and truth, F. F. Follet.

Boyle Station, Kan., Oct. 18, 1878.

Mr. D. M. Bennett,, My Dear Friend: As I hav stated once before this, I scatter my dear T. S. all over, far and wide, to some people when I know their address, old acquaintances, and strangers, in hope to gain subscribers for our glorious T. S. It only needs to get acquainted with that bold and fearless paper, if the eyes are not shut with superstition and bigotry, to at once subscribe for it. With more than satisfaction I noticed that, by reading the friendly correspondence, you received two new subscribers during the last two months, to whom I hav sent a bunch of Truth Seekers occasionally. They felt, probably, they would like to hav it come regular every week. Now, dear brother Bennett, I am so happy to add one more subscriber to your list; it is only for three months, but who can read the T. S. three months and then cease? And I also hav the promise for one more for three months in a short time. I wish to be so happy as to add as many as one hundred to your list, and will do all I can to circulate your paper and increase your list of subscribers.

Go on, brother Bennett, in the course you hav taken against priestcraft and superstition. The Liberals should aid you to the best of their ability against that mighty power—Church—and their bloodhound—Comstock. We ought not to expect our leader or leaders to fight our battles against our enemies and let us stand back and look on quietly without moving our hands or purse to aid them. With my best wishes for your future success and triumphant victory for the right and truth, I remain sincerely yours,

Susan Reichester.

Hannibal, Mo , Oct. 7. 1878.

Dear Mr. Bennett: Please find inclosed $1.35, sixty cents of which is for The Truth Seeker and pocket dictionary, subscription to continue until the 1st of January, 1879, and to be addressed to Mr. A. E. Tribue, this city; the remainder (seventy-five cents) credit to my account as an earnest of my appreciation of your very valuable paper, Mr. Van Buskirk to the contrary, notwithstanding; and instead of severing our friendly relations because of your courtesy to Miss Tilton and the appeal to Liberals at large to respond financially in defense of those who hav been wrongfully attacked in the matter of personal convictions, which are as dear to them as are those of other individuals, why we lament our inability to giv you sufficient pecuniary aid to carry the Watkins difficulty to a successful issue, in the absence of which be assured of the kindest regards of your many friends in this locality—friends who stand ever ready to aid and encourage the battle-scarred veterans who are struggling to erect for us the beautiful temple of science—a temple at whose shrine we can worship Truth, divested of supernatural pretensions, and within whose corriders we can raise our anthems in praise of a god of nature, and a religion which has for its aim the good of humanity. Yes, friend Bennett, go on, and may you come out doubly victorious.

Since I last wrote you, a few gentlemen of Liberal tendencies hav succeeded in organizing a society here, the constitution of which cannot but prove acceptable to the most fastidious in the matter of ethics. The bond of organization excludes from membership those who are loose in habits and morals, and has in view the diffusion of Liberal sentiment in this community. Mr. B. F. Underwood is to lecture in its interests on the 12th, 13th, and 14th of next month, the entire net proceeds of the course to be donated to the city for the benefit of the poor. We are confident that the commodious hall in which Mr. Underwood will lecture will be filled with the most intelligent and attentive audience that has ever greeted any lecturer in this city. Mr. W. D. Waller, manager of Mozart Hall, has engaged Mr. R. Ingersoll to lecture here also sometime during the season, which will indeed be an intellectual feast to us, but "a rock of offense" to our Christian opponents, who are all sanctified, and hence very orthodox in sentiment.

The discussion elicited by the publication of "A Week with the Ghosts," has been the reverse of fair to Mr. Jenkins, who is known here as a gentleman of broad culture and Liberal views. Mr. Jenkins' honesty in reference to the Mott business cannot be impeached, although he may be in error, as it is fair to presume he is, from the statement of Mr. Potter, Dr. A. R. Ayers, and others who hav attended the Mott seances. But that Mr. Jamieson should resort to such ungentlemanly language as is evinced in his article of the 5th inst in order to bring Mr. Jenkins into ridicule, is entirely out of place and not legitimate in the discussion of subjects in which so much interest is centered as this of Spiritualism and spirit manifestation. It is to be hoped Mr. Jenkins will be accorded "fair play" in the columns of The Truth Seeker, as he has many friends here, outside the ranks of Spiritualists, who desire his thorough vindication in this matter. Yours, A. R. C.

Carthage, Mo., Oct. 18, 1878.

D. M. Bennett, Dear Brother: Inclosed herewith find New York exchange for $6 25, and the names of five trial subscribers. Credit E. Budlong on National Defense Fund $2.00. This club of five is my third club to the noble paper. Although not large, yet if every subscriber would assist as much, the cause of Liberalism would be promoted. On the 4th and 5th inst. Prof. W. F. Jamieson gave us two lectures at this place and organized a Liberal League of thirty-five members. He is a powerful speaker and logical reasoner; and I would recommend him to any society or locality desirous of having the "turbid pool of orthodoxy" stirred to the very bottom, as a man eminently qualified. I think I will send you an ther club soon; your paper is giving general satisfaction. The nearest at complaint I have heard is the wish of many that there was an end to the "family quarrel" among Liberals, and that the best thoughts and writings of our editors and writers for the press were directed toward the common enemy. However, Brother Bennett, "hew to the line."

Tack my name to that Declaration of Rights. I indorse the Declaration after having read the "Yokes." The Bible abridged came to hand. What a gem!

Your sincere friend, Eber Budlong.

Columbus, O., Oct. 21, 1878.

Friend Bennett: Last Saturday night closed the six days' debate between A. W. Dean, a Campbellite minister of Nelsonville, O , and myself. The debate was held in the church in which Mr. Dean ministers the bread of life to the starving souls of his people. Of the merits of the debate I shall leave others to speak; and yet there were some features of it which I may with propriety sketch. In the first place, Nelsonville is a small town; and in the next place, the church was small in which we held the discussion; and in the last place, A. W. Dean is a third-rate minister and a fourth-rate man. He labored under the impression that loud, violent, and abusive talk would be a sufficient answer to arguments, logic, facts, and science. From the fact that the Freethinkers are few in this place, and that the church was usually well-nigh filled up with his own people, he found opportunity for his personalities and indecencies. He went so far one evening as to say that he would not hesitate to read any passage in the Bible before that audience. The next evening, alluding to this statement, I said that I supposed he did not mean literally what he said, but that if he did, I held in my hands a slip of paper with three Bible passages marked. He immediately got up and stepped towards me to take the paper, which I held in my hand. I withdrew it, and said, "But will you read the passages if I giv you the paper?" "Certainly I will," he replied; and I handed him the paper, with these references: 1 Kings xiv, 10; Job xl, 16, 17; Ezekiel iv, 12–15. He read the first and third, but said he would not read the second. Before reading these obscenities he offered a few solemn explanations to show that it was perfectly proper for him to read them. Such was the character of the man of God whom I met in debate at Nelsonville. It would not be worth my while, or the space in your valuable paper, to further describe this champion of obscene literature. He uttered, in the course of the six nights' debate, erroneous statements enough to fill several columns of The Truth Seeker.

One thing is certain, namely: the cause of Freethought has taken root here and is growing rapidly. Last June I gave two lectures here, which were the first ever given in the place, and since then there has been a great deal of discussion upon Liberal questions. Mr. Thos. Berry has been the active Freethinker in this town to open fire upon the saints. They hav not failed to show their hate towards him; but, like a true Liberal, he was not to be intimidated by threats or slandering sermons, but has kept straight along for the past four years advocating mental freedom, common sense, and the necessity of attending to one world at a time. Besides Mr. Berry, there are now several other strong liberal-minded men joining with him to push along the cause of Freethought. Nelsonville is destined to be a station on the great route of progressive thought in this country. I go to-day to Williamsburg, Ind.

D. M. Bennett, Dear Sir: It is with pleasure that I call the attention of your readers to the fact that John Tyerman, from Australia, is passing from West to East, speaking where he may be wanted. He is a man fearless in the cause of truth, cultured, logical, and eloquent in his lectures. I hope the friends everywhere may try and keep him busy.

Yours truly, A. B. Spring.

Irwin's Station, Pa., Sept. 6, 1878.

D. M. Bennett, Dear Sir: I am sorry to learn of your arrest at the Convention at Watkins by the devotees of an antiquated superstition. Hope you may be successful in escaping from the foul clutches of the inquisitors of this, the afternoon of the nineteenth century. It is high time the Liberals of America should awake to the importance of united action, and band together for self-protection and mutual defense, in order that the "hydra-headed monster" of superstition may not succeed in grinding us into the dust.

You may add my name to your defense list for $10 00, which you can hav when wanted by making draft on me for the amount. Hoping the time is not far distant when the expression of honest opinion, either written or oral, will not be held to be criminal, I am,

Respectfully, Wm. Crookston.

D. M. Bennett, Dear Sir: Inclosed please find $1.20 for two trial subscribers, one for The Truth Seeker (till January, '79) and a Dictionary, the other for The Truth Seeker and "The Age of Reason."

Would you be kind enough to publish a reasonable question in your paper for some professed Spiritualist to answer? I asked the same some time ago in a Spiritualistic paper, but received no reply. The question is: How can that which has neither form, size, nor locality, in other words, how can spirituality, which, according to our definition of spirit, is intangible, invisible, immortal, universal, and omnipresent, as the word is usually defined—how can that assume tangibility, visibility, locality, etc., the latter being clearly properties of matter, as I think, universally recognized? I read and hear a great deal about "wonderful spirit manifestations," "glorious news from the spirit land," "materialization of spirits," etc., etc. Now, there would be no one happier than myself could I hav the assurance that our present is but a "caterpillar existence," and that the chrysalis life of perpetual and pure enjoyment is yet to come. Of the many Spiritualists is there no one who has compassion enough to lift one poor mortal out of "darkness visible?" If there is, I shall feel forever grateful.

The orthodox doctrines of popular theology I find unsatisfactory, because I hav never yet been able to establish their fundamental points to my satisfaction. For instance, for years I hav seen people going into ecstasies about the triune glory of God "the Father," God "the Son," and God "the Holy Ghost," the three being one and "one in three;" yet, owing, I suppose, to my defective training in mathematics, I hav never succeeded in adding the three together, and find the sum total only one. Will not some great mathematician explain? Again, if such a paradox were possible, is it possible that the three above referred to, or any other "spirit," can exist by itself, which would imply a circumference, a limit, a boundery or periphery, hence locality, which is held by orthodox teachers, and, I believe, by most Spiritualists, as belonging to matter? Well, then, is there such a thing as an individual spirit located in the body of man, and hence in other animals, because similarly organized? Must not that "spirit," having a conscious after-existence, becoming at times visible, being capable of locomotion, must not that be some sort of matter?

Whether we can or can not get a solution to these problems, I hav the utmost hope and faith in the future terrestrial improvements, and think it is our duty to make the condition of the human race as much superior to the present, socially, politically, and morally, as the condition of the most enlightened is to the anthropoid ape; and if, when we hav done all we could do, when we hear no more about "political swindles," no more about "religious quarrels," no more about "social degradation," if there should still be a "bugbear beyond," in the name of all that is beautiful and good let us hav it.

I crave an answer from some kind reader (Spiritualist) to the above. Yours in truth, J. Müller, M.D.

Florence, Mo , Oct. 24, 1878.

D. M. Bennett, Dear Sir: I am happy to inform you that, through the kindness of my brother, I am at last able to send you some money to pay for the dear old Truth Seeker. I expect that you had about come to the conclusion that I was the "weakest man." I am a thousand times obliged to you for your kindness and patience with me. Hope you will deal as patiently in the future as you hav in the past, and never let The Truth Seeker fail, and if I should despair of ever being able to pay you, I will write you at once, as I do not wish to read your valuable paper without paying for it. Would like to express my admiration and appreciation of all your regular contributors—would like to speak a word of praise for every one; but I know that your time is too valuable to spend in reading such things. Would also express my sympathy for you and other Freethinkers who are persecuted for opinion's sake, but, alas! I hav no money or material sympathy, and empty wishes can do but little good. Inclosed find money order for $3 00, for which please send the following books, the balance to apply on my subscription. . . .

Yours for truth and liberty, James P. Richardson.

Can Obscenity be Defined?

New York, Oct. 28, 1878.

Friend Bennett: While attending the last Congress of our National Liberal League, I was greatly pained to witness a disruption, to some extent, on the subject of obscenity, and astonished that there seemed to be an unwillingness or inability to define the term. In fact, none seemed willing to try to define it. During the able discussions, and while listening to the essays, I learned that the highest authorities had failed to define the term. It struck me that obscenity consisted of an act or in certain acts, and as every other act has fitting and decent language to define it, so must this. I reduced my conception of its definition to writing, and submitted it to some of the distinguished members of the League, who approved it and advised its publication in The Truth Seeker, which will giv the Liberals of the country a chance to amend, improve, or change it as their superior wisdom may guide them, and at last giv us a definition that can be passed into a law that all true Liberals will support and enforce cheerfully. My aim has been to embody ideas in language which will make the meaning plain to the intelligence of a child, and yet not shock the modesty of the most delicate or refined. I respectfully solicit the earnest attention of Liberals to the matter, and their co-operation through The Truth Seeker that we may hav an early solution of the obscenity question by a proper and intelligent definition which we can unite on and hav framed into a just and needed law. Respectfully, Daniel E. Ryan.

THE DEFINITION.

The term obscenity can be defined only by its application to the male and female sexual organs of humanity, and the lower animals, and when they are shown in connection with each other or separately by print or other picture, model, sculpture, or carving, or described or related of in their separate or connected functions by a written or printed document or book, and in such a manner that it is their intent and purpose absolutely self-evident to debase the mind by appeals to the mere animal instinct of sexual commerce.

The Men who Went to Watkins.

BEFORE THE CONVENTION.

I've read the SEEKER now two years.
On its fair pages TRUTH appears.
The fight you're in belongs to others—
To all true-hearted Liberal brothers.
Pray giv no quarter, neither take,
Till truth and justice win the stake;
For we will pledge you our last dollar—
Where truth doth lead we're bound to follow.

Publish the tidings to all men:
The thousands now at Watkins Glen
Are heroes that will never kneel
To priestly power or bigots' steel;
Who've long and bravely fought for truth
In older age, as well as youth;
Then honor to these noble men
Gathering now at Watkins Glen.

May no uncertain sound be made
To echo in its peaceful shade.
We would not hav that lovely glen
Giv shade to aught but noble men,
Who battle for all human rights,
In love and mercy take delight,
Protect the weak against the strong,
And shield the innocent from wrong.

AFTER THE CONVENTION.

Such men as these to Watkins went,
On truth and liberty intent—
Men who were noble, true, and brave,
Our rights and liberties to save.
Alas! our souls are filled with pain—
We can but blush with very shame.
Within her prison walls be thrown,
And call this government our own.

That dares with coward arms to strike
Fair woman seeking her own right,
And honest men in duty's path,
Should surely raise a nation's wrath.
Proud freemen of this nation, rise,
And take great Tony by surprise;
This little breeze that dusts the town
Proves Tony has been sneaking round.

Shall we as cowards stand and see—
While proudly thinking we are free—
All of our dearest rights assailed,
And brothers, sisters, march to jail?
No, never! while the tongue can tell,
We laugh to scorn the Christians' hell;
While reason guides the mind aright
We defy them and their God to strike.

—JOB WHITEHEAD.

Men who Consult Spirits.

"Do you mean to say that George W. McCrary, the Secretary of War, has consulted mediums to obtain spiritual communications?"

This question was put by a Sun reporter to Dr. J. V. Mansfield of 61 West Forty-second street, who testified in the Vanderbilt will case as to alleged communications from the spirit world which he had obtained through a course of years for the Commodore.

"Certainly," answered Dr. Mansfield, "Mr. McCrary makes no secret of his visits. You would be surprised if I should tell you of the names of persons who hav consulted me in the twenty-nine years that I hav been a writing medium."

"Hav you any objection to naming a few of them?"

"None whatever; here are the books containing my records. There are the Lincolns. Mrs. Lincoln has been often to see me, and has received many messages from her husband. James Gordon Bennett, the elder, used to come, and his wife, Mrs. Henrietta Bennett, was a firm believer, She was here many times. Ex-Gov. N. P. Talmage of Wisconsin was a frequent visitor. John W. Edmonds used to get more satisfactory communications through me than through any other medium. I hav also given communications from the spirit world to Ben Wade, Joshua R. Giddings, and Vice-President Wilson."

"Was Mr. Wilson a believer?"

"Yes, sir; they found one of my communications in his pocket when he died."

"Hav you any strong-headed, practical business man on your list?"

"Oh, yes! There was Alvin Adams, the well-known member of the stock company that is known as Adams Express Company. Judge Silas M. Stilwell is another man. E. B. Ward, the Detroit millionaire, and the Rev. Thomas K. Beecher."

"Any scientists?"

"Prof. Agassiz frequently came here."

"Do you mean to say that Prof. Agassiz came as a believer?"

"Well, he used to come here to investigate. I used to tell him he was like Boston new rum—about half and half. He used to come with Prof. C. C. Felton. Prof. Bush used to come, too—the Professor of Hebrew in the New York University."

"More of the living persons of note would make interesting reading."

"Yes; but people hav a delicacy about having these matters brought up for public ridicule. You may put down Joe Jefferson as a firm believer, and a most enthusiastic one. There is no mistake about that. Then there are Grace Greenwood and Don Piatt, Elder Evans of the Shakers, and Antoinette Doolittle."

"Can you name any rich Spiritualist in New York?"

"Yes; there is Dr. Henry J. Newton, who is said to be worth a million dollars. He is President of the Eclectic Medical College."

"Any other names of your visitors?"

"Here is that of John Pierrepont, the poet, Robert Dale Owen, Theodore Parker, Gerrit Smith, William Coleman of London, Charles Sumner, Charlotte Cushman, the actress, Judge Carter of Ohio, Bishop Doane, J. C. Le Grand, Chief Justice of Maryland, Dr. Napoleon B. Wolfe of Cincinnati, Freeman, the artist and painter of the Royal family, the Rev. Dr. Thos. E. Bond, Glendy Burke of New Orleans, Prof. Mapes, and John Brown."

"Of Ossawattamie?"

"Yes, sir; the martyr, John Brown. He came to see me a few days only before he went South."

"Any others?"

"Yes. Judge Alexander M. Cassidy of Colorado, Judge H. E. Parsons of Ashtabula."

"You did not mention any of these names on the witness stand?"

"No; they did not giv me a chance; but I would hav done so, and I would giv them a communication from the spirit world if they should ask me again. I feel that I could do it on the witness stand, although it is very difficult to do it when there are so many rowdies around making a disturbance."

"How many Spiritualists are there in the word?"

"About 43,000,000."

"Do you know any case but that of the Commodore's in which the question of Spiritualism has been raised?"

"Oh, yes; there was the very recent case of E. B. Ward of Detroit, who married a second wife, and left a fortune of $6,000,000, mainly to her, and cutting off the poor children with only a paltry $100,000 or so apiece. He was always a pronounced Spiritualist, and the children tried to take advantage of that fact to break the will, but they failed. My own father gave most of his property to one son and Judge Edmonds left most of his to one daughter, but both wills were not attacked on the ground that they were made under spiritual influence."

Dr. Mansfield then volunteered a test of his powers, and undertook to get an answer from the spirit world to any question addressed to a dead person known to the inquirer—that is, he would give whatever answer the spirits directed without seeing the question. The first question was as follows:

TO MY MOTHER—Mrs. [correct name]: Please give me the name of my dead child.
Signed [Correct name.]

The answer produced, as the Doctor said, from the spirit world, was as follows:

MY DEAR SON: Thank you for this notice. I hav long desired to speak with you, but the way was not opened for me to do so. Your darling is safe, and will speak with you, would you allow it to do so! It will be far better for it to giv than for me to do so. My son, we do exist conscious individually and under proper conditions talk with mortals as I now talk with you.
[Correct signature.]

The reporter objected that the spirit had not answered the question or even given the sex of the child.

It is a melancholy and mortifying consideration that the most uncompromising spirit of intolerance—the spirit of the Inquisition at home, and of the Crusades abroad—should hav emanated from a religion which preached peace on earth and good will towards men.—Prescott.

The service of the table of the Inca was gold and silver plate. His dress, which he often changed, was composed of the wool of the vicuna wrought into mantles so fine it had the appearance of silk. He sometimes exchanged these for a robe made of the skins of bats as soft and sleek as velvet. No garment or utensil that had once belonged to the Inca could ever be used by another.—Prescott.

The Inca requested a Spanish soldier to write the name of God on his nail, and this he showed to several of his guests, and as each read and pronounced the same word, the sagacious mind of the barbarian was delighted with the seeming miracle. On showing the writing to Pizarro, that chief remained silent, and the Inca finding he could not read conceived a contempt for the commander, who was less informed than the soldiers.—Prescott.

CHRONIC DISEASES,

Embracing those of the Blood and Nerves, the Diseases of Men, the Diseases of Women, and the various causes, physical and social, leading to them, are plainly treated by that plainest of books, PLAIN HOME TALK, EMBRACING MEDICAL COMMON SENSE—nearly 1,000 pages, 200 illustrations—by DR. E. B. FOOTE, of 120 LEXINGTON AVE., NEW YORK, to whom all letters from the sick should be addressed. In its issue for January 19, 1878, Mr. Bennett's TRUTH SEEKER thus speaks of DR. FOOTE and his medical publications: "We know him (Dr. Foote) personally and intimately, and we say, with all the assurance that knowledge imparts, that he is a man of the highest incentives and motives, whose life has been spent in instructing and improving his fellow-beings by giving such information as is well calculated to enable them to be more healthy, more happy, and to be better and more useful men and women. His medical works possess the highest value, and have been introduced and thoroughly read in hundreds of thousands of families, who, to-day, stand ready to bear willing testimony to the great benefit they have derived from the physiological, hygienic, and moral lessons which he has so ably imparted."

Purchasers of PLAIN HOME TALK ARE AT LIBERTY TO CONSULT ITS AUTHOR IN PERSON OR BY MAIL, FREE. Price of the new Popular Edition, by mail, postage prepaid, only $1.50. Contents table free. AGENTS WANTED. MURRAY HILL PUBLISHING COMPANY, 129 East 28th Street, New York. tol

BY KERSEY GRAVES,

Author of "The Biography of Satan," and "The Bible of Bibles" (comprising a description of twenty bibles).

This wonderful and exhaustive volume by Mr. Graves will, we are certain, take high rank as a book of reference in the field which he has chosen for it. The amount of mental labor necessary to collate and compile the varied information contained in it must have been severe and arduous indeed, and now that it is in such convenient shape the student of freethought will not willingly allow it to go out of print. But the book is by no means a mere collation of views or statistics; throughout its entire course the author—as will be seen by his title-page and chapter-heads—follows a definite line of research and argument to the close, and his conclusions go, like sure arrows, to the mark.

Printed on fine white paper, large 12mo., 380 pages, $2. Address,

The Priest in Absolution,

The first Number of the "HOLY CROSS SERIES," is from the abridged London edition of the same work, which created so much excitement in England. The original volume was issued by the "High Church" authorities as a guide to the clergy in the confessional, and was designed to be introduced into the English Church. Price 25 cents.

Burns' Phonic Shorthand

FOR

Schools, Business Writing, and Reporting; arranged on the basis of Isaac Pitman's Phonography.

BY ELIZA BOARDMAN BURNS,

Teacher of Phonography and Phonetics at Cooper Union and N. Y. School of Phonography.

To facilitate the general introduction of Phonography into all businesses and professions, the author has, after twenty-five years' experience in teaching all the various "systems" in vogue, arranged a text-book which, though full and complete, is concise, free from superfluous verbiage, and of moderate size. The simplicity of arrangement in this work enables the student to pursue the study of Phonography with much more ease and certainty than any other text-book; while the writing which results from its use is as rapid as any, and far more legible than that derived from the instructions given in other phonographic works. Price, $1.00. Sold at this office.

Christianity and Infidelity

A JOINT DISCUSSION BETWEEN

REV. G. H. HUMPHREY, Presb't'n Clergyman

OF NEW YORK, AND

D. M. BENNETT, Editor of The Truth Seeker

It was conducted in the columns of The Truth Seeker, a letter alternately from each contestant appearing each week, beginning April 1, 1877, and closing Sept. 29, 1877, thus continuing just six months, giving thirteen letters from Humphrey and thirteen replies by Bennett.

The subjects discussed were as follows:

PART I.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to American Liberty.

PART II.—The relative services of Christianity and Infidelity to Learning and Science.

PART III.—Is there a stronger probability that the Bible is divine than that Infidelity is true?

The discussion has excited a large share of interest, both among believers and unbelievers: and as both sides are fairly presented, it is suited to readers of all shades of opinion.

The New York Advocate, a paper having a very extensive circulation, in speaking of the volume, says, "Perhaps a more able and exhaustive presentation of both sides of the great questions which have agitated the civilized world for centuries has never been made. At any rate, in this volume will be found a perfect magazine or storehouse of arguments, pro and con, which every intelligent man and woman should peruse with candor and with an earnest desire to arrive at sound conclusions on themes of the highest importance to all mankind. . . Light is what we need. Let the controversies proceed. Let the blows descend upon the error-dispelling anvil. Let the sparks fly in all directions from the heated steel. The truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, is what the people demand on all the great questions of the day, whether of Finance, Science, Politics, or Religion, and discussion will elicit it." Let every person who feels the slightest interest in theological questions, whether on one side or the other, read the Humphrey-Bennett Discussion."

AGENTS are informed that the best thing to sell to make money on, and also to benefit mankind, is this book. It explains and advocates the only harmless and practical means of avoiding the evils of celibacy, on the one hand, and of overburdened parentage on the other. It advocates more and earlier marriages, and increase of family only when health and pecuniary means will permit, but it most efficiently opposes abortion, prostitution, and all undesired and inconsiderate procreation. It contains the latest medical researches and results of science. The medical directions are easy, plain, explicit, though chaste and delicate. No married couple should be without it.

THE

Creed of Christendom;

Its Foundation Contrasted with its Superstructure.

BY W. R. GREG,

Author of "Enigmas of Life," "Literary and Social Judgments," &c.

One vol. Crown, 8vo., with Complete Index. Cloth, $1.50.

"Some twelve years ago, in a London drawing-room, one of our most eminent men of science said: 'Why do not the bishops answer Mr. Greg's Creed of Christendom? They are bound to answer it—if they can.' In the lifetime of the present generation the earliest work at all similar was that of Mr. Charles Hennell, which, in various respects, had great merit; but Mr. Greg, coming later, had the advantage of access to many able German researches, and his work continues the most complete on all sides; to it one may most confidently appeal when assailed by eager Christians with the current commonplaces of their warfare. Since bishops, deans, learned canons, and academic divines do not reply formally to so thorough, clear, and learned a treatise, which has been so long before the public, we have the best of proof attainable that this historical argument—occupying precisely the ground which English academicians have chosen as their own—is unanswerable" (F. W. Newman, on "The New Christology," in Fortnightly Review).

THE BOOK OF THE GENERATION OF JESUS.

WITH PREFACE AND NOTES BY SCHOLASTICUS.

First English Translation

Of the ancient Jewish story of Jesus, who was born at Bethlehem about 100 B. C., being the son of a betrothed maiden named Miriam (Mary) by Joseph Pandera. By the power of a charm stolen from the Holy of Holies he cured lepers, raised the dead, and wrought other miracles. Wherefore he was arrested by the elders of Jerusalem, scourged, crowned with thorns, and by order of the Sanhedrin stoned to death and hanged on the day before the Passover and the Sabbath, in the reign of Queen Alexandra, about the year 75 B. C.

Death of Simon Kepha on a tower in the city of the Nazarines about 30 B. C. How and why the Romans changed "Kepha" to "Petros."

Startling evidence that Paul flourished before the middle of the first century B. C., contemporary with the aforesaid Kepha.

Dead counselors are likewise most instructive, because they are heard with patience and reverence.—Johnson.

ONE man has kindness deep within him; and when the occasion comes, the rind or shell is cracked, and the kernel is found. Such a man's heart, too long clouded, like a sun in a storm-muffled day, shoots through some opening rift, and glows for a period in glory. But there are other natures that are always cloudless. With them, a cloud is the exception, shining is the rule.—Beecher.

THE forced plainness of old Puritanism was an application of spiritual lunar caustic to all who came under its influence that seared, seamed, scabbed, scarred, and soured the fine sensitive face of human nature so deeply that in Scotland, where it was most violent, men, women, and children are smarting under it yet, and will not show the clear, bright, beautiful features that nature intended should adorn the human race for generations to come.—Charles Ellis.

WHOEVER does a noble deed, or gives utterance to a noble thought, raises, elevates, and refines humanity. By associating with the good and pure, we invariably grow better and purer ourselves. By cultivating the beautiful and the artistic, we create tidal waves of the æsthetic which will flow from our own little world into the worlds of those around and about us. To give the lovely and the true from the storehouse of our selfhood adds to the treasures of our neighbor, and yet lessens not our own.—Mrs. E. D. Slenker.

Odds and Ends.

MONEY syllables—I O U.

BACKGAMMON—Her bustle.

SLOW matches—Long engagements.

UNEASY lies the head that wears a wig.

WHEN does one rod make an acher? When applied to an urchin.

LEGEND of a Northampton business office: "To owe is human—to pay up divine!"

"ROOMS to let to a few gentlemen with gas," is the way a householder worded his advertisement.

WHEN a girl gets mad and rises from a fellow's knee, but thinks better of it and goes back again that's what they call a relapse.

"You are as pretty as a picture" is no longer the correct compliment to pay to a lady. Simply say, "You remind me of a chromo."

SHE asked him if her new dress wasn't as sweet as a spring rose, and the brute said it was, even to the minor attraction of having a little due on it.

MR. EDWARD ROSEWATER, editor of the Omaha Bee, was brutally assaulted by a rough in that town this week. The rough felt bad because the Bee stung him.

THE Rev. Jeremiah Hallock once said to a young minister who complained of his small salary, "My young brother, perhaps it is all Christ can afford to giv you."

AS a frightened darkey, chased by an infuriated bull, neared the boundaries of the field, he enthusiastically exclaimed, "Millions for de fence, but not one cent for de brute!"

THAT was an unfortunate, fatal song they started some years ago. "Tramp, tramp, tramp, the boys are marching," they sang, and there has been no end of tramps ever since.

THE following is rather equivocal: "Maria Brown, wife of Timothy Brown, aged eighty years. She lived with her husband fifty years, and died in the confident hope of a better life.'

WHICH are the lightest men—Irishmen, Scotchmen, or Englishmen? In Ireland there are men of Cork; in Scotland there are men of Ayr; but on the Thames there are lighter men.

OLD Deacon Pilkins said to himself: "Falstaff asks, 'What's honor?' as though it was hard to tell. But let my wife sit behind another woman in church, and she'll tell what's on her in less than two minutes."

A BASHFUL young man applied to his village paper for information on the important subject, "How to win a woman's love." The reply was, "Kiss the babies, caress the tomcat, and pay strict attention to the old lady."

Two passengers were conversing in a railway carriage about music. One gentleman asked the other, who appeared rather simple, "Do you know the Barber of Seville?" "No," replied the latter, "I always shave myself."

AN appreciative mind can throw a world of pathos into a very ordinary statement. "Yes," said she, leaning over a fence in communion with a neigbor, "she is dead. She died just as she had got torn up to clean house. It is terrible."

"I SHOULDN'T think there would be such a word as 'breakfast,'" remarked a young linguist to his mother, the other morning.

"Why not, dear?" she asked.

"Because, ma," replied the boy, "it ain't natural. Things never break fast; they break loose."

There was a sad bewilderment of expression in the face of the mother as she gazed speechlessly upon her precious son.

THE NEW PARTY CANDIDATE.

"Father, who travels the road so late?"
"Hush, my child, 'tis the candidate.
Fit example of human woes—
Early he comes and late he goes;
He greets the women with courtly grace,
He kisses the baby's dirty face,
He calls to the fence the farmer at work,
He bores the merchant, he bores the clerk.
The blacksmith, while his anvil rings,
He greets, and this is the song he sings:

"'Howdy, howdy, howdy do?
How is your wife, and how are you?
Ah! it fits my fist as no other can,
The horny hand of the workingman.'"

"Husband, who is that man at the gate?"
"Hush, my love! 'tis the candidate."
"Husband, why can't he work like you?
Has he got nothing at home to do?"
"My dear, whenever a man is down,
No cash at home, no money in town,
Too stupid to preach, too proud to beg,
Too timid to rob, too lazy to dig,
Then ov r hi horse his legs he flings,
And to the dear people this song he sings:

"'Howdy, howdy, howdy do?
How is your wife, and how are you?
Ah! it fits my fist as no other can,
The horny hand of the workingman.'"

Brothers who labor early and late,
Ask these things of the candidate:
What's his record? How does he stand
At home? No matter about his hand.
Be it hard or soft, so it be prone
To close over money not his own.
Has he in view no thieving plan?
Is he honest or capable?—is he our man?
Cheer such a one till the welkin rings,
Join in the chorus when thus he sings:

"Howdy, howdy, howdy do?
How is your wife, and how are you?
Ah! it fits my fist as no other can,
The horny hand of the workingman."

THE TRUTHSEEKER

Vol. 5. No. 45. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT.} New York, Saturday, November 9, 1878. {SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY.} $3 per Year

Notes and Clippings.

In a population of 40,000, Rutland county, Vt., averages thirty divorces annually.

The recent inundations of the Nile destroyed 250 human beings and $2,500,000 in property.

There are 30,258 post-offices in the Union, 1,913 having been added in the course of the present year.

Many of the vessels arriving at this port since the recent great storm bring survivors of the crews of wrecked vessels.

Albert Beale, who stole $3,000 while acting as tax collector in Hingham, Mass., was superintendent of a Methodist Sunday-school.

The Prophetic Conference of Pre-Millinnarians has just closed. It is settled that Christ will come again, if the Bible is true, but the date of his arrival is not fixed.

Maynooth College, the principal priest-packing establishment in Ireland, has been partly destroyed by fire. The prayers and purses of the faithful and foolish are requested for its re-erection.

The prohibitory liquor law has gone into operation in New Haven, and moderate drinkers are compelled by law to become liars, hypocrites, or law-breakers in order to get their matutinal cocktails.

The President has appointed the 28th of this month a day of thanksgiving and prayer, a national fast or farce day, a day of guzzling and gormandizing, to show our gratitude to the Almighty for the season of hard times, disaster, and yellow fever we hav been enjoying—a national licking of the hand that smote us.

Some chap predicts that in the course of two or three generations American women will be taller than the men. And many believe him. If men continue to grow "short" at the rate they hav done during the past several panicy years, the women will hav to wear magnifying glasses to recognize their male friends.

The Rev. W. T. Ellis preached a sermon in the West Woodstock (Conn.) Congregational church on some particular sins of the people. One of the alleged sinners, a member of the church, confronted the pastor as he went out of the house, and crushed his hat down over his eyes. Then followed a rough-and-tumble fight.

Susan Goff's Will.—The shortest will ever presented in the Surrogate's Court in Brooklyn was the following: "I giv all to my children, and after they die it will go to my husband. Susan Goff. A. V. Brush. A. A. Powe.. nesses." This will was declared void because it entailed property for more than two lives in being, there being three children alive at the testatrix's death.

Great droughts, like that which has raged over India and China this year, produce a sort of disease among the inland fishes, and they die by millions. Nor will any but the most intelligent and enterprising of the Hindoos gather the carcasses with which to fertilize their fields, and thus the vast and valuable deposits of phosphate manure along hundreds of miles of river banks are wasted.

A female elephant in the Philadelphia Zoological Garden was greatly frightened by the recent gale, and when she cut one of her feet on the glass of a broken window her terror was complete. She sat on her haunches, held up her wounded foot, and bellowed loud and long. When the keeper entered, her male companion had his trunk wound round the foot, as though trying to comfort her.

It is a pretty serious fact that in this city of New York there are to-day 20,532 grown-up boys and women who can neither read nor write. It is a still more serious fact that, while a percentage of favored lads and misses are getting a smattering of the "higher English branches" at the expense of the whole body of taxpayers, thousands of little ones are to-day growing up in ignorance because there is no room for them in the public schools. This must be amended. —N. Y. Sun.

A chemist, Charles Elkin, writes to the London Times calling attention to some injurious dyes now in use. He refers to the fashionable green and bronze, the former used chiefly for gloves, and the bronze for artificial flowers for bonnets, both obtained from aniline dyes. These colors, he says, hav, in several cases brought to his notice, caused troublesome eruptions either on the head or the hands, as the case may be, from wearing a bonnet or gloves.

According to the last report to the Minister of Public Instruction, there are twenty-one public libraries in Paris, open to all. Many, however, are devoted to specialties, and not of great size. The largest is the National, with over 500,000 volumes; the Louvre has 100,000; Mazarine, 160,000; Saint Genevive, 170,000, and Sorbonne 125,000. Hospitals and similar institutions have lately begun accumulating libraries for the use of the inmates, bringing the total number of books for public reading in Paris up to 1,500,000 volumes, while elsewhere in France the public libraries aggregate about 4,000,000 volumes.

Our Exports and Imports.—The monthly statement of the Bureau of Statistics shows that the excess of exports over imports of merchandise for the month ending Sept. 30, was $20,525,267, and for the nine months ending Sept. 30, $209,130,487. The excess of imports over exports of gold and silver (coin and bullion) for the month ending Sept. 30, was $923,708. The excess of exports over imports of gold and silver (coin and bullion) during the nine months ending Sept. 30, 1877, amounted to $24,706,780, but the excess of imports over exports of gold and silver (coin and bullion) during the nine months ending Sept. 30, 1878, amounted to $321,960.

And now the Jews of New Haven come forward to say that they would like to be consulted in regard to the liturgy to be used in the public schools. The Rev. Dr. Kleeberg, the Jewish rabbi, avers that it is unjust to attempt to formulate any worship for the tax-supported schools to which all parties are not agreed. The Jews of New Haven, he adds, hav three hundred children in the public schools, and mean to present their view of the prayer question to the Board of Education, although they do not fear that anything in the manual which may be adopted will hav a proselyting effect upon their offspring. So far the attempt to frame a style of prayer that will satisfy even Christians of all sorts seems to be a sad failure, and now that the Jews claim a hearing the prospect of harmonious arrangement is more distant than ever.

A conference of clergymen has recently been held in this city to diligently compare notes and prophecies, and determine when and how Christ is to make his second appearance in the world. Could they settle with certainty whether he made his first appearance it would seem to be quite as much to the point, for unfortunately there is a doubt hanging over that matter that would be well to hav removed. Should the worshipers of Mumbo Jumbo or of the Grand Lama of Thibet hold a grand convocation to discuss the probabilities and promises as to how their respective deities should next manifest themselves, it would perhaps be all correct and proper. Those who worship deities hav the right to discuss the next mode of appearance of the same. They, however, may ultimately all find out that their deities will fall them and not come according to the programme.

Parson Newman says: "The morality of the Church is radically defective. The Church is rich, and she is extravagant. The pleasures of the world are more to her than the joys of piety. Her love of gain is a byword. She stretches out her arms to grasp the islands of the sea, while the fires of devotion burn dimly on her altars. Many a church member, who often says, 'Lord, Lord,' would let a piece of property for a saloon where husband and father spend their time and money in drink, or for a gambling place where young men are ruined, because he can command thereby a higher rent." If this is so, it would seem hardly desirable for outsiders to join such an institution. Yet Dr. Newman is continually urging people, from the very same pulpit from which he delivered this unpleasant utterance, to renounce their sins and unite with the very church which he thus denounces. These church members who would rent their property for the objectionable purposes mentioned must be a hard lot, and it would be interesting to know if any of them are landlords of the places which Brother Talmage recently visited. If this should prove to be the case, their names ought to be added to the list of their patrons, for the public reading of which the frequenters of the Tabernacle are patiently waiting.

The Rev. William Impey, widely known as an experienced missionary, has resigned his connection with the Wesleyan Church of England because he cannot conscientiously accept its doctrine on actual hell and literal hell-fire. This doctrine is thus expressed in the catechism: "Hell is a dark and bottomless pit, full of fire and brimstone, in which the wicked will be punished forever and ever, by having their bodies tormented by the fire, and their souls by a sense of the wrath of God." Mr. Impey's name is struck from the roll without any recognition of his past services, which hav been very great. For forty years he has been in missionary service, the last twenty-five of which hav been spent as Superintendent of Missions in Grahamtown district, eastern Africa. A warm sympathy is felt for him by the Church at large. It ought not to hurt him in the estimation of any good person that he discards the horrible doctrine of infants, youth, middle-aged, and aged burning in hell forever. How a good man, who respects real goodness, can believe that a good being planned such a state of things is a puzzler indeed.

The sinners of Baltimore ought to be thankful that so many special efforts are being made for their salvation. At the Franklin-Street Methodist church the Widow Van Cott is stumping for Jesus. Mr. Harrison, the theologaster, who made such a stir at Dr. Lanahan's church in Washington, is drawing great crowds at Madison square. At Whatcoat church Mr. Purdy is holding revival meetings, and at Eastern Avenue Church Sisters Penny and Paxton are whooping it up on the Gospel. At Mount Vernon place, which is the fashionable Methodist hippodrome, Brother Moody has broken loose, and large crowds rush daily to witness his antics. Several Methodist churches report large numbers of conversions and collections, and more of the latter are earnestly solicited. With all these powerful influences operating, there should be a very poor show for the devil in the Monumental City. But probably the chief result will be to worm a good pile of dollars out of the pockets of the faithful for the enrichment of the evangelists aforesaid. There is where this religious excitement all ends. "Hand us your money, and we will pray for your souls."

"Hell and the Devil."—The only reason why the crazy preacher at the Brooklyn Tabernacle is worth noticing is that he influences a large number of irrational people who wait upon his discourses. Were he a reasonable human being, did he present exact data and eschew inflammable and senseless language, he would deserve gentler treatment at the hands of the press. If the Savior whom Mr. Talmage professes to follow were on earth at present, he would probably not spend any of his time in visiting iniquitous scenes in order to describe their perils to budding youth. The reason that Mr. Talmage can do so is because he is in receipt of a salary infinitely above what his merits deserve, and that he can thus afford to hire policemen to defend him, if need be, while he visits places of debauch. His statements during his recent sermons are the foolish representations of a man who knows nothing about what he is talking of. In regard to his sermon of October 27th, we confess we do not know what Mr. Talmage refers to when he speaks of the infamous books which women read for the sake of getting scientific information with respect to themselves. Every woman and every man has a right to such information. Nay, it is not merely a right, but a duty and obligation. The time of family physicians is too valuable to be spent in giving gratuitous information to married women. Anybody who claims that it is infamous for a woman to consult a scientific treatise in order to learn facts about her own constitution is simply an ass. Reasoning is lost upon him. As an offset to this, it is pleasant to know that society contains thousands of good, pure-minded women, who dance beautifully, dress exquisitely, and read everything which is calculated to make them better wives and mothers. Such intelligence as this is the glory of woman, and not her shame. She does infinitely better than if she constantly applied to a family physician, who is apt to be one of those fools named ladies' doctors. Meanwhile Mr. Talmage does not make men and women better. He merely amuses the many and makes the rest believe in an unnecessary hell and a superfluous devil.—Telegram.

The Election.—Thirty states cast their votes on the 5th for representatives to Congress. The Republicans elected their Governor in New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Michigan, Nebraska, Kansas, and Pennsylvania. Butler was defeated in Massachusetts by from 20,000 to 40,000. The Republicans also gained 14 congressmen. For the first time in six years New York has been carried by the Republicans. Tammany Hall in this city has experienced a complete overthrow—a cause for congratulation by all good citizens without regard to party. Edward Cooper, son of Hon. Peter Cooper, has been elected Mayor by 20,000 majority. The Greenbackers elected one assemblyman. In Connecticut no choice for Governor by the people, but the Legislature is Republican, and that party will probably triumph. In Vermont a Greenback-Republican was elected to Congress by 4,000 majority over his straight Republican opponent. Two congressmen were gained each in Pennsylvania and New Jersey. Ex-Secretary Robeson was elected in the latter state. Delaware chose a Democratic Governor and congressman. Alabama has probably returned a Greenbacker to Congress. The South is nearly solidly Democratic, but on the whole the Republicans hav made large gains.

"You have done miracles," said Myra, as Jennie finished her letter. "It takes preachers' children to convert believers in myths into believers in common sense realities; and now we will hear from Sue."

"You won't hear much, then," said the little woman thus appealed to. "You see, I tried to do too much, and didn't accomplish anything at all. Charlie gave me ten dollars, and I bought a lot of tracts, and stamps, and stationery, and sat down and wrote to six of my old school-girl companions and sent a package of tracts to each one. Well, three of them sent my letters and tracts back; two of them coldly answered that they would prefer not to correspond on religion, and said they had burned the tracts; and the other one said she was already an Infidel. By this time two months had gone by, then I began missionarying at home by calling on my neighbors and talking and reading to them, and struck up a correspondence with one or two, but accomplished nothing at all, save getting three subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER."

"Well, that is something," said Rose. "Every subscriber to that paper becomes a fountain from which start numerous streams of living light. You see, whoever reads it almost invariably learns to like it, and just as soon as he becomes imbued with its spirit he commences lending it, mailing off copies here and there, and, ere long, establishes minor fountains in various localities, which also send out streams in still other directions. I know this to be a fact from experience with our one copy. I can point out so many places where it has made little depots of light—little nucleuses from which emanate new Liberals and new truth lovers. You have done more than you think, Susie, by getting those three subscribers."

"It's your turn now, Edith," said Myra.

"Well," said Edith, "I found two good correspondents, both Campbellite preachers, and have sent them lots of tracts and papers, and wrote them four letters apiece, and received as many replies, but neither of them seems to be at all inclined to feel beaten in the argument. But I think I have greatly improved myself by the correspondence; for I have had to read, and hunt testimony, and combat arguments, and bestir myself considerable to keep the upper hand of them. Perhaps they would say I had not done it, anyhow; but I have read the letters of both, and my replies, to members of their church here, and all tell me I completely use them up, not that I claim any great merit for doing so, for, with truth on my side, it would be a signal disgrace not to have the best of the argument.

"As letter-reading has always been one of our pet amusements, as well as a means of much good information, I will read my last reply to Mr. Bush, as I happen to have it with me," and Edith drew a closely-written sheet from the envelope, and read as follows:

"FRIEND BUSH: As you object to being called Rev., I address you in Mrs. Darwin's kindly, familiar style—simply as 'friend.' And now, in answer to your question as to whether I believe Paul had an existence, I will say that I have no particular reason to doubt that there was a Paul who lived about the time the Bible Paul is said to have existed, and whose biography may be, in some respects, therein correctly written. But there is much that is unknown about him. It is not certain that he was a Roman citizen, nor is it certain that he was so unfriendly towards women, and all his life remained a cross-grained, sour old bachelor, without due personal cause or reasons. It is said that he only became a Christian because Gamaliel, whose disciple he was, refused him his daughter in marriage. The story of his ascension to the third heaven is very mythical; and as for 'dates,' the learned 'have searched in vain for the year and the day in which St. Paul assisted to stone St. Stephen and to guard the mantles of his executioners.' They also dispute the year in which he was thrown from his horse and saw that miraculous light at mid-day, and supposed he heard a 'celestial voice' exclaiming, 'Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?' Nor do they know the year of his death, or the 'date' of any of his letters, many of which have been thrown away as spurious. Though some good and wise sayings are attributed to 'this frothy-spouted Paul,' I was never one of his admirers, for he is rabid and uncharitable—the Bible pictures him as 'breathing threatenings and slaughter'—and his writings have done more to keep woman from being educated and prepared for her proper sphere than have all other hindrances for the last thousand years. He was hawk-nosed, bald-headed, crooked-legged, dumpy, and fat; but this was his misfortune, not his fault, though doubtless it was one cause that kept from him the love of woman and rendered him morose and cynical towards the sex which is ever an admirer of the beautiful, the great, and the noble. But then he was 'full of the grace of the Lord,' and that should have made them blind to all other defects. But it is not our sex alone that Paul depreciates, but he even attempts to lower Christ himself, calling him inferior even to the angels—'Thou madest him a little lower than the angels.' How do you adorers of Jesus like this—he whom you love better than your God to be thus placed beneath common angels? You who pretend he is equal with God himself? Paul also makes all true Christians to be 'children of God and joint heirs with Christ'—equal with him in heirship of all things and in all qualities. Nor do I believe the history that records of Paul the fact that after his head was struck off by the executioner it did, with a loud and distinct voice, utter forth, in Hebrew, the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, while, instead of blood, it was nought but a stream of pure milk that flowed from his veins, so that the milky wave flowed all over the executioner's arm.'

"In a church at Rome, not long since, and, for all I know, at this day, they show a place, called the 'Three Fountains,' as the identical spot where 'the milk spouted forth from his apostolic arteries, and where his head, after it had done speaking, took three jumps, to the honor of the Trinity, and at each spot on which it jumped there instantly sprung up a spring of living water, which retains at this day a plain and distinct taste of milk.' Yet these historical statements, pious and holy men solemnly assure us, are reliable and true. But, as I have before said, I prefer science to history, and science has never yet shown that a god can speak, a man be caught up to the third heaven, or even a first heaven, or that any man ever had his veins filled with milk, which did duty as blood.

"You inquire what imperfection I can mark in a real Christian. Please define what constitutes a 'real Christian,' and then I will judge of his perfection.

"'Why reject the Roman and Jewish history of Jesus?' is your next query. I ask, why reject the history of 'the man in the moon,' or the story of 'Pocahontas?' Are not both as well substantiated as this story of Jesus? Do we not often find mention in books of this wonderful man? though sometimes he is called a woman who was banished there for gathering a few sticks of wood on Sunday; and it is not very long since everybody believed in Pocahontas as the savior of Captain Smith.

"And now for your remarks upon Essenism. It is impossible to specify particularly what individual Christians were changed from Essenism to Christianity, as the two sects seem to have become merged into one another at the time when Christianity first became known as a sect, and Essenism disappeared forever at the same period. It is so long ago that little can be told of the particulars, but we do know that the tenets, ideas, principles, rites, and ceremonies of the two were so nearly similar that there is no dividing line. After throwing out the spurious passage in Josephus, we find no mention in all his works of Christians, yet he wrote about at the time when the doctrines of Christianity were first openly taught, and he surely would have mentioned them, when he was speaking of the other religions thereabout, had they then been known as Christians. But he does speak of the Essenes, and describes them precisely as you describe the first Christians; as being opposed to marriage, and living single lives, as Paul and Christ are said to have done; as despising riches; being communists; having no continued abiding place; giving to every one that had need, and (if he be a church member) saying grace before meat; being ministers of peace; taking no oaths, except when a new member is admitted, then 'he is obliged to take tremendous oaths, doctrinally.' They honored God and Moses, obeyed their elders, rested on the seventh day, even to making no fires, were abstemious in diet, simple in dress, prayed in secret, and had secret doctrines, which were taught only to the initiated.

"De Quincy says, 'If they were Christians without Christ, then Christianity was invented by man.'

"Philo Judeus was born at Alexandria about twenty years before the Christian era, and he, too, fails to mention the Christians, though he gives a long account of the Essenes in language similar to that of Josephus, making them to be Christians in belief and act, but not in name. Pliny also describes the Essenes; but as he died A. D. 79 he could not have spoken of real Christians when he did so, as he says 'they had subsisted through the lapse of centuries,' and, a century before him, Christ was not in existence, save as a third part of the Father.

"When we consider the low state of morals and the warlike disposition of the people at the time when Christianity first became known, and then read of the pure morality inculcated by the Christians as compared with the conduct of those surrounding them, is it not certain proof that they were only evoluted Essenes? Goodness, morality, and purity are of slow growth, and they cannot be jumped into at once like a new suit of clothes, but must be incorporated into the mentality by long continued endeavors. Therefore it is evident that the first Christians were not ignorant fishermen, as is pretended, but in reality Essenes and philosophers, moralists and thinkers, many of whose thoughts are far in advance of even this enlightened age and generation.

"'The gods,' says Xenophanes, 'did not from the first show to men all things; but in time, by searching, men came to a discovery of the better.' And that better, in my humble judgment, is real scientific knowledge. But perhaps, friend Bush, I am taking up too much of your valuable time by writing so long a letter, so I will abruptly close and subscribe myself Yours not in Christ, EDITH MAY."

The Doctrine of Filiation, or Descent-Theory.

BY PROF. ERNST HAECKEL.

The pedigree of the kingdom Protista is still enveloped in the greatest obscurity. The peculiar combination of animal and vegetable properties, the indifferent and uncertain character of their relations of forms and vital phenomena, together with a number of several very peculiar features which separate most of the subordinate classes sharply from the others, at present baffle every attempt distinctly to make out their blood relationships with one another, or with the lowest animals on the one hand, and with the lowest plants on the other hand. It is not improbable that the classes specified, and many other unknown classes of Protista, represent quite independent organic tribes, or phyla, each of which has independently developed from one, perhaps from various, Monera which have arisen by spontaneous generation. If we do not agree to this polyphyletic hypothesis of descent, and prefer the monophyletic hypothesis of the blood relationship of all organisms, we shall have to look upon the different classes of Protista as the lower small offshoots of the root, springing from the same simple Monera root, out of which arose the two mighty and many-branched pedigrees of the animal kingdom on the one hand, and of the vegetable kingdom on the other.

It will perhaps seem strange that I should place the remarkable Monera in the first class of the Protista kingdom, as I of course look upon them as the most ancient primary forms of all organisms without exception. Still, what are we otherwise to do with the still living Monera? We know nothing of their palæontological origin, we know nothing of any of their relations to lower animals or plants, and we know nothing of their possible capability of developing into higher organisms. The simple and homogeneous little lump of slime or mucus which constitutes their entire body is the most ancient and original form of animal as well as of vegetable plastids. Hence it would evidently be just as arbitrary and unreasonable to assign them to the animal as it would be to assign them to the vegetable kingdom. In any case we shall for the present be acting more cautiously and critically if we comprise the still living Monera—whose number and distribution is probably very great—as a special and independent class, contrasting them with the other classes of the kingdom Protista, as well as with the animal kingdom. Morphologically considered, the Monera—on account of the perfect homogeneity of the albuminous substance of their bodies, on account of their utter want of heterogeneous particles—are more closely connected with anorgana than with organisms, and evidently form the transition between the inorganic and organic world of bodies, as is necessitated by the hypothesis of spontaneous generation. I have described and given illustrations of the forms and vital phenomena of the still living Monera (Protamœba, Protogenes, Protomyxa, etc.) in my Monograph of the Monera, and have briefly mentioned the most important facts in the eighth chapter.

The Amœbæ of the present day, and the organisms most closely connected with them, Arcellidæ and Gregarinæ, which we here unite as a second class of Protista under the name of Amœboidea (Protoplasta), present no fewer genealogical difficulties than the Monera. These primary creatures are at present usually placed in the animal kingdom without its in reality being understood why. For simple naked cells—that is, shell-less plastids with a kernel—occur as well among real plants as real animals. The generative cells, for example, in many Algæ (spores and eggs) exist for a longer or shorter time in water in the form of naked cells with a kernel, which cannot be distinguished at all from the naked eggs of many animals (for example, those of the Siphonophorous Medusæ). In reality every naked simple cell, whether it proceeds from an animal or vegetable body, cannot be distinguished from an independent Amœba. For an Amœba is nothing but a simple primary cell, a naked little lump of cell-matter, or plasma, containing a kernel. The contractility of this plasma, which the free Amœba shows in stretching out and drawing in its changing processes, is a general vital property of the organic plasma of all animal as well as of all vegetable plastids. When a freely moving Amœba, which perpetually changes its form, passes into a state of rest, it draws itself together into the form of a globule, and surrounds itself with a secreted membrane. It can then be as little distinguished from an animal egg as from a simple globular vegetable cell.

Naked cells, with kernels, which are continuously changing, stretching out and drawing in formless, finger-like processes, and which are on this account called amœboid, are found frequently and widely dispersed in fresh water and in the sea; nay, are even found creeping on land. They take their food in the same way as was previously described in the case of the Protamœba. Their propagation by division can sometimes be observed. I have described the processes in an earlier chapter. Many of these formless Amœbæ have lately been recognized as the early stages of development of other Protista (especially the Myxomycetæ), or as the freed cells of lower animals and plants. The colorless blood-cells of animals, for example, those of human blood, cannot be distinguished from Amœbæ. They, like the latter, can receive solid corpuscles into their interior, as I was the first to show by feeding them with finely divided coloring matters. However, other Amœbæ seem to be independent "good species," since they propagate themselves unchanged throughout many generations. Besides the real, or naked, Amœbæ (Gamnamœbæ), we also find widely diffused in fresh water case bearing Amœbæ (Lepamœbæ), whose naked plasma body is partially protected by a more or less solid shell (Arcella), sometimes even by a case (Difflugia) composed of small stones. Lastly, we frequently find in the body of many lower animals parasitic Amœbæ (Gregarinæ), which, adapting themselves to a parasitic life, have surrounded their plasma-body with a delicate closed membrane.

The simple naked Amœbæ are, next to the Monera, the most important of all organisms to the whole science of biology, and especially to general genealogy. For it is evident that the Amœbæ originally arose out of simple Monera (Protamœbæ), by the important process of segregation taking place in their homogeneous viscid body—the differentiation of an inner kernel from the surrounding plasma. By this means the great progress from a simple cytod (without kernel) into a real cell (with kernel) was accomplished. As some of these cells at an early stage encased themselves by secreting a hardened membrane, they formed the first vegetable cells, while others, remaining naked, developed into the first aggregates of animal cells. The presence or absence of an encircling hard membrane forms the most important, although by no means the entire, difference of form between animal and vegetable cells. As vegetable cells even at an early stage enclose themselves within their hard, thick, and solid cellular shell, like that of the Amœbæ in a state of rest, they remain more independent and less accessible to the influences of the outer world than are the soft animal cells, which are in most cases naked, or merely covered by a thin pliable membrane. But in consequence of this the vegetable cells cannot combine, as do the animal cells, for the construction of higher and composite fibrous tracts, for example, the nervous and muscular tissues. It is probable that, in the case of the most ancient single-celled organisms, there must have developed at an early stage the very important difference in the animal and vegetable mode of receiving food. The most ancient single-celled animals, being naked cells, could admit solid particles into the interior of their soft bodies, as do the Amœbæ and the colorless blood cells; whereas the most ancient single-celled plants encased by their membranes were no longer able to do this, and could admit through it only fluid nutrition (by means of diffusion).

The Whip-swimmers (Flagellata), which we consider as a third class of the kingdom Protista, are of no less doubtful nature than the Amœbæ. They often show as close and important relations to the vegetable as to the animal kingdom. Some Flagellata at an early stage, when freely moving about, cannot be distinguished from real plants, especially from the spores of many Algæ; whereas others are directly allied to real animals, namely, to the fringed Infusoria (Ciliata). The Flagellata are simple cells which live in fresh or salt water, either singly or united in colonies. The characteristic part of their body is a very movable simple or compound whip-like appendage (whip, or flagellum), by means of which they actively swim about in the water. This class is divided into two orders. Among the fringed whip-swimmers (Cilioflagellata) there exists, in addition to the long whip, a short fringe of vibrating hairs, which is wanting in the unfringed whip-swimmers (Nudoflagellata). To the former belong the flint-shelled yellow Peridinia, which are largely active in causing the phosphorescence of the sea; to the latter belong the green Euglenæ, immense masses of which frequently make our ponds in spring quite green.

A very remarkable new form of Protista, which I have named Flimmer-ball (Magosphæra), I discovered in September 1869, on the Norwegian coast, and have more accurately described in my Biological Studies. Off the island of Gis-oe, near Bergen, I found swimming about, on the surface of the sea, extremely neat little balls composed of a number (between thirty and forty) of fringed pear-shaped cells, the pointed ends of which were united in the centre like radii. After a time the ball dissolved. The individual cells swarmed about independently in the water like fringed Infusoria, or Ciliata. These afterwards sank to the bottom, drew their fringes into their bodies, and gradually changed into the form of creeping Amœbæ. These last afterwards encased themselves, and then divided by repeated halvings into a large number of cells. The cells became covered with vibratile hairs, broke through the case enclosing them, and now again swam about in the shape of a fringed ball. This wonderful organism, which sometimes appears like a simple Amœbæ, sometimes as a single fringed cell, sometimes as a many-celled fringed ball, can evidently be classed with none of the other Protista, and must be considered as the representative of a new independent group. As this group stands midway between several Protista, and links them together, it may bear the name of Mediator, or Catallacta.

The Protista of the fifth class, the Tram-weavers, or Labyrinthulæ, are of a no less puzzling nature; they were lately discovered by Cienkowski on piles in sea water. They are spindle-shaped cells, mostly of a yellow-ochre color, which are sometimes united into a dense mass, sometimes move about in a very peculiar way. They form, in a manner not yet explained, a retiform frame of entangled threads (compared to a labyrinth), and on the dense filamentous "tramways" of this frame they glide about. From the shape of the cells of the Labyrinthulæ we might consider them as the simplest plants, from their motion as the simplest animals, but in reality they are neither animals nor plants.

The Influence of Christianity on Civilization.

Christianity teaches that men are "saved" through Christ. Moral goodness will not do. The thief, the robber, and the murderer, may go straight to heaven by repentance at the last moment. The noblest minds must suffer eternally if they believe not in Jesus. This doctrine certainly gives a license to crime. It makes Jesus a scapegoat for rascality and wickedness. It depreciates the value and the importance of moral goodness. Indeed, the "plan of salvation" has all the the worst features of a bankrupt law. In the past, especially, Christendom has been filled with men who have not tried to live pure and good lives, because they believed that moral goodness would not save them. There are still those who intend to get all the advantages, or the supposed advantages of a sinful life, and at last to "cheat the devil out of his dues" by availing themselves of the great bankrupt scheme of redemption. It is true that Christianity tells men to live morally. So the laws require men to pay their honest debts. Give men an opportunity to do wrong and to escape its consequences, and in spite of all injunctions to virtue, many will put off doing right as long as they think it prudent, or possible to do so and yet escape hell. The degraded beings in the slums and purlieus of vice in our large cities are among those who expect to be saved from the effects of their immoralites by the great scheme of salvation. They believe that repentance in the last moments of earthly existence will save them; and under the influence of this belief they continue in their career of vice and crime until the approach of death, or some great calamity, frightens them into sudden compliance with the requirements of the great "plan." Every murderer almost, who is hanged, confesses his belief in Christ and looks to Calvary for salvation. In the Middle Ages, especially, this doctrine promoted every kind of vice and villainy. To some extent—in proportion as it is believed—it does the same to-day. When men come to have less faith in Christ, and more faith in moral rectitude, they will attach less importance to their creed, and feel more concerned in giving full weight and measure, keeping their word, and paying their honest debts.

The belief in satanic agency and divine judgments has greatly injured the cause of human progress. It has turned men's attention from the real to imaginary causes of their misfortunes. Afflicted with pestilence, and regarding it as a visitation of God to punish the people for some neglect of religious duties, men have commenced fasting and praying when they should have applied their minds to the study of physiology and hygiene, when they should have been at work, cleaning their streets, draining their marshes, and ventilating and fumigating their dwellings. Multitudes have been on their knees praying to God for the removal of plagues and other evils, because the Bible teaches that prayer and supplication are the proper means by which to effect their removal, when they should have been improving their physical condition. In proportion as men have outgrown the notion that evils are destroyed by such methods, they have made progress in bettering their condition. Nowadays they trust to natural agencies. Even when a church is built and has been dedicated to God, the congregation has more faith in lightning rods than in the efficacy of prayer. Having dedicated the building to God, do they trust to his discrimination when he hurls his thunderbolts? By no means. They have no faith that the purpose for which the house was built will exempt it from the liability of accident, else they would use the money which is expended for lightning rods in publishing and distributing tracts, or in sustaining missionaries in heathen lands. When Frederick Douglass, after praying fifteen years in the usual way, came to the conclusion that a prayer with his legs was the only prayer that would reach his case, and accomplish his purpose, he represented the actual belief, and acted in accordance with the general practice of this utilitarian age.

Christianity, by making the Bible an authoritative standard of truth, has naturally perpetuated the errors and abuses which the book sanctions, while it has suppressed or discouraged the announcement of discoveries, and the dissemination of truths in conflict with those errors.

In our own country, and within the memory of men who are yet young, human slavery has been defended by the Bible, even when the best sentiment of the nation has been against it. That the Bible sanctions slavery is not a matter of doubt. See Lev. xxv, 44, 45; Exodus, xxi, 20; 1 Tim. vi, 1, 2; Titus, ii, 9.

Woman's advancement has been retarded by the teachings of the New Testament respecting her position and her duties. It indorses and confirms the doctrine contained in the old Hebrew declaration, "Thy desire shall be to thy husband and he shall rule over thee." It teaches that man was made for himself and the glory of God, while woman's existence is of a secondary character, since she was simply made for man. It enjoins that as the Church is subject unto Christ, so let the wives be to their own husbands in everything (Eph. v, 22, 24). According to the New Testament, as Christ is head of the Church, so is the husband head of the wife. Women are not to speak in public, but to be under obedience, as also saith the law; they are not permitted to teach, but to learn in silence with all subjection, for the reason that "Adam was first formed, then Eve, and Adam was not deceived, but the woman being deceived, was in the transgression" (1 Tim. ii, 11, 15). These notions are not, when accepted, calculated to elevate the character or better the condition of woman. To-day even, St. Paul, because of some of his false and foolish teachings regarding woman, and the authority attached by many to his writings, is the most powerful foe that the advocates of the rights of woman have to contend against. Several years ago, Rev. Theodore Cuyler of Brooklyn was brought before an ecclesiastical body, tried, convicted, and censured for permitting a lady to occupy his pulpit in disobedience of Paul's explicit instructions. It matters not that the New Testament tells husbands to love their wives. So long as it assigns woman a subordinate position, and makes her the agent through which sin entered the world, and requires submission on her part to the will and authority of man it must retard her advancement just in proportion as it is believed.

Immense multitudes have been put to death for the imaginary crime of witchcraft, because the Old Testament says, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live." This monstrous delusion has been encouraged and perpetuated by the New Testament. It not only accepts as authoritative the teachings of the Jewish Scriptures, except when some few laws are specially revoked, but it gives prominence to the doctrine of diabolical possessions, and encourages the superstition that madness and many diseases result from the agency of demons. If the Bible were believed now as it was once believed, and its friends had the power to carry out their wishes, spiritual mediums, it is likely, would be treated very much as supposed witches were in the days of the pious Puritans of New England.

The divine right of kings has been strengthened from age to age by the teachings of St. Paul. What kind of a principle and requirement is that contained in the thirteenth chapter of his Epistle to the Romans? "Let every soul," he says, "be subject unto the higher powers. For there is no power but of God; the powers that be are ordained of God; whosoever, therefore, resisteth the ordinances of God shall receive to themselves damnation." These words, unqualified by any others restricting their meaning, are just what any tyrant would want. And they have been quoted whenever a brave soul has attempted to urge his countrymen to rise in their might and relieve themselves of the tyranny of a selfish and cruel ruler, or from the burden of unjust and oppressive laws. And with the multitude, these words have proved a greater protection to despotism than all the armies it could muster and all the physical power it could command. Believing it their religious duty to submit to "the powers that be" the people, in the past, have yielded to almost every conceivable form of oppression and outrage.

Notes on the Convention.

BY T. C. LELAND.

But for the determination arrived at in Convention at Syracuse to make no expression this year on the subject of the Comstock Postal Law, the following amendment to the first plank of the Platform would hav been submitted and probably adopted by the Congress. Also an amendment to bring out one important meaning and put it beyond dispute, in the second plank, would hav been offered. Amendments in brackets and italics as follows:

PLATFORM.

1. TOTAL SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE, to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution: including the equitable taxation of church property, secularization of the public schools, abrogation of Sabbatarian laws, abolition of chaplaincies, prohibition of public appropriations for religious purposes, [impartial transportation in the U. S. Mails of all printed matter offered without reference to the political views, religious opinions, or moral teachings therein contained;] and all other measures necessary to the same general end.

2. NATIONAL PROTECTION FOR NATIONAL CITIZENS, in their equal civil, political, and religious rights [including the extension of the right of suffrage to woman]: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, and afforded through the United States Courts.

3. UNIVERSAL EDUCATION THE BASIS OF UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE IN THIS SECULAR REPUBLIC: to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, requiring every state to maintain a thoroughly secularized public school system, and to permit no child within its limits to grow up without a good elementary education.

THAT COMPROMISE.

The concession, or so-called compromise, yielded by the majority at Syracuse, was in no sense a sudden impulse originating in indecision or in fright. It was offered for no other purpose than to do right and be right on the question—for no other purpose than to giv the minority time for farther exploration of the narrow border land that divides us; to see if another year would not make it still narrower, and perhaps close up the gap altogether. Mr. Abbot and his party claimed that it would be so disastrous for the League to adopt "repeal" resolutions, we thought on that point we would humor him. There was no hurry; the question was still new; a year would soon pass by, and it could be used to good purpose in discussion and shedding light on the subject, which Mr. Abbot professes so much to desire. The concession on resolutions was in no manner an agreement as to officers. It was all done in Committee on Resolutions without conference with, and without reference to, the Committee on Nominations. The majority at no time thought of yielding or compromising on the officers of the League for the coming year. Mr. Abbot, then, has not one particle of ground for saying "The majority broke their own agreement by proceeding to elect a strong 'repeal ticket.'" The "Repeal" party were determined, from the start and always, so sure as they had a majority in the Convention, to change the management of the League for the coming year.

To show this, the following paper, written on October 10th as part of a private letter, is submitted to Liberal readers. After writing it, I showed it to Mr. Wakeman and Mr. Bennett. Both objected at first to making any concession on so vital a point; but I said, We shall certainly be met at Syracuse by peace-makers, compromisers, and people who are more terribly afraid of a row than determined to maintain a principle; and we had better think it over be forehand and be prepared to say what we will concede and upon what, under any circumstances, we will resolutely insist. Finally both agreed that the concession in this paper was as far as we would go. It was written to John W. Truesdell of Syracuse; but, on reconsideration, was withheld and not forwarded with the rest of the letter. It is as follows:

"While I am playing peacemaker in a personal matter, let me make an olive branch suggestion on a wider field. There are persons actively engaged in bringing about a compromise, or settlement, or the framing of a policy or platform upon which all can unite in the coming Congress at Syracuse. Green, you see in this week's T. S., seems to think we are somehow all to be brought together as a happy family yet. I confess I am willing, but havn't been able to see how it can be done. I feel very sure that the repeal party will be strong enough at Syracuse to carry their measures and elect their officers. Yet I for one don't wish to carry matters with a high hand. I take no pleasure in the death of the wicked.

"I think Mr. Abbot has now so far angered and alienated the Liberals of this country that he himself ought to see that he cannot command confidence all around; and he ought to be willing now to giv place to some man who can unite all suffrages and all hearts. The true leader ought to know how to soften, subdue, and ring in stripes and factions, instead of repelling, embittering, and ruling them out. Mr. Abbot don't seem to be the leader on attractive principles. Were the League now in bolder, broader more efficient hands, it would go on to a splendid success. For the good of the whole movement he ought now to retire.

"Also, no editor ought to be President of the League. He is liable all the time to say something as editor that don't befit him as President, and that will offend some of his constituency as President. The two offices don't 'consist' and he ought to resign one or the other.

"I have just to-day been thinking what I would be willing to give up if Abbot would quietly and with dignity pass the Presidency over to other hands, and save a public disagreement or downright quarrel. And it occurred to me that I would be willing to forego any expression by the League, this year, on either 'repeal' or 'reform'—say nothing about either in resolution or platform, till next year. Meantime let the discussion in the journals go on, and get 'a good ready' for a full, fair, intelligent expression next year. I feel sure that we would descend from our height of power to carry all we wish to, to compromise so much of that, and yet, for the sake of peace, and retaining every possible member in the League, leaving no soreheads, and alienating no one, I would be willing to do that."

On the morning of the Convention before its assembling I met Mr. Underwood in the streets at Syracuse, and he immediately began expressing a wish that the Postal Law, and the question of obscenity might be kept out of the Convention. I replied that I did not know of anybody who was pushing it harder into the Convention than Mr. Abbot. I told him that on our side we were not especially urgent to push "repeal" in the Convention, but that we were determined to change the conduct of the League and hav a more efficient management. He agreed that Mr. Abbot had made mistakes and that it was competent for the League, if they chose to do so, to change its officers. I then produced this paper and read it to him. He expressed interest in it. made no objections to it, and I think asked for a copy of it. At all events I let him take it and suggested that he submit it to headquarters on his side. The next morning (Sunday) in Committee on Resolutions, while compromise talk was flying around, I asked him for the paper. He returned it to me saying it had been considered somewhat, but had led to no actions or suggestions. Readers will see that there was a basis and chance for an "agreement" if one had been desired; but absolutely no agreement was effected as Mr. Abbot asserts.

WHAT MIGHT HAV BEEN.

Never was a defeat so clearly due to the defeated hero himself. That "Card" announcing himself for re-election, that "call" requiring credentials to be sent to himself for supervision, and that editorial charging on the Liberals of a sister city a secret plot to capture the Convention, was a trio of stupidities sufficient to secure the defeat of even a first-class angel. It was easy enough therefore for this strategy to consign any simple unwinged Mr. Abbot to official oblivion. But if Mr. Abbot had been a student of human nature, or if he could hav had any faithful friend endowed with political sense or knowledge of the qualities required in a leader—any friend upon whom he could hav relied for advice—or if he had asked advice of almost any merely common-sense person and would hav taken and followed it, the result might hav been, indeed almost certainly would hav been, very different. Had Mr. Abbot issued a straightforward Call as he did last year, with no exhibition of nervousness about delegates, let the local Leagues represent themselves as they found it most convenient, let their delegates present themselves with the usual credentials at the Convention as they did last year at Rochester, and had hurled no flings at anybody, there would hav been no special effort made on the part of the Repeal party to secure a majority of the delegates. They would hav taken the situation exactly as it stood in September when the Call was issued. The delegates would hav met under no special urgency, no hot blood would hav been coursing through indignant veins, not nearly so many delegates would hav assembled, and Mr, Abbot would hav had an easy and a real, instead of a fictitious "victory." The present majority finding themselves in that case in the minority would hav organized no bolt; on the contrary they would hav accepted the decision with equanimity, and "gone in," as they now propose to do, for another year of discussion and enlightenment, sure in the end that the great body of Liberals, when well informed on all points of the issue, can make no other decision than that of repeal.

The course of Mr. Abbot looked crooked, looked like the low strategy of the ordinary office-seeker and politician, looked like a determination, as Mr. Green expressed it, "to pocket the Convention;" and the Leagues in their various localities determined that such a policy among Liberals should be mercilessly stamped out. They therefore exerted themselves to form new Leagues, and presented themselves with full delegations at the Convention to put their condemnation on the claim that anybody owned the League, or that it could be run at the caprice, or whim, or dictatorial will of any one man. They scouted the claim that duties are all on one side. If Mr. Abbot organized individuals into the League, they in return organized him. If he built them up they also exalted him. Individual followers are as important to a leader as he is to them. Their rights and duties are reciprocal not unilateral; and when the leader leads wrong, the followers hav the undoubted right to revolt, and among Freethinkers every dictator will find that out to his cost.

The result reached at Syracuse adds one more to many previous illustrations showing how impolitic it is to drive straight on upon an unknown shore. Breakers are sure to overwhelm that captain who despises pilotage, roadsteads, and the natural channels to a maritime port. That wisest of sea-dogs, Captain Marryat, advises how much more easily difficulties may be overcome by "insinivation, not bluster." Hamlet too counsels—"By indirections find directions out," and in the Gospel we are enjoined to seek first "the kindom of heaven, and all these things will be added to you." Some one in the Convention (was it Mr. Wakeman?) said, "If you sit down and try to be happy you will be of all beings the most miserable." Success comes only as an incident of well doing, and rarely or never to those who directly aim for success. Emerson says:

> "Flee the goods which from thee flee,
> Seek not fortune, fortune seeketh thee;
> Nor mount nor dive, all good things keep
> The midway of the eternal deep."

It is by neglect of these maxims of plain good sense that Mr. Abbot now finds himself ousted from the cradle he has rocked, disowned by the child he had nourished into life—nourished indeed! but alas! had also too fondly and injudiciously plied the rod. May the rump League of pulpiteers, ex-judges, and reactionaries which he carries with him, afford him all the consolations he hopes from them. If he calls their following "victory," he is entirely welcome to it.

Panics.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: The present hysterical condition of Mr. Abbot and others of the Boston Freethinkers on the subject of obscenity reminds me of an incident that occurred in the West during our late civil War. At a certain military post a drove of cattle was corralled to be used as beef for the troops. One night a steer, fooling around, came up to the stable where the mules stood and began to rub his head against some artillery harness that hung upon the stubbed branch of a tree hard by. All of a sudden the harness slipped off and came down upon his horns. The steer immediately became panic-stricken, and giving that peculiar bawl of a badly frightened animal, began to run, the chains rattling, entangling his legs, and causing him ever and anon to tumble heels over head. It was not ten minutes before every infernal steer of the whole herd caught the infection, and cocking up his tail straight, and bellowing at the top of his voice, ran as if the devil was after him. Stop them? You might as well try to stop a northwest storm of wind, rain, and hail with your umbrella. The next morning the colonel ordered a detail of mounted men to go out in search of the cattle and bring them back. They returned about sunset but they did not find more than a third part of them. The rest had run beyond the reach of recovery, and may be running still for aught I know. Some were found frightened to death, others badly crippled, and the steer that began the stampede because he was not philosopher enough quietly to disentangle his horns of the harness, was found fast to a stump with his leg broken.

Now, Comstock has thrown a set of mule's harness upon Mr. Abbot's head, and only see how he runs and rears and froths at the mouth, nearly dead with fright, and heading towards the Christian Statesman as if for some protection against the obscenity devil that is chasing him at the heels. The prudes in petticoats and the prudes in pantaloons—the latter class far more numerous than the former—are also scared pale, and such a time as there is in the Radical corrall is a caution against false alarms. No man laughs louder at the fun than Comstock himself, for he cunningly laid his trap for the Head Center of the Radicals, and has got him securely by the leg. He has winged the leader of the wild goose party, and the rest of the flock are scattered through the sky, making a great noise, but no progress towards the place of their destination.

We see in panics, whether happening in a crowded theater when fire breaks out, or in a church when a piece of plaster falls from the ceiling, or a shingle is slowly broken over the knee, that human beings instantaneously lose all reason and self-possession, and give themselves up entirely to the government of a single emotion, and that the meanest of all we are capable of—fear. Hence, in the stupid attempt to save one life ten are destroyed. Who stood higher in the ranks of the Freethinkers a year ago than Abbot did? Yet this obscenity panic took him, and his monomania has thrown back the Radical cause a quarter of a century. A most striking proof and illustration of his insanity is that when his old friends and fellow-laborers honestly go for the repeal of the Comstock laws, leaving the state legislatures and courts to punish and supress obscene literature, he charges them with favoring measures, either ignorantly or wilfully, that will certainly promote that evil. Men and women, as pure in their morals and tastes as an infant, he exposes to this charge, simply because they conscienciously differ with Mr. Abbot as to the means to be adopted to abate the nuisance; and because they are not panic-stricken and bereft of reason as he is. I confess I feel insulted when he leaves us who differ with him the poor option either to be set down as those who intentionally aid and abet obscenity, or, as mental imbeciles, who cannot see the immediate effect of a cause.

During the antislavery controversy the first qualification for an enlistment into the ranks of the Abolitionists was the deliberate and utter disregard and rejection of the world's and the church's idea of respectability. If a person were constantly, or even occasionably, inquiring beforehand what Mrs. Grundy or the Rev. Dr. Creamcheese would think of this doctrine or that measure, it showed that he was double in his ways, and he soon fell out of the ranks and gave place to a man of single purpose—the abolition of American slavery. So, in the Freethought movement which aims to secularize the Government, he is neither fit to lead nor follow who can be alarmed by what our adversaries think, say, or do. The church is conscious that she cannot meet us in argument on the merits of the case, and therefore uses the obscenity dodge as the most effectual and indeed the only barrier to our progress. The Index should have imitated the policy of its neighbor, The Banner of Light, which, when the church people raised the cry of "Freelove" against the Spiritualists, scorned to be panic-stricken and driven into self-defense against such ridiculous charges, but simply told the saintly hypocrites to sweep around their own doors before they pronounced their neighbors' premises to be unclean. When the church in my section of the country raised the story, which hundreds believed, that Abby Kelly Foster publicly exhibited her naked person for twenty-five cents for each spectator, male and female, the society under whose auspices she was lecturing—and she, too, glorious woman—scorned to notice the charge or make any defense. The antislavery leaders were too wise to allow themselves to be thrown upon the defensive, but pursued the church, that mother of harlots and bulwark of slavery, and drove her to the wall. But Mr. Abbot, by falling into Comstock's trap, instead of kicking it out of the road, has lost the confidence of many of his friends as a skillful reformer; has proved himself to be unfit as a courageous leader; has created a schism in our ranks which increases the weakness of our unorganized condition tenfold, and has gained nothing but a smile and a pat on the head from the Christian Statesman of Philadelphia which is aiming to put a theological creed into the Constitution that would disfranchise and send to prison every Freethinker in the country, and exalt to place and power only those who are slavethinkers to the church.

I am sick and tired of this Boston Miss Nancyism, this mawkish sensitiveness to the charge of obscenity, this shameless boot-licking and dirt-eating in the presence of Puritan "respectability" which has grown up in our midst during the last year, and which I firmly believe is the result of a plan cunningly devised by Comstock and his employers. Unless the Radicals quit their nonsense, get over their panic, find their heads, and do as the Abolitionists did, and the Spiritualists now do—spit contemptiously upon the church liars and slanderers who hav raised this mad dog cry of obscenity against us—we might as wellhang our harps upon the willows of Babylon and be content with our bondage. It looks well indeed that a body of such intelligent and virtuous people as the Radicals are, men and women, bent upon the high and holy design of secularizing civil government and enlarging and perpetuating the liberties we enjoy, should be turned aside from their purpose by the hue and cry of obscenity; and the more especially when the cry comes from the church which harbors in its bosom more obscene scoundrels than any other organization upon the earth, and which, by her false teachings and false standards of right and wrong, has always been the prolific mother of all kinds of abominations. PATERFAMILIAS.

The Liberal League Movement.

NOW FOR WORK.—ONLY FIVE DOLLARS FOR A CHARTER.

As I anticipated when Mr. Abbot threw down the gauntlet to the Liberals of the United States and demanded that his views should be indorsed at the Syracuse Congress or he would refuse longer to serve the National League, we hav had a bitter controversy—one that has engendered much ill feeling and caused a split in our ranks; and now we hav in the place of one National Liberal League two of them. But the past is past, and cannot be changed; all we can do is to look well to the future. I heartily indorse your editorial remarks in the last TRUTH SEEKER, that "it is to be presumed that both parties are sincere and honest in the positions they occupy, and if they cannot agree to think alike, they can at least agree to disagree, and can do so without quarreling. There is enough for all of us to do, and there is no reason why we should not press on in our noble cause, each party accomplishing all in its power." That is the position we must all take—each League consider the other its associate worker, engaged in the same noble cause, and the Liberals everywhere should be left free to unite with the one or the other, as they may honestly decide after mature consideration. And if a spirit of fraternity, and not of hostility, can be cultivated between the two Leagues, the division may result in good to the cause.

There is no great disagreement between us, after all. We are all in favor of the entire separation of Church and State. We are all, or nearly all, opposed to the Comstock laws, and all opposed to the circulation of obscene literature. As I understand it, our difference is this: The Abbot party hold that the Comstock laws could be so amended that they would not be unconstitutional. But Mr. Abbot admitted to me that as they are now construed by the courts they are unconstitutional. The opposite party hold that these laws are wholly unconstitutional and cannot by any amendment be made constitutional. This party claims that it is the business of the states, and not of the nation, to suppress obscene literature. As evidence of their agreement, before Mr. Abbot and his friends left the Congress the following resolutions, offered by Mr. Palmer, a "repealer," were unanimously, or nearly unanimously, passed:

Resolved, That the freedom of the press, which is guaranteed by the United States Constitution, includes freedom to publish and freedom to circulate, by the customary channels, all opinions on literary, scientific, political, social, moral, religious, or other subjects.

Resolved, That, while we recognize the supreme importance of extinguishing, as far as possible, the demand for obscene literature by educational and moral means, we also recognize the practical necessity of legislation by the proper and constitutional authority against the crime of publishing it, and laws for the punishment of the same.

I can't understand how any one who voted for those resolutions can be justly charged with favoring the circulation of obscene literature; and I do not believe that there is a person intelligent enough to be a Liberal who does favor it.

But, leaving this question, as it has been fully discussed from every standpoint, let us all proceed to business—to building up the great Liberal League party, now represented by two National Leagues. And, for my part, as Chairman of the Executive Committee of the old League, I am determined to do all in my power to that end; and I hope my old friend Mr. C. D. B. Mills, who is Chairman of the Executive Committee of the new League, will do all in his power to build up the new League. He and I hav too long worked side by side in the Liberal cause to work against each other now, and it shall not be my fault if we do not work in unison. As he is to go through the West on a lecturing tour soon, I hope wherever he goes he may add a new Local League to the new organization.

And now, friends of "the entire separation of Church and State," let us cease wrangling and go to work. By a vote of the late Congress, the Board of Directors will allow any person or persons who form a League to retain, for his or their trouble, five dollars as compensation; that will virtually make the fee for a charter hereafter but $5; and under this liberal arrangement one hundred new Leagues should be formed during the next sixty days. I shall be pleased to furnish blank forms of Constitution for Local Leagues when called for.

It is most important that we hav an active Executive Committeeman in each state, and any one of those now serving who for any reason cannot go earnestly at work at once is requested to send me his resignation and, if convenient, the name of some live, able Liberal to take the place. Will every reader of this article assist in this good work?

Declaration of Rights.

A CASE FOR THE COURTS.

To the Editor of The Transcript: Quoting from my remarks in Faneuil Hall, as reported in full in the Globe of yesterday, you kindly commend my motives, but condemn my logic. Bad logic is dangerous. It brings men to beggary and nations to the dust. Yours seems to assume that courts never make mistakes, and, therefore, the Comstock law is constitutional and "Cupid's Yokes" an obscene book. Let that be true, and what follows? By chapter 165, section 15, of the General Statutes, the possession of an obscene book is an offense, punishable by imprisonment and fine. I possess "Cupid's Yokes," and mean to do so, whatever the courts have decided or other people think. If the District Attorney of Middlesex, knowing all these facts, does not prosecute me as soon as possible, he will violate his oath of office. Will you show your readers where the flaw is in this logic and oblige,

Medford, Mass., Aug. 3, 1878. ELIZUR WRIGHT.

We, the undersigned, free and independent citizens of the United States, recognize the above words of the Hon. Elizur Wright as the utterance of a brave, honest, and independent American. They were published more than a month ago, and he still has his liberty. It is to be inferred that the District Attorney of Middlesex does not regard "Cupid's Yokes" as an obscene book; otherwise he is derelict in the performance of his duty. We wish also to place our names on record that we do not regard "Cupid's Yokes" as an obscene publication. Many of us have read it, have it in our possession, and propose to so retain it so long as we choose. While we do not indorse every sentence in it, and think some portions of it are in bad taste, we regard it as the expression of an honest, earnest man, who had a legal and undoubted right to so express himself, and that every American possesses the right to read it, to own it, to buy and to sell it, to exhibit it, and to send it from point to point by any public mode of conveyance.

We furthermore recognize the attempt on the part of any one to deprive us of the right to own, buy, sell, or transport this or other similar books, including works on medicine, hygiene, physiology, sociology, social ethics, relations of the sexes, etc., as subversive of the very highest principles of American liberty; and while we are opposed to obscene and vile literature, that really is so, we hereby pledge ourselves to forever uphold freedom of thought, freedom of speech, freedom of the press, and freedom of the mails. These are the fundamental principles of American liberty, the birthright of every American citizen, and we never wish to see them infringed or subverted. To maintain and perpetuate these rights "we pledge our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor."

We hav printed the above in separate slips, ready to send to all friends who are willing to make an effort to obtain additional names. It is desirable that the list rolls up to thousands of names, that our enemies may see who are willing to stand up for their rights and are determined to do so. Let those who wish copies drop us a card, and we will send them all they want, and will do as much to serve them. Great is liberty.

The Generosity of English Liberals.

We hav several times alluded to the readiness of the English friends of liberty of speech and press to contribute to the cause. Their Defense Fund rapidly increased to the nice little sum of over $6,000. Since Mr. Truelove's release, notwithstanding the fact that he is a gentleman in comfortable circumstances, a purse of $800 in gold was urged upon him by enthusiastic contributors who invited him to a tea-party.

Now, we hav every confidence that when our American people become thoroughly aroused to the subject, they will be no less generous. We may, however, complain that they are a little slow about waking up. Mr. Heywood's family were driven from their home by the foreclosure of a mortgage; they hav livd in a state bordering on destitution in Boston. Mr. Lant's family, during the period of his incarceration, with great difficulty kept the wolf from the door with the aid of a few contributions from a half-dozen friends thoroughly cognizant of the facts. His indomitable little wife, however, was industrious and frugal, and withal patient and uncomplaining.
